The IRREPRESSIBLE CONFLICT

The Civil War was the bloodiest conflict which the world had seen up to that time, and it struck a blow which was almost fatal to the American Union. The issues were complex and confused. On the Northern side, the primary objective of the abolitionists was the destruction of slavery as an institution, while the aim of the nationalists was the preservation of the Union. On the Southern side, many fought to defend slavery—an institution whose rights had been guaranteed by the Constitution—while others believed that the basic issue was the vindication of the sovereignty of the individual state. Beneath these immediate issues lay the conflict between two radically different forms of society: the democratic, industrial economy of the North and the aristocratic, agrarian economy of the South.

Although the causes of conflict were deeply imbedded in the American past, a series of dramatic events in the 1850's precipitated the outbreak of war in 1861.

The Fugitive Slave Law of 1850, which compelled the return of runaway slaves to their owners, fanned the fires of abolitionism. Emerson declared that he would not obey it; Thoreau actually helped at least one fugitive slave to escape into Canada; and the gentle-souled Whitman implied in one of his poems that he would aid all such fugitives with his "firelock" if the occasion should arise. A famous incident occurred in Boston in 1854, when an infuriated mob attempted to rescue Anthony Burns, a fugitive slave, from the police, and United States troops intervened to enforce the law.

The rival efforts of Northerners and Southerners to control Kansas, where the issue of slavery was to be decided by popular vote, resulted in bloody strife in that territory in 1855. In a famous speech called "The Crime Against Kansas," Senator Charles Sumner of Massachusetts spoke too harshly of Senator Butler of South Carolina; whereupon Butler's young kinsman, Preston Brooks, assaulted Sumner on the floor of the Senate and inflicted an injury from which Sumner never fully recovered. The controversy over Kansas hastened the organization, in 1856, of the Republican party on a platform opposing the extension of slavery.

Sectional bitterness was increased still further in 1857 by the Dred Scott decision of Chief Justice Taney. Having been taken by his owner into a free state and then brought back into a slave state, Dred sued for his freedom. The Supreme Court denied his petition, declaring that since a Negro was not a citizen, he did not have access to the courts. The decision was attacked by Lincoln in his famous debates with Stephen A. Douglas. Still more dramatic and more far-reaching in its effects was the attempt of John Brown, a fanatical abolitionist, to foment an insurrection of slaves in Virginia. After having captured the federal arsenal at Harper's Ferry in October 1859, he was arrested by a company of marines under Colonel Robert E. Lee, and was later tried and executed. Emerson and Thoreau spoke out in Brown's defense, while Southerners were horrified by the threat of a black uprising. The "martyrdom" of Brown contributed enormously to the rise of sectional feeling. He became the subject of a stirring battle song (p. 135) which Northern soldiers were to sing during the war: "John Brown's body lies a-moldering in the grave,/His soul is marching on!"

The election to the Presidency in 1860 of the Republican nominee, Abraham Lincoln, precipitated the secession movement in the South. The new party was exclusively the party of the North; political lines were more completely sectional than ever before. Since Lincoln had declared that "this government cannot endure permanently half slave and half free," and the Republican party vigorously opposed the extension of slavery, Southern extremists believed that they were forced to choose between abolition and secession. South Carolina seceded from the Union in December 1860, and by February 1861, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas had followed her example. Shortly thereafter, the Confederate States of America was organized in Montgomery, Alabama, with Jefferson Davis as president. On April 12, 1861, the Confederate batteries in Charleston harbor fired on the federal garrison in Fort Sumter, which surrendered the next day. Soon after this decisive event marking the opening of the war, Virginia, Arkansas, Tennessee, and North Carolina joined the Confederacy.

The choice between state and nation was a difficult one for many Southerners to make. The old constitutional argument that the states were older than the Union (true of course of only the original thirteen) and that the Union consequently derived its authority from the states was no doubt intellectually convincing to some. But loyalty is based in the emotions rather than in the intellect. The most distinguished officer of the Confederate army, Robert E. Lee, resigned his commission in the United States army when Virginia seceded because, as he put it, "I have been unable to make up my mind to raise my hand against my native state, my relatives, my children, and my home." A New England writer. Hawthorne, expressed sympathy with Lee's view when he said, with a touch of irony. "If a man loves his own State and is content to be ruined with her, let us shoot him it we can, but allow him an honorable burial in the soil he fights for."

At the outset of the war, the South believed that cotton alone was a guarantee of victory; that if deprived of cotton, the textile industry—and therefore the entire economy—of the North and of England would collapse. The Southern expectation was not realized. England, though on the point of doing so in 1862, never recognized the Confederacy. The issue was to be decided by arms alone, and the overwhelming superiority of the North in population and resources permitted little doubt of the eventual outcome. It is hardly necessary here to recount the shifting tides of battle during the four years of war. The turning point came in July 1863, when Lee was defeated at Gettysburg and Vicksburg capitulated after a long siege. The surrender of Lee to Grant at Appomattox on April 9, 1865, in effect terminated the war. The assassination of Lincoln five days later plunged the nation into the turmoil of reconstruction, which for the South proved to be more trying in many ways than the war itself.

ATTACKERS and DEFENDERS of SLAVERY

From the foregoing brief survey it is clear that slavery was the great issue before the American people, and it is not surprising that slavery was the subject of much of the literature, both Northern and Southern, during the decade which preceded the Civil War.

In the North, the two chief representatives of antislavery literature were John Green-leaf Whittier (p. 69) and Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe (p. 380). Both writers were motivated by a sincere devotion to the cause of human freedom. Whittier's poems were characterized by a fiery intensity rarely equalled even in polemical verse. His "Ichabod" (p. 73) was a scorching condemnation of Webster for his support of the Fugitive Slave Law:

Let not the land once proud of him

Insult him now,

Nor brand with deeper shame his dim.

Dishonored brow.

A better, though equally partisan, poem was his "Massachusetts to Virginia" (p. 71), with its swinging rhythm and its impressive roll-call of the Massachusetts counties. If the author's zeal caused him to forget that New Englanders had once been actively engaged in the slave trade—as when he said to Virginia,

But that one dark loathsome burden ye must stagger with alone,

And reap the bitter harvest which ye yourselves have sown!—

the poem was none the less effective both as an indictment of the South and as a summons to action at home. Mrs. Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin (p. 380), published in 1852, reached a larger number of readers than did all of Whittier's poems combined; indeed, the novel immediately became, and remained for many years, a best seller. It was dramatized and was long successful on the stage. Mrs. Stowe's appeal was more sentimental than Whittier's; her book emphasized the pathos of the traffic in Christian souls.

Among the early defenders of slavery was John Pendleton Kennedy, the Baltimore novelist. Although he has been considered as a creator of romantic fiction, it should be recalled here that in Swallow Barn, published in 1832, he presented a reassuring picture of the friendly relations which existed between master and slaves on a Virginia plantation.

The abolitionist attacks of the 1840's and 1850's called forth a more elaborate and more vigorous defense. Calhoun pointed out that slavery was a necessary part of the Southern economy and that its abolition would destroy the South:

The Southern States are an aggregate, in fact, of communities, not of individuals. Every plantation is a little community, with the master at its head, who concentrates in himself the united interests of capital and labor, of which he is the common representative. These small communities aggregated make the State in all, whose action, labor, and capital is equally represented and perfectly harmonized. Hence the harmony, the union, the stability of that section.

With the rising ride of sectional feeling, Southern apologists carried the argument to still greater extremes. William Gilmore Simms doubtless spoke for a substantial body of Southern opinion when he declared in 1852 that "slavery is a wisely devised institution of heaven devised for the benefit, improvement, and safety, morally, socially, and physically, of a barbarous and inferior race, who would otherwise perish by famine or by filth, by the sword, by disease, by waste, and destinies forever gnawing, consuming, and finally destroying."

The final step in the Southern defense carried the war to the enemy. The condition of the slaves on Southern plantations, it was argued, was infinitely better than that of the workers, or wage-slaves, in Northern factories and mines. William J. Grayson's The Hireling and the Slave (p. 114), published in 1854, pointed the contrast in Pope-like couplets: in Northern industrial communities,

Gaunt Famine prowls around his pauper prey,
And daily sweeps his ghastly hosts away;
Unburied corpses taint the summer air,
And crime and outrage revel with despair...

while on the Southern plantation,

Warm social joys surround the Negro's cot,
The evening dance its merriment imparts,
Love, with its rapture, fills their youthful hearts,
And placid age, the task of labor done,
Enjoys the summer shade, the winter sun.

A middle position between the extremes of Northern abolitionism and Southern eulogy was taken by Webster and Lincoln. Throughout the controversy the aim of both men was not to destroy slavery but to preserve the Union, and both incurred the ill will of the abolitionists. Although they believed that slavery was an evil and opposed its extension, they were willing to respect its constitutional rights in the slave states if thereby the Union might be saved. Webster's desire for his country was best expressed in the noble peroration, "Liberty and Union, one and inseparable, now and forever." Lincoln's attitude as late as August 1862 was expressed in the famous letter to Horace Greeley (p. 144): "My paramount object in this struggle is to save the Union, and is not either to save or to destroy slavery. . . . What I do about slavery and the colored race, I do because I believe it helps to save the Union." The Emancipation Proclamation, announced on January 1, 1863, was a shrewd political weapon as well as a great humanitarian document. It united the cause of the Negro with that of the Union and gave to the Civil War in the eyes of the world the dignity of a crusade for human liberty.

The LITERATURE of the WAR YEARS

Much of our best literature dealing with the Civil War was not written until many years later—Stephen Crane's Red Badge of Courage in 1895, for example, and Stephen Vincent Benét's John Brown's Body in 1928. During the war itself, the memorable literature on the subject of the war was small in amount: a few poems by Whittier and Timrod, several popular songs, the great speeches of Lincoln, and Whitman's great collection of poems, Drum-Taps.

Since Whittier's work as propagandist had been largely accomplished before the outbreak of the war, he was content during its course to write an occasional poem. In "Barbara Frietchie" (p. 74) he celebrated an instance of loyalty to "the old flag" in the border state of Maryland, though it was a loyalty which he and other abolitionists had done much to undermine In "Laus Deo" (p. 75) he rejoiced at the passage of the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery. The amendment marked the final triumph of the cause for which he had labored, with energy and self-sacrifice, for thirty years.

While Whittier did his best work before and after the war, actual hostilities had the magical effect on Henry Timrod (p. 123), the Southern poet, of calling forth poems far superior to anything else he ever wrote. "Ethnogenesis" (p. 124) and "The Cotton Boll" (p. 125) are compositions which entitle Timrod to a higher rank among our poets than he has yet been accorded. In these poems he reiterated many of the traditional Southern arguments: the Constitution recognized slavery, and the Bible did not prohibit it; the bond slave of the South was treated more humanely than the wage-slave of the North; Southern cotton was necessary to the prosperity and happiness of the world. In eloquent, moving verse he described his conception of the South's mission and of the Southern character. The exportation of cotton under a system of free trade, he thought, would bind the nations together in lasting peace. The Southern character and its influence on the rest of the world were typified for him in the Gulf Stream, which ". . . through the cold, untempered ocean pours its genial streams."

The war also called forth Lincoln's finest utterances. The First Inaugural (p. 139) faced the difficult situation already created by the secession of seven Southern states. Lincoln asserted that the Union was indissoluble, and that no force other than that necessary to hold federal property and collect federal duties would be used against the erring states. He concluded with an appeal "to the better angels of our nature." The Gettysburg Address (p. 145), second only to the Declaration of Independence, is our most classic expression of the American democratic ideal; it was so phrased as to be always applicable. America was "conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal." Americans should "highly resolve . . . that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, and for the people, shall not perish from the earth." Delivered a little more than a month before Lee's surrender and the author's death, the Second Inaugural (p. 147) regarded the war as the righteous judgment of God on both North and South for the sin of slavery. The task before us, he said, was to proceed, "with malice toward none, with charity for all . . . to bind up the nation's wounds . . . to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves, and with all nations." Lincoln's humane and wise view of postwar policy made his death a tragic loss to the South.

Walt Whitman (p. 148) had brought out three editions of Leaves of Grass (p. 149) before the war began and had laid down his basic principles in those volumes. He espoused Emerson's doctrine of the divinity of man, and, prompted by his larger and warmer sympathies, applied it literally and concretely to all men. He espoused, too, Emerson's belief in a transcendental intuition, which fused perhaps indistinguishably in his mind with an inherited Quaker belief in the inner light. His Quaker inheritance (which possibly was fully as important as the Emersonian influence) contributed also to his independence, his sense of brotherhood with all men, and his love of peace. His mysticism, which became more emphasized in his later life, seems a blend of Emerson, the Quakers, and the Orient. His celebration of the body, however, was derived from none of these sources: it shocked Emerson particularly and drove him to opposition.

Whitman was a great equalitarian—his very catalogues were symbols of the equalizing power of his democracy. The "Myself" of his longest poem was Everyman. The experiences related in his poems were partly actual and partly imaginary. So great was his faculty of empathy that he could project himself into the personalities of others in a very real sense and thus become "the hounded slave" or "the mashed fireman." He took his stand for absolute equality; he desired nothing for himself which others could not have in the same measure. It was natural that such a complete democrat should oppose slavery, and equally natural that such a sensitive sympathizer with all men should not bear arms against the slave owner. The war wrought no change in Whitman's basic ideas and attitudes. He was still "the caresser of life," still "a Southerner soon as a Northerner." His war poems reveal no partisan rage like Whittier's or Timrod's, nor were they concerned with the issues of the war. He felt a profound compassion for all soldiers and the mothers of soldiers, whether Yankee or Rebel.

Aside from polemics and sectional rancor, with which he was not at all concerned, Whitman's Drum-Taps (p. 206) affords the richest account of the war to be found in our poetry. One group of poems conveys the excitement of the early enlistments—the scholar is torn from his school; the bridegroom, from his bride. Another group pictures military scenes as sharply as a camera, and more suggestively—the cavalrymen slumping in their saddles while the horses drink from a stream, the shadowy forms of men and horses around the campfire on a mountainside. Other poems describe hospital scenes with modern realism or reveal the poignant suffering of the mother just notified of her son's death.

Though the war contributed nothing to Whitman's ideas, and changed not at all his fundamental attitudes, it stimulated the poet and clarified and spiritualized his poetry. He was never again to sing so lustily (and as some thought, sensually) of the "jolly bodily phase." His poetry became more mystical. His greatest poem reflects these changes. "When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd" (p. 211) was written as an elegy on the death of Lincoln. Due emphasis is given to the grief of the poet, memorialized by "lilac and star and bird"; due emphasis is given also to the sorrow of the nation, the funeral procession, and the tolling of bells. But these details are the background of the poet's mystical exaltation in the hymn to death. In the poem's burning core, America and the war and Lincoln are forgotten.

Except in such moments of mystical release, Whitman never forgot America. "Thou Mother with Thy Equal Brood" (p. 222) celebrated the restoration of the Union and the new solidarity of "these states." "Democratic Vistas" (p. 226) revealed an acute concern for the evils, more and more apparent, in our rapidly developing industrialism. But in the poems after the Civil War, Whitman recurred with an increasing frequency and a growing intensity to the mood of the Lincoln poem in his ultimate quest of a "passage to India."

R.S.

II. Literary Trends

Varied though they are, the selections in this chapter are alike in being works intended to persuade. The appeals made during the bitter controversy about slavery and kindred matters.

and during the consequent war, urged moderation or fierce opposition. And the poems of Walt Whitman, though they did not deal with slavery, eloquently preached the poet's doctrines about the individual and society. It was only natural that all such writings, since they were meant to influence opinions and beliefs, not only conformed to ways of thinking and feeling then current, but also took forms particularly likely to appeal to the tastes of the day. Some of the authors, nevertheless, created literature which was to have other than historical interest long after the controversy had ended.

Works dealing with the slavery controversy, naturally, were quite likely to reflect the spirit of the times by being intemperate. Objective historians have, of course, made clear that neither side was blameless—that neither North nor South had a monopoly upon virtue. As was all too human, the people on each side felt that they were wholly right and their opponents wholly wrong. "Both [parties]," Lincoln observed in his Second Insugaral. "read the same Bible, and pray to the same God; and each invokes his aid against the other." Each party asked such aid with superb confidence that God and right were on its side and the forces of evil on the other. This belief often found expression in literary productions strongly tinged with melodrama—not only dramas but also speeches and poems—productions in which one group of characters was pictured as too villainous, another group too innocent, to remain quite believable to readers of later, less impassioned times. The acrimony and the anger which then seemed inevitable were eventually to appear extreme to readers far in time from the contest.

Modern readers are likely, also, to perceive a rather quaint quality in the two extremes of literary style which the taste of the day obviously approved. One extreme sort was literary, learned, allusive, usually solemn, often highly ornate and figurative. Such a style is represented in the passage in Grayson's The Hireling and the Slave which portrays child laborers in the North:

There, unconcerned, the philanthropic eye
Beholds each phase of human misery;
Sees the worn child compelled in mines to slave
Through narrow seams of coal, a living grave,
Driven from the breezy hill, the sunny glade,
By ruthless hearts, the drudge of labor made,
Unknown the boyish sport, the hours of play,
Stripped of the common boon, the light of day,
Harnessed like brutes, like brutes to tug, and strain,
And drag, on hands and knees, the loaded wain

Such ink-stained phrases as "the philanthropic eye," "the breezy hill, the sunny glade," "unknown the boyish sport," "the common boon," and "the loaded wain" give the verse a tone which would be disastrous to a poem written to sway readers today. At the other extreme was a vernacular style, unlearned, earthy, humorous, homely in any figures of speech which it happened to employ. This style is represented by a passage expressing ideas somewhat similar to those of Grayson—the comment of W. T. Thompson's homespun character, Major Jones (see p. 324), upon the sad plight of the charwomen of Philadelphia:

The servant galls was scrubbin the doresteps of the houses and washin off the pavements in front of 'em I looked at 'em as I rode along in the hack, and I couldn't help feelin sorry to see such butiful, rosycheeked white galls, down in the dirt and slop in the streets, doin work that is only fit for niggers. They say here they aint nothin but slewers—but I seed sum that I would tuck for respectable white galls if I had seed 'em in Georgia.

Here, in a style which was the Southern counterpart of Hosea Biglow's Yankee versifying, the author used ungrammatical phrases, misspellings, and words which, if they were found in argumentative writings today, would prejudice many against the author. Many of the works of the period just before and during the war, modern readers may feel, went too far—in passages or in wholes—in the direction of highfalutin language or of the vulgar language of democracy. We of the present period tend to prefer writings which, like those of Emerson and Thoreau—or of Lincoln—avoided both extremes.

Whether moderns like the two styles or not, they should have little trouble understanding the attitudes to which the two ways of writing appealed—attitudes which have coexisted for a long time. One attitude was that bookish learning provided the best clues to truth and virtue; the other was that experience and common sense taught men best what was true and virtuous. As far back as the 1720's and 1730's, the two kinds of appeal had been illustrated by Cotton Mather and Benjamin Franklin. The ideal author, Mather said, "could not have writ as he does if he had not read very much in his time." "And his composures," Mather went on, "are not only a cloth of gold but stuck with as many jewels as the gown of a Russian ambassador." Franklin's Widow Silence Dogood and Poor Richard, by contrast, depended upon the teachings of experience rather than the teachings of books, and tended to use the simple language of farm folk and mechanics. Later, the Jeffersonian aristocrat and the Jacksonian common man provided a similar contrast. In recent times, the opposing attitudes have again been exemplified—on the one hand by "brain trusters" and theorists in government, and on the other by "practical" men who have been chiefly schooled by experience. The contrasting styles, in other words, dramatically represent two continuous American attitudes.

ORATORY

The chief instrument for dispute in the period, by general agreement at the time, was oratory. Rightly or wrongly, it was still assumed that nothing so swayed public opinion as speeches. The function now jointly performed by books, the newspapers, moving pictures, and the radio was then chiefly performed by speakers addressing public meetings or legislative bodies.

To be sure, all oratory—even the best—is likely to lose much of its force when, instead of being spoken, it is translated into print. The excitement of the occasion and the reactions of the audience are lost, as are any impressions made by the physical appearance of the speaker and by the sound of his voice. Those who saw massive, dark-browed Daniel Webster (p. 48) and heard his thunderous voice always were tremendously impressed (there was a saying that no human being was ever really so great as Webster appeared to be), and all who wrote of him in retrospect were sure that his great presence had much to do with his forensic power. Similarly, speeches delivered by even lesser men lost much of their power when they became printed instead of uttered words.

But modern readers find that there are barriers above and beyond the usual ones to appreciation of the oratory of the mid-century. The most formidable barrier is the style—or rather styles—of spoken discourse. In this field of literature, as in others, there were at the time two extremes. One was discoverable in the talks of local politicians delivered to neighbors and, at times, in the speeches of national figures. This extreme was parodied in an unsigned skit which went the rounds of the newspapers in the 1840's; it purported to be a speech of Candidate Earth, who wanted his backwoods neighbors to elect him sheriff. Said he:

Now, gentlemen, don't you think they ought to make me sheriff? I say, if Bob Black has floated farther on a log, killed more Injuns, or stayed longer under water than I have, elect him; if not, I say what has he done to qualify him for the office of sheriff? Did any of you ever know him to call for a quart? I never did; I have known him to call for several half-pints in the course of a day, but I never did know him to step forward manfully and say, "Give us a quart of your best." Then I say again, what has Bob Black done to qualify him for sheriff?

In similar (though probably even less literate) language, Davy Crockett and other backwoods candidates regularly appealed for votes. And the very simplicity of the diction, its very freedom from adornment, recommended the speakers to constituents who believed they prized horse sense above "book larnin'." The other extreme was represented not only in the orations of men still remembered for their eloquence—Daniel Webster, Wendell Phillips, Henry Clay—but also of a number who have been pretty well forgotten: John Randolph, George McDuffie, Seargent S. Prentiss, William C. Preston, Thomas Corwin, and others. Often the style used by these men was to the style of Candidate Earth as the style of Grayson was to that of Major Jones.

At the time, even when their words were not heard but read, these orators were extraordinarily effective. Time after time, they moved audiences to scornful laughter, to tears, to cheers, and constantly they molded public opinion both in the centers of learning and in the backwoods territory of Candidate Earth. (Whether they admitted it or not, backwoods folk were awed by learning.) The usually calm Professor George Ticknor of Harvard supplied an instance when, the evening after he had heard a speech by Webster, he wrote an account of his reactions in a letter: "Three or four times I thought my temples would burst with the gush of blood When I came out I was almost afraid to come near him [Webster]. It seemed to me as if he was like the mount that might not be touched and that burned with fire. I was beside myself, and am so still." The implication was that Webster was inspired as he spoke, and the scholar was, therefore, awed by the almost super-human result. As one reads other comments upon orations of the period, one sees that this picture of the transported speaker and awestruck listeners is quite common.

Eloquence, many believed, was essentially like poetry. Irresistibly it mastered the speaker. "True eloquence," said Webster in 1826, in his speech on Adams and Jefferson, "comes, if it come at all, like the outbreaking of a fountain from the earth, or the bursting forth of volcanic fires, with spontaneous, original, native force." And the inspiration which so mastered the speaker communicated itself to the audience. "By eloquence," said Bryant in his Lectures on Poetr;—also in 1826, "I understand those appeals to our moral perceptions that produce emotion as soon as they are uttered. It is in these that the orator is himself affected with the feelings he would communicate, that his eyes glisten, and his frame seems to dilate, and his voice acquires an unwonted melody, and his sentences arrange themselves into a sort of measure and harmony, and the listener is chained in involuntary and breathless attention."

Some of the most admired passages in the oratory of the day, in consequence, were remarkably figurative and rhythmic—poetic prose of a fairly deep purple hue. Particularly admired, for instance, was the conclusion of Webster's most celebrated speech in the Senate, the "Reply to Hayne" of 1830:

When my eyes shall be turned to behold for the last time the sun in heaven, may I not see him shining on the broken and dishonored fragments of a once glorious Union; on States dissevered, discordant, belligerent; on a land rent with civil feuds, or drenched, it may be, in fraternal blood! Let their last feeble and lingering glance rather behold the gorgeous ensign of the republic, now known and honored throughout the earth, still full high advanced, its arms and trophies streaming in their original lustre, not a stripe erased or polluted, nor a single star obscured, bearing for its motto, no such miserable interrogatory as "What is all this worth?" nor those other words of delusion and folly, "Liberty first and Union afterwards"; but everywhere, spread all over it in characters of living light, blazing on all its ample folds, as they float over the sea and the land, and in every wind under the whole heavens, that other sentiment, dear to every true American heart,—Liberty and Union, now and for ever, one and inseparable!

Customarily many who commended the great oratory of the day cited this passage or similar ones. Our appreciation for such flights is tepid. The reason, of course, is that there has been a change in taste during the last century.

In the years before the Civil War, there were already some portents of the change in taste which eventually was to take place. In 1857, Edward G. Parker, in his book The Golden Age of American Oratory, indicated that the age which he had in mind was then, after exactly a hundred years, about to end. He saw two reasons for its conclusion. First, what he called "the age of chivalry" was closing and, said he, "A brazen age, anti-sentimental, succeeds; an age when sordid, calculating interest rather than conscious merit dares to run after reason." Secondly, "the growing taste of our people for reading" was bringing into prominence a new kind of persuasive composition—"accurate rhetorical composition, rather than the dashing vigor and vivacious sparkle of spontaneous oratory."

Whether for the reasons he suggested or not, Parker's prophecy about the changes in American taste was, in general, to come true. Even as he wrote, some at least had begun to lose their liking for what Parker characterized as "the oratory of America . . . bursting from the lips of Prophets" and to prefer, as he feared they might, "the less contagious influences of logic, and figures and facts." The addresses of Calhoun and of Webster included in this chapter (pp. 38, 49) were delivered in 1850 and represent, in style, the transitional period.

By 1850, Webster had developed what students of his work call his "mature style"—a style which, compared with his earliest efforts, had greatly gained in simplicity. Edwin P. Whipple, in "Daniel Webster as a Master of English Style" (1879), wrote: "The mature style of Webster is perfect of its kind, being in words the express image of his mind and character,—plain, terse, clear, forcible; and rising to the level of lucid statement and argument into passages of superlative eloquence only when his whole nature is stirred by some grand sentiment. . . ." Modern readers, of course, will shy away from the passages of "superlative eloquence" which Whipple obviously admired. But they will be pleased to find that Webster does not indulge in such eloquence too often and that the bulk of his oratory is concerned with expressing thoughts clearly. They will be pleased to find that most of the speech of March 7, 1850, is devoted to Webster's version of history, to arguments justifying his attitude, set forth massively to be sure, but for the most part somewhat simply and somewhat moderately—at least for the times—and that the address is excellently organized. Only when they reach the most famous passage in the speech—that on "peaceable secession" (p. 67)—will they be very painfully aware of Webster's eminence in the florid school of oratory. John C. Calhoun (p. 37), generally ranked below Webster at the time, may be preferred by readers today. The reason was suggested by a comment made upon his style by a critic of oratory in 1849. "Mr. Calhoun," E. L. Magoon wrote in Living Orators in America, "flaunts in no gaudy rhetorical robes of scarlet and gold, but comes into the forum clothed in the simplest garb, with firm hands grasping the reins of fancy, and intent only on giving a reason for the faith that is in him." Readers today will admire the relatively simple dress and the tight grip upon the reins, will find Calhoun's logic and his clarity admirable.

LINCOLN

Although modern readers can endure the reading of Webster and Calhoun, they will probably find more moving the one speaker of the Golden Age of Oratory who, by general consent, has become a classic author—Abraham Lincoln. At least four of Lincoln's speeches—Farewell to Springfield. First Inaugural. Gettysburg Address, and Second Inaugural Address (see pp. 138-148)—whether one agrees or disagrees with their interpretation of history, were great utterances. Even though they are set down in print and read years after their delivery, these works have the stamp of great literature upon them.

A student of Lincoln's collected speeches will find that a surprising amount of his work is not slightly below but far below these masterpieces in excellence. His first speech, delivered in 1832 when, as a gangling, ill-dressed youth of twenty-three, he was running for the state legislature, went this way:

I presume you-all know who I am. I am humble Abe Lincoln. I have been solicited by many friends to become a candidate for the legislature. My politics are short and sweet like the old woman's dance. I am in favor of a national bank. I am in favor of the internal improvements system, and a high protective tariff. These are my sentiments and political principles. If elected I shall be thankful. If not it will be all the same.

The speech, to be sure, is somewhat better than that of Candidate Earth, but clearly its eloquence is in a similar style. And many of Lincoln's later speeches, among them the historic debates with Douglas, now appear to have little more than a certain homespun straightforwardness, well adapted to public debate, to recommend them. At times, by contrast, especially during his early career, Lincoln indulged in spread-eagle melodramatic oratory as tawdry as any produced at the time. There was, for instance, a campaign speech of 1840, in which he said:

I know that the great volcano at Washington, aroused and directed by the spirit that reigns there, is belching forth the lava of political corruption in a current broad and deep, which is sweeping with frightful velocity over the whole length and breadth of the land, bidding fair to leave unscathed no green spot or living thing; while on its bosom are riding, like demons on the wave of hell, the imps of the evil spirit, and fiendishly taunting all who dare to resist its destroying course with the hopelessness of their efforts; and knowing this, I cannot deny that all may be swept away. Broken by it, I, too, may be; bow to it, I never will. The probability that we may fall in the struggle ought not to deter us from the support of a cause we believe to be just. It shall not deter me. If ever I feel the soul within me elevate and expand to those dimensions not wholly unworthy of its Almighty Architect, it is when I contemplate the cause of my country, deserted by all the world beside, and I standing up boldly alone, hurling defiance at her victorious oppressors.

Clearly the figurative language here used was meant to appeal to the current taste for purple passages. But Lincoln did manage, at least in his later years, to achieve greatness as a composer of speeches. Many of his contemporaries did not particularly appreciate him. At the Gettysburg dedication, the speech generally admired was not Lincoln's but a two-hour showpiece, orotund, florid, full of allusions to ancient history, which was intoned by Edward Everett. The day after the dedication, November 20, 1863, many newspapers enthusiastically praised Everett's oration, but not until February 1865 did any commentator note, in print, that Lincoln's short speech had been a great utterance—and that commentator was an Englishman.

Just why Lincoln managed to steer away as he did from both the crude utterances of a small-town politician and the fustian elegance of the popular orator is something of a problem. The very fact that he, unlike many of the leaders of the day, was self-schooled probably was important. While others among his contemporaries had studied the classical rules and examples of oratory in college, Lincoln had learned his art chiefly in frontier political debates and in clashes in law courts. Because he relied upon the teachings of experience, he shared the democratic belief in common sense and its direct expression, and that fact, too, was significant. Literary influences upon Lincoln, nevertheless, were important, and fortunately some of the most notable were those of authors who achieved forceful expression by means of simplicity and restraint—Robert Burns, William Shakespeare, and the translators of the Bible into the King James version. Finally, Lincoln's own character and feeling as 'hey developed during the trying years of his Presidency were powerfully influential upon his thought and the form of its expression. As Edward Dewitt Jones remarks, somewhat flossily, in his study of orators, Lords of Speech, "The graces of an orator's presence, the charm of his voice and manner, ar ephemeral; while the grandeur of his thoughts, the magnanimity of his soul and the soundner of his reasoning live after him. It is the substance of his speeches, together with the chast beauty of a style which matches the sheer beauty of his spirit, that lifts Abraham Lincoln int the small and elect company of the world's supreme masters of public speech." Lincoln, despit the intemperance of the times in which he lived, was a temperate man, and he was an extremel sincere man. He was also something of a poet. His utterances, therefore, could outlast both the crude mouthings of the folksy politicians and the highly ornate orations of less temperate less sincere, and less poetic speakers.

TWO STYLES in the DRAMA

In drama as in oratory there were, between 1829 and 1865, two styles—the romantic literary style and the realistic vernacular style. These were utilized to portray characters to whom they were appropriate in dramas of two sorts—poetic plays usually of foreign scenes and of past times and comedies of native American types. In some plays, Uncle Tom's Cabin for instance, the two styles and the two types of character were brought together.

A famous actor, Edwin Forrest (1806-1872), was active in stimulating authors to product some of the most notable romantic plays of the period. After making his debut at fourteen ir the Chestnut Street Theater of Philadelphia, his home city, Forrest served an apprenticeship in frontier theaters. Upon returning to the East, he was sensationally successful. He was a great figure of a man with a voice of extraordinary melody and volume, whose style of delivery reflected that of such impassioned orators as Clay and Webster. His favorite rôles were those of intense characters who, every few scenes, gave thunderous utterance to passionate feelings.

Forrest offered prizes and other inducements to native playwrights in order to secure dramas suitable for his robust acting. In 1829, for example, he awarded a prize to John Augustus Stone (1800-1834) for a drama entitled Metamora, or the Last of the Wampanoags. The part of an Indian chief in this drama gave Forrest such fine chances to rant and swagger about the stage that he continued to play it, at intervals, to the end of his long career. Equally successful was one of several plays written for the actor by Robert Montgomery Bird (1806-1854), a Philadelphia doctor who had turned to writing. The Gladiator (1831) was based upon Plutarch; in unfolding the story of the insurrection of the gladiators, it provided Forrest, in the rôle of Spartacus, their leader, with several excellent scenes and many sonorous blank verse lines. The close of Act II, one of several climaxes in the play, invariably brought the house to its feet wildly cheering. When Spartacus found that his opponent in the arena was his own brother, he stood, stripped to the waist, his deep chest heaving, and issued the call to rebellion in these words:

Death to the Roman fiends, that make their mirth

Out of the groans of bleeding misery!

Ho, slaves, arise! it is your hour to kill!

Kill and spare not—for wrath and liberty!

Freedom for bondsmen—freedom and revenge!

The Gladiator was given hundreds of successful performances. This play and Metamora were typical of many written for other actors as well as for Forrest. Dramatic scenes and poetic lines combined to tell romantic stories of distant lands or of the America of the past. Robert T. Conrad's Jack Cade, the Captain of the Commons (1835), N. P. Willis' Bianca Visconti (1837) and Tortesa the Usurer (1839), Epes Sargent's Velasco (1837), and George H. Miles' Mohammed (1850) were some with foreign settings. Charlotte Barnes Conner, The Indian Princess (1830), Cornelius Mathews, Witchcraft, or the Martyrs of Salem (1846), George H. Miles, Hernando de Soto (1852), and Oliver Bell Bunce, Love in '76 (1857) offer a sampling of many dealing poetically with American history. The best among all plays of both sorts, by general consent, was Francesca da Rimini (1855) by George Henry Boker (1823-1890), a play which has been successfully revived several times. Like other dramas of the era, this transports its audience to a distant time and place; it tells a romantic story—the medieval tale of Paolo and Francesca—in five acts, numerous scenes, and blank verse, a form modeled after Elizabethan dramas. Boker's ability for characterization and his real talent as a poet made this play outstanding, but inevitably it suffers when compared with the great British dramas.

Crude by comparison but nevertheless more instinct with the life and spirit of our country were a vast number of plays of a quite different sort which were being produced during the period—plays which appealed to audiences because, instead of poetically portraying the past, they realistically set before the public recognizable native types. Some, continuing the tradition of The Contrast (1787), made capital of the stage Yankee; some represented frontiersmen; some portrayed still other types. Yankees such as Lot Sap Sago in Yankee Land (1834) by Cornelius A. Logan, Solon Shingle in The People's Lawyer (1839) by Joseph Stevens Jones, and Calvin Cartwheel in The Brazen Drum (1841) by Silas S. Steele, played by character actors, delighted thousands of playgoers. Frontier characters who were similarly prominent were rather infrequent, but one such figure who made a hit was boastful Nimrod Wildfire, a backwoodsman patently modeled after Davy Crockett (see p. 318), in J. K. Paulding's The Lion of the West (1831).

Beginning in the 1840's the city as well as the farm and the frontier was the source of numerous character representations on the stage. The political connivers of New York were comically drawn in The Politicians, by Cornelius Mathews, in 1840; those of the capital city in Fashions and Follies of Washington Life, by Henry Clay Preuss, in 1857. A gallery of New York types was offered by an outstanding play comparable with The Contrast, Anna Cora Mowatt's Fashion, in 1845—the social climber, the coquette, the poet, and the important merchant. Probably the most popular (and often the crudest) dramas of city types were those in which a swashbuckling figure of the New York Bowery, the volunteer fireman, and his fellow Manhattanites appeared. Mose, as this comic figure was called, was a leading attraction in B. A. Baker's A Glance at New York (1848), W. B. Chapman's Mose in California (1849), and more than a dozen others. As Richard M. Dorson remarks in "Mose the Far-Famed and World-Renowned" (American Literature, November 1943), Mose was a "unique compound of East Side swell, gutter burn, and volunteer fire laddie," and his queer ways, queer talk, and heroic deeds caught the fancy not only of New Yorkers familiar with his living prototype but also of theatergoers in every part of the country.

Aiken's dramatization, Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852), undoubtedly was popular (and therefore important in the slavery controversy) because it combined so many details of plot and character found in both kinds of plays. Like Aiken, of course, other authors in this period saw no reason for separating the romantic characters and their flowery speeches from the earthy native types. As a result, just as racy "low" characters mingled with stiff heroes and heroines in the fiction of the time, numerous localized comedy figures often appeared on the same stage as did romantic heroes and heroines. Prominent in S. E. Glover's The Cradle of Liberty: or Boston in 1775, produced in 1832, is Yankee Seth Sage, whose nature and style of talk is suggested by his remark, "I calculate we shall give the reg'lars a considerable damned smart drubbing." Again, in J. G. Burnett's Blanche of Brandywine (1858), we encounter both heroic characters (including Generals Washington and Greene) and two native types. Seth Hope, a Yankee, and Krout, a Pennsylvania Dutchman. Several of the plays about Indians showed aborigines who indulged in highly poetic orations mingling with frontier character types whose talk was spiced with racy backwoods phrases. But Uncle Tom's Cabin goes about as far as a play could in alternating hilarious scenes with thrilling or pathetic ones and in drawing together ideal characters and a variety of realistic ones.

In Aiken's long-lived play, we have the type hero and heroine; we have also the saintly little Eva and the pious Uncle Tom. We have a bloodcurdling villain, Simon Legree, and a minor villain or two for good measure. There is, too, a varied collection of low comedy types—the frontiersman, the Yankee bumpkin (Gumption Cute), the Yankee spinster (Ophelia), and the Negro comic straight from the minstrel shows of the day (Topsy). Scenes are arranged so that audiences may indulge alternately in the two favorite pastimes of theatergoers in this country—laughing and weeping—time after time. The speeches in the play range between the realistic echoes of everyday speech and the grandiloquent orations of romanticized characters. Consider the extremes in style in two speeches of Act I. The first is a shout of the comic frontiersman, Phineas:

Halloa, thar! bring us a jug of whisky instantaneously, or expect to be teetotally chawed up! Squat yourself, stranger, and go in for enjoyment.

The second is a prayer and soliloquy uttered by Eliza as she prepares to make her hazardous journey across the ice-filled river.

Powers of mercy, protect me! How shall I escape these human blood-hounds? Ah! the window—the river of ice! That dark stream lies between me and liberty! Surely the ice will bear my trifling weight. It is my only chance of escape—better sink beneath the cold waters, with my child locked in my arms, than have him torn from me and sold into bondage. He sleeps upon my breast—Heaven, I put my trust in thee!

No better summary of the taste of the day could be found than Uncle Tom's Cabin, and no play of the past can teach us more about the sure-fire devices of melodrama which have to be modernized only slightly to enthrall moving-picture audiences in our own time.

POETRY

Two passages of verse by James Russell Lowell, one published in 1845, the other in 1846, show how one author active in this period could use both the high style and the low style of poetry in persuasive compositions. Lines in "The Present Crisis" (1845) read:

Slavery, the earth-born Cyclops, fellest of the giant brood,

Son of brutish Force and Darkness, who have drenched the earth with blood,

Famished in his self-made desert, blinded by our purer day,

Gropes in yet unblasted regions for his miserable prey;—

Shall we guide his gory fingers where our helpless children play? The first of the Biglow Papers, the next year, had this stanza:

Aint it cute to see a Yankee

Take sech everlastin' pains,

All to git the Devil's thankee

Helpin' on 'em weld their chains?

Wy, it's jest ez clear ez figgers,

Clear ez one an' one make two,

Chaps that make black slaves o' niggers ew other authors could switch at will, as their contemporary Lowell could, from one extreme style to the other, and in general the writers of the period tended toward one or the other the two styles of popular appeal.

Want to make wite slaves o' you.

Some of the popular songs show how both styles might be adapted to a single tune, John Brown's Body" and "The Battle Hymn of the Republic" (p. 134), for instance, as well as the two versions of "Dixie" (p. 132). Grayson and Timrod, although they heatedly disagreed bout the definition of poetry, both followed the literary rather than the illiterate tradition in terr verse. Grayson modeled his versification after what he called the "School of Dryden and ope," writing his most representative poetry in heroic couplets. "I have faith," he wrote in a unpublished "Autobiography," "in the ancient classical models, the masters directly or inrectly of all the great poets of modern times." Timrod, by contrast, frankly acknowledged debtedness to such authors as Milton, Wordsworth, and Tennyson. In some poems (see Charleston," p. 129, and "Ode," p. 131), he used the simple ballad stanza or a slight adaptant; in perhaps more ("Ethnogenesis" and "The Cotton Boll") he employed the irregular ode form which had been employed by Wordsworth and Tennyson with marked success. But Grayson, disciple of Neoclassical poets, and Timrod, disciple of nineteenth-century poets and the seventeenth-century poet, Milton, were alike in using diction of a highly literary nature.

Whittier tried at times to write formidably literary verse, and his use of dialect in poetry was infrequent. Nevertheless, at his most effective he was a writer of songs which were relatively simple—almost in the manner of folk songs—both in metrical form and in the kind of words used. The Quaker poet's country rearing, his brief schooling, and his particular admiration for the artless songs of Robert Burns all led him to write unpretentious poems. Never, it appears, did he give much consideration to matters of technique. His aim, as he stated it, was

To paint, forgetful of the tricks of art,

With pencil dipped alone in colors of the heart.

As a rule, therefore, no sign appeared of his striving for novelty of effect. All his life, his favorite measures were ballad measure, octosyllabics, and iambic pentameter—quite conventional forms of verse, and he used a vocabulary and figures of speech which were far from complex. His were "journalistic" poems which, because of their almost rustic directness and simplicity, appealed greatly to many untutored readers.

Whittier's songs resemble most other poems of the period, both literary and unliterary, proslavery and antislavery, in their depiction of the friends and the foes of the poet. Sure that his Quaker inner light had shown him what attitudes to take, Whittier conceived of the abolitionists as engaged in a "moral warfare," girded "in God's own might" and "in conflict with unholy powers," and he constantly pictured the struggle in such terms. Vouchsafed similar visions, as they believed, other poets on both sides were similarly intemperate. The author of a famous version of "Dixie" urged Southerners to battle "Till the spoilers are defeated,/Till the Lord's work is completed." Julia Ward Howe saw the Northern army clothed righteousness and proclaimed that "God was marching on." Timrod saw the enemy as ne Goth," and confidently expected the Lord to release the Confederacy from "the great rthen of our country's wrong." For both North and South, it was as clear-cut as that. ch were the signs of bitter partisanship in many melodramatic poems.

ALT WHITMAN, WAR-BORN POET

though, like other poets, he was a controversialist, Walt Whitman made no contribution orth noting to the argument about slavery. His poems about the Civil War are concerned with experiences and the sufferings shared by men and women of both sides. However, Whitman and himself as a poet in the years when the nation was deeply engaged in the controversy out slavery, and he himself saw his own wartime experiences as the "final reasons-for-being" his mature songs. Hence, despite the fact that he lived on and wrote on for many years er Appomattox, Whitman was in a very real sense a war-born poet. His poetry, though it med strange to readers when it first appeared, was, we now can see, molded by the erature being produced at the time he began to write. For instance, Emerson's poetry obously left its mark. Perhaps even more important, the oratory and the styles of the 1840's 1850's left their imprint upon the form of Whitman's poetry.

Whitman was like the orators of the day in that he wanted to preach to men the ways righteous thinking and living. In notebooks which he filled when he was working toward writing of Leaves of Grass, he voiced his determination to "elevate, enlarge, purify, deepen I make happy the attributes of the body and soul of man." Furthermore, as he considered whe would deliver this message to his countrymen, evidently he was not sure, for some ie, whether his medium was to be oratory or poetry. His considering oratory was hardly prising, since the accepted medium for social or religious preachments was the oration or sermon, and he was fascinated all his life by public speaking and public speakers. Possibly inability to succeed as an orator was an important factor leading to his final decision to become a poet. In his early New York days, so he said, Whitman "haunted the courts to witness notable trials, and . . . heard all the famous actors and actresses." Over the years, he listened to Webster, Garrison, Beecher, Clay, Everett, and Phillips, as well as less famous orators. His "Poem of Joys" contains an interesting description of the great speaker swaying his audience:

O the orator's joys!

To inflate the chest—to roll the thunder of the voice out from the ribs and throat,

To make the people rage, weep, hate, desire, with yourself,

To lead America—to quell America with a great tongue.

He enjoyed the declamatory interpretations of Shakespeare by Booth and Forrest which were then fashionable, and he himself loved to intone sonorous lines from the dramas while riding Broadway omnibuses, tramping with friends, and strolling by the seashore. He knew and greatly admired, too, literature which approximated the oratorical effect he wanted—the lecture-essays of Emerson, the songs of Ossian, translations of Greek and Latin dramas and epics, the exhortatory parts of the Bible, and their adaptations and paraphrases in sermons.

In the notes that Whitman wrote for his early works, there were passages which might have done for either lectures or poems. One scrap of paper bears the caption "Poem—Religious," and then, underneath this title is written "or lecture on Religion", and one note, though it was headed "lecture," eventually was utilized as part of a poem. As a reciter of his own poetry, he attempted (though unfortunately with questionable success) to use the resonant tones, the modulations, the gesticulations of an old-school public speaker. As late as 1888, in his final Preface, he spoke of his art as a "new and national declamatory expression." There can be little question that the methods of oratory were important in shaping Whitman's style. In a note on "style" for his projected lectures he wrote: "besides direct addressing to You another leading trait of Lectures may well be—strong assertion—('I say') it is so?)—launched out with fire, or emphasis, or enthusiasm, or anger." This oratorical device occurs frequently in the poems, as in the line, "And I say to any man or woman, Let your soul stand cool and composed before a million universes." Other oratorical devices which are used time after time include apostrophes, rhetorical questions, aphorisms, exclamations, alliterative phrases, and parenthetical asides. Often the phrasal order is that of oratory—lines which loosely balance on both sides of a pause, or series of parallel structures all of which contribute to a periodic sentence. (See, for example, the opening stanza of "Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking," p. 202.) Such devices, in Whitman's poems, pretty regularly perform functions of rhymes and stanzas in more conventional poems: they hold lines together and set off units of thought.

The scheme of Leaves of Grass as a whole and the schemes of individual poems, moreover, have noteworthy resemblances to oratory. Whitman evidently hoped that the impact of the book would be comparable to that of the dynamic presence of a great orator—that it would, as he said, "possess, more than any other known book, the magnetism of living flesh and blood, sitting near the reader, & looking & talking." Like the collected works of a great orator, it would convey, in addition to the personality of the speaker, his gospel, developed and modulated in a number of individual compositions on varied topics. There is evidence, in the whole book, that Whitman attempted to unfold his beliefs in this fashion. In quite a few of the poems, too, there are organizations typically used by orators as well as by some poets—ideas developed by analogy, by passages of narrative, by comparison and contrast, and quite a number which are developed in the style of Emerson's lectures and poems.

But although eventually Whitman's poems, in their form, thus resembled oratory, even as he conceived of them they differed from oratory. In one of his self-criticisms the poet found fault with his method of composing and delivering lectures. "The trouble," he said, "is often the endeavor (from the habit of forming the rhythmic style of Leaves of Grass) involuntarily to preserve a sort of rhythm in the Lecture sentences,—It seems to me this rhythm, for them, is not only not necessary, but is often dangerous to their character-requirements—which, for speaking purposes, need to be abrupt. . . ." Whitman conceived of his free verse poems as "chants," more rhythmical than spoken discourses and corresponding, in some ways, to the arias or recitatives of operas. Toward his free verse, after starting as a quite conventional poet, he worked his way slowly. According to Emory Holloway, in his Introduction to The Uncollected Prose and Poetry of Walt Whitman, "he began versifying with the simplest of forms . . . then made use of more difficult stanza forms . . . ; next he wrote a little blank verse . . . ; then he made private experiments with some of the very material he was to work over, through several years, for the 1855 edition of Leaves of Grass. . . . " When this first edition appeared, concludes Holloway, his verse was disciplined, "poise and sweeping rhythm were added, and a standard of line length was adopted which would fit the bold but delicate burden of his song." What he evolved was a form blending prose and poetry, which carried still further liberating tendencies in poetry which had been initiated by a number of his predecessors including, notably, Emerson and Thoreau. His lines, characteristically, corresponded to the grammatical-phrasings or at least the thought-phrasings of speech. His rhythms were, as he put it, "in a loose and free metre of his own, of an irregular length of lines, apparently lawless at first perusal, although on closer examination a certain regularity appears, like the recurrence of lesser and larger waves on the sea-shore, rolling in without intermission, and fitfully rising and falling." And he found, as later poets were to find, that patterns of repeated vowel and consonant sounds could do much to unify parts and wholes.

Whitman not only broke away from some of the conventions of versification; he also broke away from some of the conventions of style. He was distressed by "stock poetical touches" and by ornamentation as such in poetry. "No ornaments," he sternly enjoined himself, "especially no ornamental adjectives, unless they have come molten hot, and imperiously prove themselves. No ornamental similes at all—not one: perfect transparent clearness. . . ." His dislike for what he called "drawing room poetry" led him, in general, to use relatively simple words and to avoid an excess of figurative language. His feelings about common speech led him to interject it into a style not then thought hospitable to it. Most orators who employed the more literary style, as we have seen, tended to disdain the use of words in the vernacular. Whitman, however, from the early days of his career, appreciated the force of humble speech, and praised such speech for growing out of human life. In his youth, he was an avid searcher after colloquial and slang phrases with life to them, and his early prose is dotted with expressions such as "loaded down to the guards," "they do say," "some pumpkins," and "a great place and no mistake." "Slang," he wrote, "profoundly consider'd, is the lawless germinal element, below all words and sentences, and behind all poetry, and proves a certain perennial rankness and protestantism in speech . . . an attempt of common humanity to escape from bald literalism, and express itself illimitably, which in highest walks produces poets and poems." He reveled in nicknames for men of different states (Kentucky Corn Crackers, Michigan Wolverines, Connecticut Wooden Nutmegs, etc.); in original place-names (Hog-eve, Lickskillet, Rake-pocket, and Steal-easy, Texas, for instance); in the racy and imaginative phrases of bus drivers, laborers, railroad men, and boatmen. The result was that with the rolling periods and some of the more elegant diction characteristic of oratory, Whitman intermingled localisms, bits of slang, common talk. In Section 6 of "Song of Myself" (p. 162), for instance, along with sonorous and dignified lines comparable to those of oratory, occur lines like these:

> Or I guess it [the grass] is the handkerchief of the Lord, A scented gift and remembrancer designedly dropt....

Kanuck, Tuckahoe, Congressman, Cuff. . . .

* * *

And now it seems to me the beautiful uncut hair of graves.

* * *

The smallest sprout shows there is really no death. . . .

To mingle such homely phrasings, as Whitman typically did, with the highfalutin style of heightened oratory represented a daring experiment.

These details about the form of Whitman's poetry suggest that in several ways he was a culmination of some important literary tendencies of his period. They may perhaps do more—suggest to modern readers ways of approach to him. They imply that he should be read differently from most poets—as a man with a message, as a chanting orator, as an experimenter with a form which blends poetry with prose and mingles the words of everyday talk with those of more formal literature. He should be read not only as a wartime poet of the past but also as a pioneer breaking a trail toward modern poetic achievements. W.B.

A HOUSE DIVIDED: Calhoun, Webster, Whittier, Aiken, Grayson, Timrod, Civil War Songs, Lincoln

John C. Calhoun

John C Calhoun was born in South Carolina and educated at Yale His was a distinguished career in public life He was a member of the House of Representatives (1811-1817), secretary of war (1817-1825), vice-president (1825-1832), senator from South Carolina (1833-1844), secretary of state (1844-1845), and again senator until his death in 1850. The chief opponent of the centralization of power in the federal government and the chief advocate of the sovereignty of the individual state under the constitution, Calhoun, for more than wenty years, fought a brilliant but losing fight against what seems now to have been an inevitable course of events. As early as 1828, when South Carolina rebelled igainst a tariff measure designed to protect Northern nanufacturers, Calhoun advanced in the famous "South Carolina Exposition" his doctrine of nullification, the right of the individual state to veto an act of the federal government. When slavery supplanted the tariff as the main question of controversy, he sought to protect Southern interests by opposing the principle of majority rule (the population of the North greatly exceeded that of the South) and by developing his doctrine of "concurrent majority". "the concurring assent of all the great and distinct interests of the community to the measures of the Government" Without such "concurring assent," he argued, there could be no check upon the tyranny of the numerical majority.

Panel (I to r.) Plantation life • Senate debate on the slavery question • In the cotton fields

Calhoun deserves a place in the history of American literature not only for his contribution to political thought but also for the literary merits of his writings. He developed his subject systematically, with perfect clarity and inexorable logic. His style, when compared with Webster's for example, is plain, straightforward, unencumbered by poetic embellishment or rhetorical flourish

Speech on the Slavery Question Delivered in the Senate, March 4, 1850

The controversy over slavery had been made acute again by the question whether slavery should be permitted in the new territories acquired as a result of the Mexican War Calhoun's speech, which he was too ill to deliver and which was read by Senator Mason of Virginia, came in the course of the debate on Clay's compromise proposals Webster replied three days later with his "Seventh of March Speech" (p. 49) The Compromise of 1850, as finally adopted, included the following measures: the admission of California as a free state, the organization of New Mexico and Utah as territories with the provision that the territories themselves, when ready for statehood, should decide the question of slavery, and the Fugitive Slave Law, which provided that slaves who escaped to the North should be compelled to return to their owners

Calhoun's discourse is a comprehensive survey, from a Southern point of view, of developments leading up to 1850, and was designed to show that the compromise measures of Clay did not meet the radical demands of the crisis

I have, Senators, believed from the first that the agitation of the subject of slavery would, if not prevented by some timely and effective measure, end in disunion. Entertaining this opinion, I have, on all proper occasions, endeavored to call the attention of both the two great parties which divide the country to adopt some measure to prevent so great a disaster, but without success. The agriation has been permitted to proceed with almost no attempt to resist it, until it has reached a point when it can no longer be disguised or denied that the Union is in danger. You have thus had forced upon you the greatest and the gravest question that can ever come under your consideration—How can the Union be preserved?

To give a satisfactory answer to this mighty question, it is indispensable to have an accurate and thorough knowledge of the nature and the character of the cause by which the Union is endangered. Without such knowledge it is impossible to pronounce, with any certainty, by what measure it can be saved, just as it would be impossible for a physician to pronounce, in the case of some dangerous disease, with any certainty, by what remedy the patient could be saved, without similar knowledge of the nature and character of the cause which produced it. The first question then, presented for consideration, in the investigation I propose to make in order to obtain such knowledge, is—What is it that has endangered the Union?

To this question there can be but one answer,—that the immediate cause is the almost universal discontent 3 which pervades all the States composing the Southern section of the Union. This widely-extended discontent is not of recent origin. It commenced with the agitation of the slavery question, and has been increasing ever since. The next question, going one step further back, is—What has caused this widely diffused and almost universal discontent?

It is a great mistake to suppose, as is by some, that it originated with demagogues, who excited the discontent with the intention of aiding their personal advancement, or with the disappointed ambition of certain politicians, who resorted to it as the means of retrieving their fortunes. On the contrary, all the great political influences of the section were arrayed against excitement and exerted to the utmost to keep the people quiet. The great mass of the people of the South were divided, as in the other section, into Whigs and Democrats. The leaders and the presses of both parties in the South were very solicitous to prevent excitement and to preserve quiet, because it was seen that the effects of the former would necessarily tend to weaken, if not destroy, the political ties which united them with their respective parties in the other section. Those who know the strength of party ties will readily appreciate the immense force which this cause exerted against agitation, and in favor of preserving quiet. But, great as it was, it was not sufficient to prevent the widespread discontent which now pervades the section. No, some cause, far deeper and more powerful than the one supposed, must exist, to account for discontent so wide and deep. The question then recurs-What is the cause of this discontent? It will be found in the belief of the people of the Southern States, as prevalent as the discontent itself, that they cannot remain, as things now are, consistently with honor and safety, in the Union. The next question to be considered, is-What has caused this belief?

One of the causes is, undoubtedly, to be traced to the long-continued agriation of the slave question on the part of the North and the many aggressions which they have made on the rights of the South during the time I will not enumerate them at present, as it will be done hereafter in its proper place.

There is another lying back of it-with which this is intimately connected—that may be regarded as the great and primary cause. This is to be found in the fact that the equilibrium between the two sections, in the Government as it stood when the constitution was ratified and the Government put in action, has been destroyed At that time there was nearly a perfect equilibrium between the two, which afforded ample means to each to protect itself against the aggression of the other, but, as it now stands, one section has the exclusive power of controlling the Government, which leaves the other without any adequate means of protecting itself against its encroachment and oppression. To place this subject distinctly before you, I have, Senators, prepared a brief statistical statement, showing the relative weight of the two sections in the Government under the first census of 1790 and the last census of 1840

According to the former, the population of the United States, including Vermont, Kentucky, and Tennessee, which then were in their incipient condition of becoming States, but were not actually admitted, amounted to 3,929,827. Of this number the Northern States had 50 1,997,899, and the Southern 1,952,072, making a difference of only 45,827 in favor of the former States. The number of States, including Vermont, Kentucky, and Tennessee, were sixteen, of which eight, including Vermont, belonged to the Northern section, and eight, including Kentucky and Tennessee, to the Southern .making an equal division of the States between the two sections under the first census. There was a small preponderance in the House of Representatives, and in the Electoral College, in favor of the Northern, owing to 60 the fact that, according to the provisions of the constitution, in estimating federal numbers five slaves count but three, but it was too small to affect sensibly the perfect equilibrium which, with that exception, existed at the time. Such was the equality of the two sections when the States composing them agreed to enter into a Federal Union Since then the equilibrium between them has been greatly disturbed

According to the last census the aggregate population of the United States amounted to 17,063,357, of which 70 the Northern section contained 9,728,920, and the Southern 7,334,437, making a difference, in round numbers, of 2,400,000 The number of States had increased from sixteen to twenty-six, making an addition of ten States In the mean time the position of Delaware had become doubtful as to which section she properly belonged Considering her as neutral, the Northern States will have thirteen and the Southern States twelve, making a difference in the Senate of two Senators in favor of the former According to the apportionment 80 under the census of 1840, there were two hundred and twenty-three members of the House of Representatives. of which the Northern States had one hundred and thirty-five, and the Southern States (considering Delaware as neutral) eighty-seven, making a difference in favor of the former in the House of Representatives of forty-eight. The difference in the Senate of two members, added to this, gives to the North in the electoral college, a majority of fifty Since the census of 1840. four States have been added to the Union-Iowa, Wis- 90 consin, Florida, and Texas They leave the difference in the Senate as it stood when the census was taken; but add two to the side of the North in the House, making the present majority in the House in its favor fifty, and in the electoral college fifty-two.

The result of the whole is to give the Northern section a predominance in every department of the Government, and thereby concentrate in it the two elements which constitute the Federal Government,—majority of States, and a majority of their population, estimated in federal numbers. Whatever section concentrates to the two in itself possesses the control of the entire Government.

But we are just at the close of the sixth decade, and the commencement of the seventh. The census is to be taken this year, which must add greatly to the decided preponderance of the North in the House of Representatives and in the electoral college. The prospect is, also, that a great increase will be added to its present preponderance in the Senate, during the period of the decade, by the addition of new States Two territories, Oregon 20 and Minnesota, are already in progress, and strenuous efforts are making to bring in three additional States from the territory recently conquered from Mexico, which, if successful, will add three other States in a short time to the Northern section, making five States, and increasing the present number of its States from fifteen to twenty, and of its Senators from thirty to forty On the contrary, there is not a single territory in progress in the Southern section, and no certainty that any additional States will be added to it during the decade. The 30 prospect then is, that the two sections in the Senate, should the efforts now made to exclude the South from the newly acquired territories succeed, will stand, before the end of the decade, twenty Northern States to fourteen Southern (considering Delaware as neutral), and forty Northern Senators to twenty-eight Southern. This great increase of Senators, added to the great increase of members of the House of Representatives and the electoral college on the part of the north, which must take place under the next decade, will effectively and ir-40 retrievably destroy the equilibrium which existed when the Government commenced

Had this destruction been the operation of time, without the interference of Government, the South would have had no reason to complain, but such was not the fact. It was caused by the legislation of this Government.

ment, which was appointed, as the common agent of all, and charged with the protection of the interests and security of all The legislation by which it has been effected, may be classed under three heads. The first, is that series of acts by which the South has been excluded 50 from the common territory belonging to all the States as members of the Federal Union-which have had the effect of extending vastly the portion allotted to the Northern section, and restricting within narrow limits the portion left the South The next consists in adopting a system of revenue and disbursements, by which an undue proportion of the burden of taxation has been imposed upon the South, and an undue proportion of its proceeds appropriated to the North; and the last is a system of political measures, by which the original 60 character of the Government has been radically changed I propose to bestow upon each of these, in the order they stand, a few remarks, with the view of showing that it is owing to the action of this Government that the equilibrium between the two sections has been destroyed and the whole powers of the system centered in a sectional majority

The first of the series of acts by which the South was deprived of its due share of the territories, originated with the confederacy which preceded the existence of 70 this Government It is to be found in the provision of the Ordinance of 1787 Its effect was to exclude the South entirely from that vast and fertile region which lies between the Ohio and the Mississippi rivers, now embracing five States and one territory. The next of the series is the Missouri compromise, which excluded the South from that large portion of Louisiana which lies north of 36° 30', excepting what is included in the State of Missouri The last of the series excluded the South from the whole of the Oregon Territory All a these, in the slang of the day, were what are called slave territories, and not free soil, that is, territories belonging to slaveholding powers and open to the emigration of masters with their slaves By these several acts, the South was excluded from 1,238,025 square miles-an extent of country considerably exceeding the entire valley of the Mississippi. To the South was left the portion of the Territory of Louisiana lying south of 36° 30', and the portion north of it included in the State of Missouri, with the portion lying south of 36° 30', including the States of Louisiana and Arkansas, and the territory lying west of the latter, and south of 36° 30'. called the Indian country These, with the Territory of Florida now the State, make, in the whole, 238,503 square miles. To this must be added the territory acquired with Texas If the whole should be added to the Southern section, it would make an increase of 325,520. which would make the whole left to the South, 609,023 But a large part of Texas is still in contest between the two sections, which leaves it uncertain what will be the real extent of the portion of territory that may be left to the South

I have not included the territory recently acquired by the treaty with Mexico The North is making the most strenuous efforts to appropriate the whole to herself, by excluding the South from every foot of it. If she should succeed, it will add to that from which the South has already been excluded, 526,078 square miles, and would increase the whole which the North has appropriated to herself, to 1,764 023, not including the portion that she may succeed in excluding us from in Texas To sum up the whole, the United States, since they declared their independence, have acquired 2,373,046 square miles of territory, from which the North will have excluded the South, if she should succeed in monopolizing the newly equired territories, about three-fourths of the whole, leaving to the South but about one-fourth

Such is the first and great cause that has destroyed he equilibrium between the two sections in the Jovernment

The next is the system of revenue and disbursements which has been adopted by the Government. It is well known that the Government has derived its revenue namly from duties on imports. I shall not undertake o show that such duties must necessarily fall mainly on he exporting States, and that the South, as the great exporting portion of the Union, has in reality paid astly more than her due proportion of the revenue, secause I deem it unnecessary, as the subject has on so nany occasions been fully discussed. Nor shall I, for hε same reason, undertake to show that a far greater portion of the revenue has been disbursed at the North, than its due share, and that the joint effect of these causes has been, to transfer a vast amount from South to North, which, under an equal system of revenue and disbursements, would not have been lost to her If to 50 this be added, that many of the duties were imposed. not for revenue, but for protection,—that is, intended to put money, not in the treasury, but directly into the pocket of the manufacturers,-some conception may be formed of the immense amount which, in the long course of sixty years, has been transferred from South to North There are no data by which it can be estimated with any certainty, but it is safe to say, that it amounts to hundreds of millions of dollars. Under the most moderate estimate, it would be sufficient to add greatly 60 to the wealth of the North, and thus greatly increase her population by attracting emigration from all quarters to that section

This, combined with the great primary cause, amply explains why the North has acquired a preponderance in every department of the Government by its disproportionate increase of population and States The former, as has been shown, has increased, in fifty years, 2,400,000 over that of the South. This increase of population, during so long a period, is satisfactorily ac- 70 counted for, by the number of emigrants, and the increase of their descendants, which have been attracted to the Northern section from Europe and the South, in consequence of the advantages derived from the causes assigned. If they had not existed-if the South had retained all the capital which has been extracted from her by the fiscal action of the Government, and, if it had not been excluded by the ordinance of 1787 and the Missouri compromise, from the region lying between the Ohio and the Mississippi rivers, and between the Mississippi sissippi and the Rocky Mountains north of 36° 30'it scarcely admits of a doubt, that it would have divided the emigration with the North, and by retaining her own people would have at least equalled the North in population under the census of 1840, and probably under that about to be taken. She would also, if she had retained her equal rights in those territories, have maintained an equality in the number of States with the North, and have preserved the equilibrium between the two sections that existed at the commencement of the 90

Government The loss, then, of the equilibrium is to be attributed to the action of this Government.

But while these measures were destroying the equilibrium between the two sections, the action of the Government was leading to a radical change in its character, by concentrating all the power of the system in itself. The occasion will not permit me to trace the measures by which this great change has been consummated. If it did, it would not be difficult to show that the process commenced at an early period of the Government; and that it proceeded, almost without interruption, step by step, until it absorbed virtually its entire powers, but without going through the whole process to establish the fact, it may be done satisfactorily by a very short statement.

That the Government claims, and practically maintains, the right to decide in the last resort, as to the extent of its powers, will scarcely be denied by any one conversant with the political history of the country. 20 That it also claims the right to resort to force to maintain whatever power it claims, against all opposition, is equally certain. Indeed it is apparent, from what we daily hear, that this has become the prevailing and fixed opinion of a great majority of the community Now, I ask, what limitation can possibly be placed upon the powers of a government claiming and exercising such rights? And, if none can be, how can the separate governments of the States maintain and protect the powers reserved to them by the constitution-or the people of 30 the several States maintain those which are reserved to them, and among others, the sovereign powers by which they ordained and established, not only their separate State Constitutions and Governments, but also the Constitution and Government of the United States? But, if they have no constitutional means of maintaining them against the right claimed by this Government, it necessarily follows that they hold them at its pleasure and discretion, and that all the powers of the system are in reality concentrated in it. It also follows that the 40 character of the Government has been changed, in consequence, from a federal republic, as it originally came from the hands of its framers, into a great national consolidated democracy. It has indeed, at present, all the characteristics of the latter, and not one of the former. although it still retains its outward form

The result of the whole of these causes combined is-that the North has acquired a decided ascendancy over every department of this Government, and through it a control over all the powers of the system. A single section governed by the will of the numerical majority, has 50 now, in fact, the control of the Government and the entire powers of the system. What was once a constitutional federal republic, is now converted, in reality, into one as absolute as that of the Autocrat of Russia, and as despotic in its tendency as any absolute government that ever existed

As, then, the North has the absolute control over the Government, it is manifest that on all questions between it and the South, where there is a diversity of interests, the interest of the latter will be sacrificed to the former, 60 however oppressive the effects may be; as the South possesses no means by which it can resist, through the action of the Government But if there was no question of vital importance to the South, in reference to which there was a diversity of views between the two sections, this state of things might be endured, without the hazard of destruction to the South But such is not the fact There is a question of vital importance to the Southern section, in reference to which the views and feelings of the two sections are as opposite and hostile as they can possibly be

I refer to the relation between the two races in the Southern section, which constitutes a vital portion of her social organization. Every portion of the North entertains views and feelings more or less hostile to it. Those most opposed and hostile, regard it as a sin, and consider themselves under the most sacred obligation to use every effort to destroy it Indeed, to the extent that they conceive that they have power, they regard themselves as implicated in the sin, and responsible for not 8 suppressing it by the use of all and every means. Those less opposed and hostile, regard it as a crime-an offence against humanity, as they call it, and although not so fanatical, feel themselves bound to use all efforts to effect the same object, while those who are least opposed and hostile, regard it as a blot and a stain on the character of what they call the Nation, and feel themselves accordingly bound to give it no countenance or support On the contrary, the Southern section regards the relation as one which cannot be destroyed without 9 subjecting the two races to the greatest calamity, and the section to poverty, desolation, and wretchedness, and accordingly they feel bound, by every consideration of interest and safety, to defend it

This hostile feeling on the part of the North towards the social organization of the South long lay dormant, but it only required some cause to act on those who felt most intensely that they were responsible for its continuance, to call it into action. The increasing power of this Government, and of the control of the Northern section over all its departments, furnished the cause. It was this which made an impression on the minds of many, that there was little or no restraint to prevent the Government from doing whatever it might choose to do. This was sufficient of itself to put the most fanatical portion of the North in action, for the purpose of destroying the existing relation between the two races in the South.

The first organized movement towards it commenced in 1835 Then, for the first time, societies were organized, presses established, lecturers sent forth to excite the people of the North, and incendiary publications scattered over the whole South through the mail The South was thoroughly aroused Meetings were held everywhere, and resolutions adopted, calling upon the North to apply a remedy to arrest the threatened evil, and pledging themselves to adopt measures for their own protection if it was not arrested. At the meeting of Congress, petitions poured in from the North, calling upon Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, and to prohibit what they called internal slave trade between the States-announcing at the same time, that their ultimate object was to abolish slavery, not only in the District, but in the States and throughout the Union. At this period, the number engaged in the agitation was small, and possessed little or no personal influence

Neither party in Congress had, at that time, any sympathy with them or their cause. The members of each party presented their petitions with great reluctance. Nevertheless, small and contemptible as the party then was, both of the great parties of the North dreaded them. They felt that though small, they were organized in eference to a subject which had a great and a comnanding influence over the Northern mind. Each party, in that account, feared to oppose their petitions, lest the posite party should take advantage of the one who light do so, by favoring them. The effect was that both united in insisting that the petitions should be received, and that Congress should take jurisdiction over the subject. To justify their course, they took the extraordinary ground that Congress was bound to receive petitions on ground that Congress was bound to receive petitions on ground that Congress was bound to receive petitions on ground that Congress was bound to receive petitions on ground that Congress was bound to receive petitions on ground that Congress was bound to receive petitions on ground that Congress was been they had or had not jurisdiction over the subject. These views prevailed in the House of Representatives, and partially in the Senate, and thus the party succeeded, in their first movements, in gaining what they proposed—a position in Congress from which agitation could be extended over the whole Union This was the commencement of the agitation, which has ever since continued, and which, as is now acknowledged, has endangered the Union itself.

As for myself, I believed at that early period, if the party who got up the petitions should succeed in getting Congress to take jurisdiction, that agitation would follow, and that it would in the end, if not arrested, destroy the Union. I then so expressed myself in debate, and called upon both parties to take grounds against assuming jurisdiction; but in vain Had my voice been heeded, and had Congress refused to take jurisdiction, by the united votes of all parties, the agitation which followed would have been prevented, and the fanatical zeal that 70 gives impulse to the agitation, and which has brought us to our present perilous condition, would have become extinguished from the want of fuel to feed the flame That was the time for the North to have shown her devotion to the Union, but, unfortunately, both of the great parties of that section were so intent on obtaining or retaining party ascendancy, that all other considerations were overlooked or forgotten

What has since followed are but natural consequences. With the success of their first movement, this small 80 fanatical party began to acquire strength, and with that, to become an object of courtship to both the great parties. The necessary consequence was a further increase of power, and a gradual tainting of the opinions of both of the other parties with their doctrines, until the infection has extended over both, and the great mass of the population of the North, who, whatever may be their opinion of the original abolition party, which still preserves its distinctive organization, hardly ever fail, when it comes to acting, to co-operate in carrying out 80 their measures. With the increase of their influence, they extended the sphere of their action. In a short time after the commencement of their first movement. they had acquired sufficient influence to induce the legislatures of most of the Northern States to pass acts which in effect abrogated the clause of the constitution that provides for the delivery up of fugitive slaves. Not long after, petitions followed to abolish slavery in forts, magazines, and dockyards, and all other places where Congress had exclusive power of legislation. This was followed by petitions and resolutions of legislatures of no the Northern States, and popular meetings, to exclude the Southern States from all territories acquired, or to be acquired; and to prevent the admission of any State hereafter into the Union, which, by its constitution, does not prohibit slavery. And Congress is invoked to do all this, expressly with the view to the final abolition of slavery in the States. That has been avowed to be the ultimate object from the beginning of the agitation until the present time, and yet the great body of both parties of the North, with the full knowledge of the fact, al-20 though disavowing the abolitionists, have co-operated with them in almost all their measures.

Such is a brief history of the agitation, as far as it has yet advanced Now I ask, Senators, what is there to prevent its further progress, until it fulfils the ultimate end proposed, unless some decisive measure should be adopted to prevent it? Has any one of the causes, which had added to its increase from its original small and contemptible beginning until it has attained its present magnitude, diminished in force? Is the original cause 30 of the movement—that slavery is a sin, and ought to be suppressed-weaker now than at the commencement? Or is the abolition party less numerous or influential, or have they less influence with, or control over, the two great parties of the North in elections? Or has the South greater means of influencing or controlling the movements of this Government now, than it had when the agitation commenced? To all these questions but one answer can be given: No-no-no. The very reverse is true. Instead of being weaker, all the elements in 40 favor of agitation are stronger now than they were in 1835, when it first commenced; while all the elements of influence on the part of the South are weaker. Unless something decisive is done, I again ask, what is to stop this agitation, before the great and final object at which it aims-the abolition of slavery in the States-is consummated? Is it, then, not certain, that if something is not done to arrest it, the South will be forced to choos. between abolition and secession? Indeed, as events are now moving, it will not require the South to secede in order to dissolve the Union. Agitation will of itself effect it, of which its past history furnishes abundani proof-as I shall next proceed to show.

It is a great mistake to suppose that disunion can be effected by a single blow. The cords which bind these States together in one common Union, are far too numerous and powerful for that. Disunion must be the work of time. It is only through a long process, and successively, that the cords can be snapped, until the whole fabric falls asunder. Already the agitation of the slavery question has snapped some of the most important, and has greatly weakened all the others, as I shall proceed to show.

The cords that bind the States together are not only many, but various in character Some are spiritual or ecclesiastical, some political, others social. Some appertain to the benefit conferred by the Union, and others to the feeling of duty and obligation

The strongest of those of a spiritual and ecclesiastical nature, consisted in the unity of the great religious denominations, all of which originally embraced the whole Union All these denominations, with the exception, perhaps, of the Catholics, were organized very much upon the principle of our political institutions Beginning with smaller meetings, corresponding with the political divisions of the country, their organization terminated in one great central assemblage, corresponding very much with the character of Congress At these meetings the principal clergymen and lay members of the respective denominations, from all parts of the Union, met to transact business relating to their common concerns. It was not confined to what appertained to the doctrines and discipline of the respective denominations, but extended to plans for disseminating the Bible-establishing missions, distributing tracts-and of establishing presses for the publication of tracts, newspapers, and periodicals, with a view of diffusing

⁴ clause . . . slaves. "No Person held to Service or Labour in one State, under the Laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in Consequence of any Law or Regulation therein, be discharged from such Service or Labour, but shall be delivered up on Claim of the Party to whom such Service or Labour may be due " Article IV, Section 2 of the Constitution religious information—and for the support of their respective doctrines and creeds. All this combined contributed greatly to strengthen the bonds of the Union. The ties which held each denomination together formed a strong cord to hold the whole. Union together; but, powerful as they were, they have not been able to resist the explosive effect of slavery agitation.

The first of these cords which snapped, under its explosive force, was that of the powerful Methodist Episcopal Church. The numerous and strong ties which held it together are all broken, and its unity gone They now form separate churches, and, instead of that feeling of attachment and devotion to the interests of the whole church which was formerly felt, they are now arrayed into two hostile bodies, engaged in litigation about what was formerly their common property

The next cord that snapped was that of the Baptists—one of the largest and most respectable of the denominations. That of the Presbyterians is not entirely snapped, but some of its strands have given way. That of the Episcopal Church is the only one of the four great Protestant denominations which remains unbroken and entire.

The strongest cord of a political character, consists of the many and powerful ties that have held together the two great parties which have, with some modifications, existed from the beginning of the Government They both extended to every portion of the Union, and strongly contributed to hold all its parts together But this powerful cord has fared no better than the spiritual it resisted, for a long time, the explosive tendency of the agitation, but has finally snapped under its force—if not entirely, in a great measure. Nor is there one of the remaining cords which has not been greatly weakened. To this extent the Union has already been destroyed by agitation, in the only way it can be, by sundering and weakening the cords which bind it together.

If the agitation goes on, the same force, acting with increased intensity, as has been shown, will finally snap every cord, when nothing will be left to hold the States together except force. But, surely that can with no propriety of language be called a Union, when the only means by which the weaker is held connected with the stronger portion is force. It may, indeed, keep them inected, but the connection will partake much more he character of subjugation, on the part of the weaker to the stronger, than the union of free, independent, and sovereign States, in one confederation, as they stood in the early stages of the Government, and which only is worthy of the sacred name of Union.

Having now, Senators, explained what it is that endangers the Union, and traced it to its cause, and explained its nature and character, the question again recurs—How can the Union be saved? To this I answer, there is but one way by which it can be, and that is, by adopting such measures as will satisfy the States belonging to the Southern section, that they can remain in the Union consistently with their honor and their safety There is, again, only one way by which this can be effected, and that is, by removing the causes by which this 60belief has been produced Do this, and discontent will cease, harmony and kind feelings between the sections be restored, and every apprehension of danger to the Union removed The question then is-How can this be done? But before I undertake to answer this question, I propose to show by what the Union cannot be saved

It cannot, then, be saved by eulogies on the Union, however splendid or numerous. The cry of "Union, Union—the glorious Union!" can no more prevent disunion than the cry of "Health, health—glorious health!" 70 on the part of the physician, can save a patient lying dangerously ill. So long as the Union, instead of being regarded as a protector, is regarded in the opposite character, by not much less than a majority of the States, it will be in vain to attempt to conciliate them by pronouncing eulogies on it.

Besides, this cry of Union comes commonly from those whom we cannot believe to be sincere. It usually comes from our assailants. But we cannot believe them to be sincere, for, if they loved the Union, they would 80 necessarily be devoted to the constitution. It made the Union, and to destroy the constitution would be to destroy the Union. But the only reliable and certain evidence of devotion to the constitution is to abstain, on the one hand, from violating it, and to repel, on the other, all attempts to violate it. It is only by faithfully performing these high duties that the constitution can be preserved, and with it the Union.

But how stands the profession of devotion to the ⁶⁷ eulogies . . . Union. The reference is specifically to Webster

Union by our assailants, when brought to this test? Have they abstained from violating the constitution? Let the many acts passed by the Northern States to set aside and annul the clause of the constitution providing for the delivery up of fugitive slaves answer I cite this, not that it is the only instance (for there are many others), but because the violation in this particular is too notorious and palpable to be denied. Again have they stood forth faithfully to repel violations of the constitu-10 tion? Let their course in reference to the agitation of the slavery question, which was commenced and has been carried on for fifteen years, avowedly for the purpose of abolishing slavery in the States-an object all acknowledged to be unconstitutional-answer. Let them show a single instance, during this long period, in which they have denounced the agitators or their attempts to effect what is admitted to be unconstitutional. or a single measure which they have brought forward for that purpose. How can we, with all these facts before 20 us, believe that they are sincere in their profession of devotion to the Union, or avoid believing their profession is but intended to increase the vigor of their assaults and to weaken the force of our resistance?

Nor can we regard the profession of devotion to the Union, on the part of those who are not our assailants, as sincere, when they pronounce eulogies upon the Union, evidently with the intent of charging us with disunion, without uttering one word of denunciation against our assailants. If friends of the Union, their course should be to unite with us in repelling these assaults, and denouncing the authors as enemies of the Union. Why they avoid this, and pursue the course they do, it is for them to explain.

Nor can the Union be saved by invoking the name of the illustrious Southerner whose mortal remains repose on the western bank of the Potomac. He was one of us—a slaveholder and a planter. We have studied his history, and find nothing in it to justify submission to wrong. On the contrary, his great fame tests on the 40 solid foundation that, while he was careful to avoid doing wrong to others, he was prompt and decided in repelling wrong. I trust that, in this respect, we profited by his example.

Nor can we find any thing in his history to deter us from seceding from the Union, should it fail to fulfil the objects for which it was instituted, by being permanently and hopelessly converted into the means of oppressing instead of protecting us. On the contrary, we find much in his example to encourage us, should we be forced to the extremity of deciding between submission ; and disunion

There existed then, as well as now, a union that between the parent country and her then colonies It was a union that had much to endear it to the people of the colonies. Under its protecting and superintending care, the colonies were planted, and grew up, and prospered, through a long course of years until they became populous and wealthy Its benefits were not limited to them Their extensive agricultural and other productions gave birth to a flourishing commerce, which . richly rewarded the parent country for the trouble and expense of establishing and protecting them Washington was born and grew up to manhood under that union He acquired his early distinction in its service, and there is every reason to believe that he was devotedly attached to it. But his devotion was a rational one. He was attached to it not as an end, but as a means to an end When it failed to fulfil its end, and instead of affording protection, was converted into the means of oppressing the colonies, he did not hesitate to draw his 70 sword, and head the great movement by which that union was forever severed, and the independence of these States established. This was the great and crowning glory of his life, which has spread his fame over the whole globe, and will transmit it to the latest pos-

Nor can the plan proposed by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, nor that of the administration, save the Union I shall pass by, without remark, the plan proposed by the Senator, and proceed directly to the consideration of that of the administration I however assure the distinguished and able Senator, that, in taking this course, no disrespect whatever is intended to him or his plan I have adopted it, because so many Senators of distinguished abilities, who were present when he delivered his speech, and explained his plan, and who were fully capable to do justice to the side they support, have replied to him

The plan of the administration cannot save the Union,

because it can have no effect whatever towards satisfying the States composing the Southern section of the Union, that they can, consistently with safety and honor, remain in the Union. It is, in fact, but a modification of the Wilmot Proviso. It proposes to effect the same object,-to exclude the South from all territory acquired by the Mexican treaty. It is well known that the South 15 united against the Wilmot Proviso, and has committed itself by solemn resolutions, to resist, should it be adopted Its opposition is not the name, but that which it proposes to effect. That, the Southern States hold to be unconstitutional, unjust, inconsistent with their equality as members of the common Union, and calculated to destroy irretrievably the equilibrium between the two sections These objections equally apply to what, for brevity, I will call the Executive Proviso. There is no difference between it and the Wılmot, except in the mode of effecting the object, and in that respect, I must say, that the latter is much the least oba jectionable. It goes to its object openly, boldly, and distinctly It claims for Congress unlimited power over the territories, and proposes to assert it over the territories acquired from Mexico, by a positive prohibition of slavery. Not so the Executive Proviso It takes an indirect course, and in order to elude the Wilmot Proviso, and thereby avoid encountering the united and determined resistance of the South, it denies, by implication, the authority of Congress to legislate for the territories, and claims the right as belonging exclusively to the inhabitants of the territories. But to effect the object of excluding the South, it takes care, in the mean time, to let in emigrants freely from the Northern States and all other quarters, except from the South, which it takes special care to exclude by holding up to them the danger of having their slaves liberated under the Mexican laws The necessary consequence is to exclude the South from the territory, just as effectually as would the Wilmot Proviso The only difference in this respect is, that what one proposes to effect directly and openly, the other proposes to effect indirectly and overtly.

Having now shown what cannot save the Union, I eturn to the question with which I commenced, How an the Union be saved? There is but one way by which t can with any certainty, and that is, by a full and final ettlement, on the principle of justice, of all the questions at issue between the two sections. The South asks for justice, simple justice; and less she ought not to take. She has no compromise to offer but the constitution; and no concession or surrender to make She has 50 already surrendered so much that she has little left to surrender. Such a settlement would go to the root of the evil, and remove all cause of discontent, by satisfying the South that she could remain honorably and safely in the Union, and thereby restore the harmony and fraternal feelings between the sections, which existed anterior to the Missouri agitation Nothing else can, with any certainty, finally and for ever settle the questions at issue, terminate agitation, and save the Union

But can this be done? Yes, easily, not by the weaker 60 party, for it can of itself do nothing-not even protect itself-but by the stronger The North has only to will it to accomplish it, to do justice by conceding to the South an equal right in the acquired territory, and to do her duty by causing the stipulations relative to fugitive slaves to be faithfuly fulfilled, to cease the agitation of the slave question, and to provide for the insertion of a provision in the constitution, by an amendment, which will restore to the South, in substance, the power she possessed of protecting herself, before the equilibrium be- 70 tween the sections was destroyed by the action of this Government. There will be no difficulty in devising such a provision one that will protect the South, and which, at the same time, will improve and strengthen the Government, instead of impairing and weakening it.

But will the North agree to this? It is for her to answer the question But, I will say, she cannot refuse, if she has half the love of the Union which she professes to have, or without justly exposing herself to the charge that her love of power and aggrandizement is far greater 80 than her love of the Union At all events, the responsibility of saving the Union rests on the North, and not on the South. The South cannot save it by any act of hers, and the North may save it without any sacrifice whatever, unless to do justice, and to perform her duties under the constitution, should be regarded by her as a sacrifice

It is time, Senators, that there should be an open and manly avowal on all sides, as to what is intended to be done. If the question is not now settled, it is uncertain whether it ever can hereafter be; and we, as the representatives of the States of this Union, regarded as governments, should come to a distinct understanding as to our respective views, in order to ascertain whether the great questions at issue can be settled or not. If you, who represent the stronger portion, cannot agree to settle them on the broad principle of justice and duty, say so. 10 and let the States we both represent agree to separate and part in peace. If you are unwilling we should part in peace, tell us so, and we shall know what to do, when you reduce the question to submission or resistance If you remain silent, you will compel us to infer by your acts what you intend. In that case, California will become the test question. If you admit her, under all the difficulties that oppose her admission, you compel us to infer that you intend to exclude us from the whole of the acquired territories, with the intention of destroy-20 ing, irretrievably, the equilibrium between the two sections. We would be blind not to perceive in that case that your real objects are power and aggrandizemen and infatuated not to act accordingly.

I have now, Senators, done my duty in expressing m opinions fully, freely, and candidly, on this solemn or casion. In doing so, I have been governed by the motives which have governed me in all stages of the agitation of the slavery question since its commence ment. I have exerted myself, during the whole period to arrest it, with the intention of saving the Union, if could be done, and if it could not, to save the section where it has pleased. Providence to cast my lot, an which I sincerely believe has justice and the constitution on its side. Having faithfully done my duty to the best of my ability, both to the Union and my section, throughout this agitation, I shall have the consolation, let whe will come, that I am free from all responsibility

1782 · 1852

Daniel Webster was possibly the greatest political orator America has ever produced. He was born in New Hampshire and was graduated from Dartmouth College Beginning in 1813 and continuing with few interruptions until 1850, his long career in the national Congress, first as a Federalist and later as a Whig member from Massachusetts, was one of the most brilliant in the annals of that body. He was secretary of state under President Tyler and negotiated with England in 1842 the Webster-Ashburton. Treaty, which permanently settled the boundary between the United States an Canada as far west as the Rocky Mountains

Always a staunch advocate of the supremacy of the Feeral Union, Webster made his first famous pronouncement on the subject in 1830 in his reply to Robert. Hayne of South Carolina, who argued for the right of the individual state to nullify an act of Congress, was this speech which concluded with the memorab words, "Liberty and Union, now and forever, one ar inseparable." Webster's last great oratorical effort.

preserve the Union came on March 7, 1850, when he replied to the speech made three days earlier by Calhoun. In this "Seventh of March Speech," Webster gave his full support to Henry Clay's "Compromise" (see p. 38). Thanks largely to Webster's support, the Compromise was adopted, but like all compromises, it pleased the extremists of neither side. The New England abolitionists, many of whom had been admirers of Webster up to this time, were especially bitter in their attacks.

(see, for example, Whittier's "Ichabod," p. 73). Saddened by the defection of many friends and the rising tide of sectional conflict, he did not live to see the outbreak of the war which, by his mighty efforts, he had been able to postpone, but not to prevent.

Speech on the Constitution and the Union, March 7, 1850

f Webster lacked the inexorable logic of Calhoun, he was at once more realistic and more imaginative. The portion of the following speech dealing with the question of slaving in New Mexico and California illustrates his use of a ealistic argument, his glowing peroration on the Union—ke other similar passages in his works—shows the largeess and vigor of his imagination. His style was classical, todeled on that of Demosthenes and Cicero, and despite the modern preference for naturalness and simplicity, it still impressive.

Mr. President,—I wish to speak to-day, not as a Masichusetts man, nor as a Northern man, but as an merican, and a member of the Senate of the United tates. It is fortunate that there is a Senate of the United ates, a body not yet moved from its propriety, not lost a just sense of its own dignity and its own high sponsibilities, and a body to which the country looks, ith confidence, for wise, moderate, patriotic, and healg counsels. It is not to be denied that we live in the idst of strong agrications, and are surrounded by very considerable dangers to our institutions and government. The imprisoned winds are let loose. The East, the North, and the stormy South combine to throw the whole sea into commotion, to toss its billows to the skies, and disclose its profoundest depths. I do not affect to regard myself, Mr President, as holding, or as fit to hold, the helm in this combat with the political elements. but I have a duty to perform, and I mean to perform it with fidelity, not without a sense of existing dangers, but not without hope. I have a part to act, not for my own 20 security or safety, for I am looking out for no fragment upon which to float away from the wreck, if wreck there must be, but for the good of the whole, and the preservation of all, and there is that which will keep me to my duty during this struggle, whether the sun and the stars shall appear, or shall not appear for many days I speak to-day for the preservation of the Union. "Hear me for my cause" I speak to-day, out of a solicitous and anxious heart, for the restoration to the country of that quiet and that harmony which make the blessing of this 30 Union so rich, and so dear to us all These are the topics that I propose to myself to discuss; these are the motives, and the sole motives, that influence me in the wish to communicate my opinions to the Senate and the country, and if I can do any thing, however little, for the promotion of these ends. I shall have accomplished all that I expect.

Mr President, it may not be amiss to recur very briefly to the events which, equally sudden and extraordinary, have brought the country into its present political condition. In May, 1846, the United States declared War against Mexico. Our armies, then on the frontiers, entered the provinces of that republic, met and defeated all her troops, penetrated her mountain passes, and occupied her capital The marine force of the United States took possession of her forts and her towns, on the Atlantic and on the Pacific In less than two years a treaty was negotiated, by which Mexico ceded to the United States a vast territory, extending seven or eight 10 hundred miles along the shores of the Pacific, and reaching back over the mountains, and across the desert, until it joins the frontier of the State of Texas It so happened, in the distracted and feeble state of the Mexican government, that before the declaration of war by the United States against Mexico had become known in California, the people of California, under the lead of American officers, overthrew the existing Mexican provincial government, and raised an independent flag. When the news arrived at San Francisco that war had been 20 declared by the United States against Mexico, this independent flag was pulled down, and the stars and stripes of this Union hoisted in its stead So, Sir, before the war was over, the forces of the United States, military and naval, had possession of San Francisco and Upper California, and a great rush of emigrants from various parts of the world took place into California in 1846 and 1847 But now behold another wonder.

In January of 1848, a party of Mormons made a discovery of an extraordinarily rich mine of gold, or rather 30 of a great quantity of gold, hardly proper to be called a mine, for it spread near the surface, on the lower part of the south, or American branch of the Sacramento. They attempted to conceal their discovery for some time, but soon another discovery of gold, perhaps of greater importance, was made, on another part of the American branch of the Sacramento, and near Sutter's Fort, as it is called The fame of these discoveries spread far and wide They inflamed more and more the spirit of emigration towards California, which had already been 40 excited, and adventurers crowded into the country by hundreds, and flocked towards the Bay of San Francisco This, as I have said, took place in the winter and spring of 1848. The digging commenced in the spring of that year, and from that time to this the work of searching for gold has been prosecuted with a success not heretofore known in the history of this globe. You recollect, Sir, how incredulous at first the Ame public was at the accounts which reached us of these coveries, but we all know, now, that these account ceived, and continue to receive, daily confirmation, down to the present moment I suppose the assuran as strong, after the experience of these several month the existence of deposits of gold apparently inexhaus in the regions near San Francisco, in California, as it at any period of the earlier dates of the accounts.

It so happened, Sir, that although, after the retur peace, it became a very important subject for legisl. consideration and legislative decision to provide a pr territorial government for California, yet difference opinion between the two houses of Congress preve the establishment of any such territorial governmen the last session. Under this state of things, the habitants of California, already amounting to a consi able number, thought it to be their duty, in the s mer of last year, to establish a local government U1 the proclamation of General Riley, the people of delegates to a convention, and that convention me Monterey It formed a constitution for the State California, which, being referred to the people, adopted by them in their primary assemblages Desii of immediate connection with the United States, Senators were appointed and representatives cho who have come hither, bringing with them the authe constitution of the State of California, and they r present themselves, asking, in behalf of their c stituents, that it may be admitted into this Union one of the United States This constitution, Sir, c tains an express prohibition of slavery, or involunt servitude, in the State of California It is said, and suppose truly, that, of the members who composed t convention, some sixteen were natives of, and had be residents in, the slave-holding States, about twenty-t were from the non-slave-holding States, and the maining ten members were either native California or old settlers in that country. This prohibition slavery, it is said, was inserted with entire unanimity.

It is this circumstance, Sir, the prohibition of slave which has contributed to raise, I do not say it has who raised, the dispute as to the propriety of the admissi of California into the Union under this constitution, is not to be denied, Mr President, nobody thinks denying, that, whatever reasons were assigned at t commencement of the late war with Mexico, it was prosecuted for the purpose of the acquisition of territory. and under the alleged argument that the cession of territory was the only form in which proper compensation could be obtained by the United States from Mexico. for the various claims and demands which the people of this country had against that government. At any rate, ir will be found that President Polk's message, at the commencement of the session of December, 1847, avowed that the war was to be prosecuted until some acquisition of territory should be made. As the acquisition was to be south of the line of the United States, in warm climates and countries, it was naturally, I suppose, expected by the South, that whatever acquisitions were made in that region would be added to the slave-holding portion of the United States Very little of accurate information was possessed of the real physical character, either of California or New Mexico, and events have not turned out as was expected Both California and New Mexico are likely to come in as free States, and therefore some degree of disappointment and surprise has resulted. In other words, it is obvious that the question which has so long harassed the country, and at times very seriously alarmed the minds of wise and good men. has come upon us for a fresh discussion, the question of slavery in these United States

Now, Sir, I propose, perhaps at the expense of some detail and consequent detention of the Senate, to review historically this question, which, partly in consequence of its own importance, and partly, perhaps mostly, in consequence of the manner in which it has been discussed in different portions of the country, has been a source of so much alienation and unkind feeling between

We all know, Sir, that slavery has existed in the world from time immemorial. There was slavery, in the earliest periods of history, among the Oriental nations. There was slavery among the Jews, the theocratic government of that people issued no injunction against it There was slavery among the Greeks, and the ingenious philosophy of the Greeks found, or sought to find, a justification for it exactly upon the grounds which have been assumed for such a justification in this country, that is, a natural and original difference among the races of mankind, and the inferiority of the black or colored race to the white. The Greeks justified their system of slavery upon that idea, precisely. They held the African and some of the Asiatic tribes to be inferior to the white race; but they did not show, I think, by any close process of logic, that if this were true, the more intelligent and the stronger had therefore a right to subjugate the weaker.

The more manly philosophy and jurisprudence of the Romans placed the justification of slavery on entirely different grounds The Roman jurists, from the first and down to the fall of the empire, admitted that slavery was against the natural law, by which, as they maintain, all men, of whatsoever clime, color, or capacity, were equal, but they justified slavery, first upon the ground and authority of the law of nations, arguing, and arguing 60 truly, that at that day the conventional law of nations admitted that captives in war, whose lives, according to the notions of the times, were at the absolute disposal of the captors, might, in exchange for exemption from death, be made slaves for life, and that such servitude might descend to their posterity. The jurists of Rome also maintained, that, by the civil law, there might be servitude or slavery, personal and hereditary, first, by the voluntary act of an individual, who might sell himself into slavery; secondly, by his being reduced into a 70 state of slavery by his creditors, in satisfaction of his debts, and, thirdly, by being placed in a state of servitude or slavery for crime At the introduction of Christianity, the Roman world was full of slaves, and I suppose there is to be found no injunction against that relation between man and man in the teachings of the Gospel of Jesus Christ or of any of his Apostles The object of the instruction imparted to mankind by the founder of Christianity was to touch the heart, purify the soul, and improve the lives of individual men. That 80 object went directly to the first fountain of all the political and all social relations of the human race, as well as of all true religious feeling, the individual heart and mind of man

Now, Sir, upon the general nature and influence of slavery there exists a wide difference of opinion between the northern portion of this country and the southern. It is said on the one side, that, although not the subject of any injunction or direct prohibition in the New Testament, slavery is a wrong; that it is founded merely 90 in the right of the strongest, and that it is an oppression, like unjust wars, like all those conflicts by which a powerful nation subjects a weaker to its will: and that in its nature, whatever may be said of it in the modifications which have taken place, it is not according to the meek spirit of the Gospel. It is not "kindly affectioned". it does not "seek another's, and not its own"; it does not "let the oppressed go free." These are sentiments that are cherished, and of late with greatly augmented force, among the people of the Northern States They have taken hold of the religious sentiment of that part of the 10 country, as they have, more or less, taken hold of the religious feelings of a considerable portion of mankind. The South, upon the other side, having been accustomed to this relation between the two races all their lives, from their birth, having been taught, in general, to treat the subjects of this bondage with care and kindness, and I believe, in general, feeling great kindness for them, have not taken the view of the subject which I have mentioned There are thousands of religious men, with consciences as tender as any of their brethren at the North. 20 who do not see the unlawfulness of slavery, and there are more thousands, perhaps, that, whatsoever they may think of it in its origin, and as a matter depending upon natural right, yet take things as they are, and, finding slavery to be an established relation of the society in which they live, can see no way in which, let their opinions on the abstract question be what they may, it is in the power of the present generation to relieve themselves from this relation And candor obliges me to say, that I believe they are just as conscientious, many of 30 them, and the religious people, all of them, as they are at the North who hold different opinions

The honorable Senator from South Carolina the other day alluded to the separation of that great religious community, the Methodist Episcopal Church. That separation was brought about by differences of opinion upon this particular subject of slavery. I felt great concern, as that dispute went on, about the result. I was in hopes that the difference of opinion might be adjusted, because I looked upon that religious denomination as one of the great props of religion and morals throughout the whole country, from Maine to Georgia, and westward to our utmost western boundary. The result was against my wishes and against my hopes. I have read all their proceedings and all their arguments; but I have never yet been able to come to the conclusion that there was any real ground for that separation; in other words, that any good could be produced by that set tion. I must say I think there was some want of call and charity. Sir, when a question of this kind seize the religious sentiments of mankind, and comes to discussed in religious assemblies of the clergy and 1 there is always to be expected, or always to be feare great degree of excitement. It is in the nature of r manifested by his whole history, that religious disp are apt to become warm in proportion to the strengt the convictions which men entertain of the magnit of the questions at issue In all such disputes, there sometimes be found men with whom every thing is solute; absolutely wrong, or absolutely right. They the right clearly, they think others ought so to see and they are disposed to establish a broad line of dist tion between what is right and what is wrong. They not seldom willing to establish that line upon their (convictions of truth and justice, and are ready to m and guard it by placing along it a series of dogmas lines of boundary on the earth's surface are marked posts and stones There are men who, with clear perc tions, as they think, of their own duty, do not see I too eager a pursuit of one duty may involve them in violation of others, or how too warm an embracen of one truth may lead to a disregard of other tru equally important. As I heard it stated strongly, many days ago, these persons are disposed to mo upon some particular duty, as upon a war-horse, and drive furiously on and upon and over all other du that may stand in the way. There are men who, reference to disputes of that sort, are of opinion t human duties may be ascertained with the exactness mathematics They deal with morals as with mathem ics, and they think what is right may be distinguisl from what is wrong with the precision of an algebi equation They have, therefore, none too much chall towards others who differ from them They are a too, to think that nothing is good but what is perfe and that there are no compromises or modifications be made in consideration of difference of opinion or deference to other men's judgment. If their perspicacion vision enables them to detect a spot on the face of the sun, they think that a good reason why the sun should be struck down from heaven. They prefer the chance of running into utter darkness to living in heavenly light, if that heavenly light be not absolutely without any imperfection. There are impatient men, too impatient always to give heed to the admonition of St Paul, that we are not to "do evil that good may come"; too impatient to wait for the slow progress of moral : causes in the improvement of mankind. They do not remember that the doctrines and the miracles of Jesus Christ have, in eighteen hundred years, converted only a small portion of the human race, and among the nations that are converted to Christianity, they forget how many vices and crimes, public and private, still prevail, and that many of them, public crimes especially, which are so clearly offences against the Christian religion, pass without exciting particular indignation. Thus wars are waged, and unjust wars. I do not deny that there may be just wars. There certainly are, but it was the remark of an eminent person, not many years ago, on the other side of the Atlantic, that it is one of the greatest reproaches to human nature that wars are sometimes just The defence of nations sometimes causes a just war against the injustice of other nations. In this state of sentiment upon the general nature of slavery lies the cause of a great part of those unhappy divisions, exasperations, and reproaches which find vent and support in different parts of the Union.

But we must view things as they are. Slavery does exist in the United States It did exist in the States before the adoption of this Constitution, and at that time Let us, therefore, consider for a moment what was the state of sentiment, North and South, in regard to slavery, at the time this Constitution was adopted. A remarkable change has taken place since, but what did the wise and great men of all parts of the country think of slavery then? In what estimation did they hold it at he time when this Constitution was adopted? It will be found, Sir, if we will carry ourselves by historical esearch back to that day, and ascertain men's opinions y authentic records still existing among us, that there vas then no diversity of opinion between the North nd the South upon the subject of slavery. It will be ound that both parts of the country held it equally an vil, a moral and political evil. It will not be found that, either at the North or at the South, there was much, though there was some, invective against slavery as inhuman and cruel. The great ground of objection to it was political; that it weakened the social fabric; that, 50 taking the place of free labor, society became less strong and labor less productive, and therefore we find from all the eminent men of the time the clearest expression of their opinion that slavery is an evil. They ascribed its existence here, not without truth, and not without some acerbity of temper and force of language, to the injurious policy of the mother country, who, to favor the navigator, had entailed these evils upon the Colonies. I need hardly refer, Sir, particularly to the publications of the day They are matters of history on the record 60 The eminent men, the most eminent men, and nearly all the conspicuous politicians of the South, held the same sentiments; that slavery was an evil, a blight, a scourge, and a curse. There are no terms of reprobation of slavery so vehement in the North at that day as in the South The North was not so much excited against it as the South; and the reason is, I suppose, that there was much less of it at the North, and the people did not see, or think they saw, the evils so prominently as they were seen, or thought to be seen, at the South

Then, Sir, when this Constitution was framed, this was the light in which the Federal Convention viewed it. That body reflected the judgment and sentiments of the great men of the South. A member of the other house, whom I have not the honor to know, has, in a recent speech, collected extracts from these public documents They prove the truth of what I am saying, and the question then was, how to deal with it, and how to deal with it as an evil They came to this general result. They thought that slavery could not be continued in the 80 country if the importation of slaves were made to cease, and therefore they provided that, after a certain period, the importation might be prevented by the act of the new government. The period of twenty years was proposed by some gentleman from the North, I think, and many members of the Convention from the South opposed it as being too long Mr. Madison especially was somewhat warm against it. He said it would bring

too much of this mischief into the country to allow the importation of slaves for such a period Because we must take along with us, in the whole of this discussion, when we are considering the sentiments and opinions in which the constitutional provision originated, that the conviction of all men was, that, if the importation of slaves ceased, the white race would multiply faster than the black race, and that slavery would therefore gradually wear out and expire. It may not be improper here 10 to allude to that, I had almost said, celebrated opinion of Mr Madison You observe, Sir, that the term slave, or slavery, is not used in the Constitution. The Constitution does not require that "fugitive slaves" shall be delivered up. It requires that persons held to service in one State, and escaping into another, shall be delivered up Mr. Madison opposed the introduction of the term slave, or slavery, into the Constitution, for he said that he did not wish to see it recognized by the Constitution of the United States of America that there could be 20 property in men

Now, Sir, all this took place in the Convention in 1787, but connected with this, concurrent and contemporaneous, is another important transaction, not sufficiently attended to. The Convention for framing this Constitution assembled in Philadelphia in May, and sat until September, 1787. During all that time the Congress of the United States was in session at New York It was a matter of design, as we know, that the Convention should not assemble in the same city where 30 Congress was holding its sessions. Almost all the public men of the country, therefore, of distinction and eminence, were in one or the other of these two assemblies, and I think it happened, in some instances, that the same gentlemen were members of both bodies If I mistake not, such was the case with Mr Rufus King, then a member of Congress from Massachusetts Now, at the very time when the Convention in Philadelphia was framing this Constitution, the Congress in New York was framing the Ordinance of 1787, for the organiza-40 tion and government of the territory northwest of the Ohio. They passed that Ordinance on the 13th of July, 1787, at New York, the very month, perhaps the very day, on which these questions about the importation of slaves and the character of slavery were debated in the Convention at Philadelphia So far as we can now learn. there was a perfect concurrence of opinion between these two bodies, and it resulted in this Ordinance 1787, excluding slavery from all the territory over w the Congress of the United States had jurisdiction, that was all the territory northwest of the Ohio. T years before, Virginia and other States had made a sion of that great territory to the United States, at most munificent act it was. I never reflect upon it v out a disposition to do honor and justice, and ju would be the highest honor, to Virginia, for the ces of her northwestern territory I will say, Sir, it is on her fairest claims to the respect and gratitude of country, and that, perhaps, it is only second to that o claim which belongs to her, that from her counsels. from the intelligence and patriotism of her lead statesmen, proceeded the first idea put into practice the formation of a general constitution of the Un-States. The Ordinance of 1787 applied to the wl territory over which the Congress of the United St had jurisdiction. It was adopted two years before Constitution of the United States went into operat because the Ordinance took effect immediately on passage, while the Constitution of the United Sta having been framed, was to be sent to the States to adopted by their Conventions, and then a governm was to be organized under it This Ordinance, then, in operation and force when the Constitution adopted, and the government put in motion, in A: 1789

Mr President, three things are quite clear as histor truths. One is, that there was an expectation that, the ceasing of the importation of slaves from Afr slavery would begin to run out here. That was how and expected. Another is, that, as far as there was power in Congress to prevent the spread of slavery the United States, that power was executed in the m absolute manner, and to the fullest extent. An honora member, whose health does not allow him to be h to-dav---

A SENATOR He is here

I am very happy to hear that he is, may he long here, and in the enjoyment of health to serve his count The honorable member said, the other day, that he or sidered this Ordinance as the first in the series of measures calculated to enfeeble the South, and deprive them of their just participation in the benefits and privileges of this government. He says, very properly, that it was enacted under the old Confederation, and before this Constitution went into effect; but, my present purpose is only to say, Mr President, that it was established with the entire and unanimous concurrence of the whole South Why, there it stands! The vote of every State in the Union was unanimous in favor of the Ordinance. with the exception of a single individual vote, and that individual vote was given by a Northern man This Ordinance prohibiting slavery for ever northwest of the Ohio has the hand and seal of every Southern member in Congress It was therefore no aggression of the North on the South. The other and third clear historical truth is, that the Convention meant to leave slavery in the States as they found it, entirely under the authority and control of the States themselves.

This was the state of things. Sir. and this the state of opinion, under which those very important matters were arranged, and those three important things done: that is, the establishment of the Constitution of the United States with a recognition of slavery as it existed in the States, the establishment of the ordinance for the government of the Northwestern Territory, prohibiting, to the full extent of all territory owned by the United States, the introduction of slavery into that territory, while leaving to the States all power over slavery in their own limits, and creating a power, in the new governnent, to put an end to the importation of slaves, after I limited period. There was entire coincidence and conurrence of sentiment between the North and the South, ipon all these questions, at the period of the adoption of the Constitution But opinions, Sir, have changed, treatly changed, changed North and changed South Blavery is not regarded in the South now as it was then. see an honorable member of this body paying me the ionor of listening to my remarks, he brings to my mind, ir, freshly and vividly, what I have learned of his great ncestor, so much distinguished in his day and generaon, so worthy to be succeeded by so worthy a grandson, nd of the sentiments he expressed in the Convention 1 Philadelphia

Here we may pause There was, if not an entire unaimity, a general concurrence of sentiment running through the whole community, and especially entertained by the eminent men of all parts of the country But soon a change began, at the North and the South and a difference of opinion showed itself, the North growing much 50 more warm and strong against slavery, and the South growing much more warm and strong in its support. Sir, there is no generation of mankind whose opinions are not subject to be influenced by what appear to them to be their present emergent and exigent interests. I impute to the South no particularly selfish view in the change which has come over her I impute to her certainly no dishonest view. All that has happened has been natural It has followed those causes which always influence the human mind and operate upon it What, 60 then, have been the causes which have created so new a feeling in favor of slavery in the South, which have changed the whole nomenclature of the South on that subject, so that, from being thought of and described in the terms I have mentioned and will not repeat, it has now become an institution, a cherished institution, in that quarter, no evil, no scourge, but a great religious, social, and moral blessing, as I think I have heard it latterly spoken of? I suppose this, Sir, is owing to the rapid growth and sudden extension of the COTTON plan- 70 tations of the South So far as any motive consistent with honor, justice, and general judgment could act, it was the COTTON interest that gave a new desire to promote slavery, to spread it, and to use its labor I again say that this change was produced by causes which must always produce like effects. The whole interest of the South became connected, more or less, with the extension of slavery If we look back to the history of the commerce of this country in the early years of this government, what were our exports? Cotton was hardly, or but to a 80 very limited extent, known In 1791 the first parcel of cotton of the growth of the United States was exported. and amounted only to 19,200 pounds It has gone on increasing rapidly, until the whole crop may now, perhaps, in a season of great product and high prices, amount to a hundred millions of dollars. In the years I have mentioned, there was more of wax, more of indigo, more of rice, more of almost every article of export from the South, than of cotton When Mr Jay negotiated the treaty of 1794 with England, it is evident from the twelfth article of the treaty, which was suspended by the Senate, that he did not know that cotton was exported at all from the United States

Well, Sir, we know what followed The age of cotton became the golden age of our Southern brethren It gratified their desire for improvement and accumulation, at the same time that it excited it. The desire grew 10 by what it fed upon, and there soon came to be an eagerness for other territory, a new area or new areas for the cultivation of the cotton crop, and measures leading to this result were brought about rapidly, one after another, under the lead of Southern men at the head of the government, they having a majority in both branches of Congress to accomplish their ends The honorable member from South Carolina observed that there has been a majority all along in favor of the North If that be true, Sir, the North has acted either very liberally and 20 kindly, or very weakly, for they never exercised that majority efficiently five times in the history of the government, when a division or trial of strength arose Never Whether they were out-generalled or whether it was owing to other causes, I shall not stop to consider, but no man acquainted with the history of the Union can deny that the general lead in the politics of the country, for three fourths of the period that has elapsed since the adoption of the Constitution, has been a Southern lead

In 1802, in pursuit of the idea of opening a new cotton region, the United States obtained a cession from Georgia of the whole of her western territory, now embracing the rich and growing States of Alabama and Mississippi In 1803 Louisiana was purchased from France, out of which the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, and Missouri have been framed, as slave-holding States In 1819 the cession of Florida was made, bringing in another region adapted to cultivation by slaves Sir, the honorable member from South Carolina thought he 40 saw in certain operations of the government, such as the manner of collecting the revenue, and the tendency of measures calculated to promote emigration into the country, what accounts for the more rapid growth of the North than the South He ascribes that more rapid growth, not to the operation of time, but to the system of government and administration established under this Constitution. That is matter of opinion. To a c extent it may be true, but it does seem to be tl any operation of the government can be shown i degree to have promoted the population, and gi and wealth of the North, it is much more sure that are sundry important and distinct operations c government, about which no man can doubt, te to promote, and which absolutely have promoted increase of the slave interest and the slave territories the South It was not time that brought in Louisia was the act of men It was not time that broug Florida; it was the act of men And lastly, Sir, to plete those acts of legislation which have contribut much to enlarge the area of the institution of sl. Texas, great and vast and illimitable Texas, was add the Union as a slave State in 1845, and that, Sir, 1 much closed the whole chapter, and settled the

That closed the whole chapter and settled the v account, because the annexation of Texas, upon the ditions and under the guaranties upon which she admitted, did not leave within the control of this ernment an acre of land, capable of being culti by slave labor, between this Capitol and the Rio Gi or the Nueces, or whatever is the proper bounda Texas, not an acre From that moment, the whole of try, from this place to the western boundary of T was fixed, pledged, fastened, decided, to be slave terr for ever, by the solemn guaranties of law And I say, Sir, as the proposition upon which I stand this and upon the truth and firmness of which I inten act until it is overthrown, that there is not at this ment within the United States, or any territory of United States, a single foot of land, the characte which, in regard to its being free territory or slave i tory, is not fixed by some law, and some irrepea law, beyond the power of the action of the governm Is it not so with respect to Texas? It is most manif

io. The honorable member from South Carolina, at the ime of the admission of Texas, held an important post n the executive department of the government; he was secretary of State Another eminent person of great ictivity and adroitness in affairs, I mean the late Secrearv of the Treasury, was a conspicuous member of this ody, and took the lead in the business of annexation. n cooperation with the Secretary of State, and I must av that they did their business faithfully and thoroughly, here was no botch left in it. They rounded it off, and nade as close joiner-work as ever was exhibited Resoations of annexation were brought into Congress, fitly and together, compact, efficient, conclusive upon the reat object which they had in view, and those resoluons passed.

Allow me to read a part of these resolutions. It is ne third clause of the second section of the resolution f the 1st of March, 1845, for the admission of Texas, thich applies to this part of the case. That clause is as allows -

"New States, of convenient size, not exceeding four number, in addition to said State of Texas, and havg sufficient population, may hereafter, by the connt of said State, be formed out of the territory there-, which shall be entitled to admission under the prosions of the Federal Constitution. And such States as ay be formed out of that portion of said territory lying uth of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude, mmonly known as the Missouri Compromise line, all be admitted into the Union with or without slavery, the people of each State asking admission may desire; d in such State or States as shall be formed out of id territory north of said Missouri Compromise line. very or involuntary servitude (except for crime) all be prohibited."

Now, what is here stipulated, enacted, and secured? is, that all Texas south of 36° 30', which is nearly the iole of it, shall be admitted into the Union as a slave ite. It was a slave State, and therefore came in as a ve State, and the guaranty is, that new States shall be de out of it, to the number of four, in addition to the te then in existence and admitted at that time by se resolutions, and that such States as are formed out that portion of Texas lying south of 36° 30' may come in as slave States. I know no form of legislation which can strengthen this I know no mode of recognition that can add a tittle of weight to it. I listened respectfully to the resolutions of my honorable friend from Tennessee He proposed to recognize that stipulation with Texas. But any additional recognition 54 would weaken the force of it, because it stands here on the ground of a contract, a thing done for a consideration It is a law founded on a contract with Texas, and designed to carry that contract into effect. A recognition now, founded not on any consideration or any contract, would not be so strong as it now stands on the face of the resolution I know no way, I candidly confess, in which this government, acting in good faith, as I trust it always will, can relieve itself from that stipulation and pledge, by any honest course of legislation what- 60 ever. And therefore, I say again, that, so far as Texas is concerned, in the whole of that State south of 36° 30', which, I suppose, embraces all the territory capable of slave cultivation, there is no land, not an acre, the character of which is not established by law; a law which cannot be repealed without the violation of a contract. and plain disregard of the public faith

I hope, Sir, it is now apparent that my proposition, so far as it respects Texas, has been maintained, and that the provision in this article is clear and absolute, and 70 it has been well suggested by my friend from Rhode Island, that that part of Texas which lies north of 36° 30' of north latitude, and which may be formed into free States, is dependent, in like manner, upon the consent of Texas, herself a slave State

Now, Sir, how came this? How came it to pass that within these walls, where it is said by the honorable member from South Carolina that the free States have always had a majority, this resolution of annexation, such as I have described it, obtained a majority in both 80 houses of Congress? Sir, it obtained that majority by the great number of Northern votes added to the entire Southern vote, or, at least nearly the whole of the Southern vote The aggregate was made up of Northern and Southern votes In the House of Representatives there were about eighty Southern votes and about fifty Northern votes for the admission of Texas. In the Senate the vote for the admission of Texas was twenty-seven, and twenty-five against it, and of those twenty-seven votes, constituting the majority, no less than thirteen came from the free States, and four of them were from New England The whole of these thirteen Senators, constituting within a fraction, you see, one half of all the 10 votes in this body for the admission of this immeasurable extent of slave territory, were sent here by free States

Sir, there is not so remarkable a chapter in our history of political events, political parties, and political men as is afforded by this admission of a new slave-holding territory, so vast that a bird cannot fly over it in a week New England, as I have said, with some of her own votes, supported this measure. Three fourths of the votes of liberty-loving Connecticut were given for it 20 in the other house, and one half here. There was one vote for it from Maine, but, I am happy to say, not the vote of the honorable member who addressed the Senate the day before yesterday, and who was then a Representative from Maine in the House of Representatives, but there was one vote from Maine, ay, and there was one vote for it from Massachusetts, given by a gentleman then representing, and now living in, the district in which the prevalence of Free Soil sentiment for a couple of years or so has defeated the choice of any 30 member to represent it in Congress Sir, that body of Northern and Eastern men who gave those votes at that time are now seen taking upon themselves, in the nomenclature of politics, the appellation of the Northern Democracy They undertook to wield the destinies of this empire, if I may give that name to a republic, and their policy was, and they persisted in it, to bring into this country and under this government all the territory they could They did it, in the case of Texas, under pledges, absolute pledges, to the slave interest, and they afterwards 40 lent their aid in bringing in these new conquests, to take their chance for slavery or freedom. My honorable friend from Georgia, in March, 1847, moved the Senate to declare that the war ought not to be prosecuted for the conquest of territory, or for the dismemberment of Mexico. The whole of the Northern Democracy voted against it. He did not get a vote from them It suited the patriotic and elevated sentiments of the Northern Democracy to bring in a world from among the mour tains and valleys of California and New Mexico, or an other part of Mexico, and then quarrel about it; to brin it in, and then endeavor to put upon it the saving grac of the Wilmot Proviso. There were two eminent an highly respectable gentlemen from the North, and Eas then leading gentlemen in the Senate, (I refer, and do so with entire respect, for I entertain for both c those gentlemen, in general, high regard, to Mr Dix c New York and Mr Niles of Connecticut,) who bot voted for the admission of Texas They would not hav that vote any other way than as it stood; and they woul have it as it did stand. I speak of the vote upon the an nexation of Texas Those two gentlemen would hav the resolution of annexation just as it is, withou amendment, and they voted for it just as it is, and thei eyes were all open to its true character The honorabl member from South Carolina who addressed us th other day was then Secretary of State. His coi respondence with Mr Murphy, the Chargé d'Affaires o the United States in Texas, had been published. Tha correspondence was all before those gentlemen, and the Secretary had the boldness and candor to avow it that correspondence, that the great object sought by th annexation of Texas was to strengthen the slave interes of the South. Why, Sir, he said so in so many words-

MR. CALHOUN. Will the honorable Senator permi me to interrupt him for a moment?

Certainly.

MR. CALHOUN. I am very reluctant to interrupt the honorable gentleman, but, upon a point of so much im portance, I deem it right to put myself rectus in curia I did not put it upon the ground assumed by the Senator I put it upon this ground: that Great Britain had an nounced to this country, in so many words, that he object was to abolish slavery in Texas, and, through Texas, to accomplish the abolition of slavery in the United States and the world The ground I put it or was, that it would make an exposed frontier, and, i Great Britain succeeded in her object, it would be im possible that that frontier could be secured against the aggressions of the Abolitionists, and that this govern ment was bound, under the guaranties of the Constitution, to protect us against such a state of things

That comes, I suppose, Sir, to exactly the same thing It was that Texas must be obtained for the security of the slave interest of the South

MR CALHOUN Another view is very distinctly given

That was the object set forth in the correspondence of a worthy gentleman not now living, who preceded the honorable member from South Carolina in the Department of State There repose on the files of the Department, as I have occasion to know, strong letters from Mr Upshur to the United States minister in England, and I believe there are some to the same minister trom the honorable Senator himself, asserting to this effect the sentiments of this government, namely, that Great Britain was expected not to interfere to take Texas out of the hands of its then existing government and make it a free country. But my argument, my suggestion, is this, that those gentlemen who composed he Northern Democracy, when Texas was brought into he Union, saw clearly that it was brought in as a slave ountry, and brought in for the purpose of being mainained as slave territory, to the Greek Kalends I rather hink the honorable gentleman who was then Secretary if State might, in some of his correspondence with Mr furphy, have suggested that it was not expedient to sy too much about this object, lest it should create some larm At any rate, Mr Murphy wrote to him that ngland was anxious to get rid of the constitution of exas, because it was a constitution establishing slavery, nd that what the United States had to do was to aid the eople of Texas in upholding their constitution, but 1at norhing should be said which should offend the inatical men of the North But, Sir, the honorable tember did avow this object himself, openly, boldly, nd manfully, he did not disguise his conduct or his lotives.

Mr. Calhoun. Never, never

What he means he is very apt to say.

Mr. Calhoun. Always, always

And I honor him for it.

This admission of Texas was in 1845. Then, in 1847, igrante bello between the United States and Mexico, e proposition I have mentioned was brought forward my friend from Georgia, and the Northern Democracy voted steadily against it. Their remedy was to apply to the acquisitions, after they should come in, the Wilmot Proviso. What follows? These two gentlemen, worthy and honorable and influential men, (and if they had not been they could not have carried the measure,) so these two gentlemen, members of this body, brought in Texas, and by their votes they also prevented the passage of the resolution of the honorable member from Georgia, and then they went home and took the lead in the Free Soil party And there they stand, Sir! They leave us here, bound in honor and conscience by the resolutions of annexation, they leave us here, to take the odium of fulfilling the obligations in favor of slavery which they voted us into, or else the greater odium of violating those obligations, while they are at home mak- 60 ing capital and rousing speeches for free soil and no slavery And therefore I say, Sir, that there is not a chapter in our history, respecting public measures and public men, more full of what would create surprise, more full of what does create, in my mind, extreme mortification, than that of the conduct of the Northern Democracy on this subject

Mr President, sometimes, when a man is found in a new relation to things around him and to other men, he says the world has changed and that he has not 70 changed I believe, Sir, that our self-respect leads us often to make this declaration in regard to ourselves when it is not exactly true. An individual is more apt to change, perhaps, than all the world around him But, under the present circumstances, and under the responsibility which I know I incur by what I am now stating here, I feel at liberty to recur to the various expressions and statements, made at various times, of my own opinions and resolutions respecting the admission of Texas, and all that has followed Sir, as early as 1836, 80 or in the early part of 1837, there was conversation and correspondence between myself and some private friends on this project of annexing Texas to the United States, and an honorable gentleman with whom I have had a long acquaintance, a friend of mine, now perhaps in this chamber, I mean General Hamilton, of South Carolina, was privy to that correspondence. I had voted for the recognition of Texan independence, because I believed it to be an existing fact, surprising and astonishing as it was, and I wished well to the new republic, but I manifested from the first utter opposition to bringing her, with her slave territory, into the Union I happened, in 1837, to make a public address to political friends in New York, and I then stated my sentiments upon the subject. It was the first time that I had occasion to advert to it; and I will ask a friend near me to have the kindness to read an extract from the speech 10 made by me on that occasion. It was delivered in Niblo's Garden, in 1837.

Mr. Greene then read the following extract from the speech of Mr. Webster, to which he referred.

"Gentlemen, we all see that, by whomsoever possessed, Texas is likely to be a slave-holding country. and I frankly avow my entire unwillingness to do any thing which shall extend the slavery of the African race on this continent, or add other slave-holding States to the Union When I say that I regard slavery in itself 20 as a great moral, social, and political evil, I only use language which has been adopted by distinguished men, themselves citizens of slave-holding States 1 shall do nothing, therefore, to favor or encourage its further extension We have slavery already amongst us. The Constitution found it in the Union, it recognized it. and gave it solemn guaranties. To the full extent of these guaranties we are all bound, in honor, in justice, and by the Constitution All the stipulations contained in the Constitution in favor of the slave-holding States 30 which are already in the Union ought to be fulfilled, and, so far as depends on me, shall be fulfilled, in the fulness of their spirit, and to the exactness of their letter Slavery, as it exists in the States, is beyond the reach of Congress It is a concern of the States themselves, they have never submitted it to Congress, and Congress has no rightful power over it I shall concur, therefore, in no act, no measure, no menace, no indication of purpose, which shall interfere or threaten to interfere with the exclusive authority of the several States over the sub-40 ject of slavery as it exists within their respective limits All this appears to me to be matter of plain and imperative duty

"But when we come to speak of admitting new States, the subject assumes an entirely different aspect. Our rights and our duties are then both different.

"I see, therefore, no political necessity for the an nexation of Texas to the Union, no advantages to be derived from it, and objections to it of a strong, and in my judgment, decisive character"

I have nothing, Sir, to add to, or to take from, those sentiments. That speech, the Senate will perceive, was made in 1837. The purpose of immediately annexing Texas at that time was abandoned or postponed, and it was not revived with any vigor for some years. In the mean time it happened that I had become a member of the executive administration, and was for a short period in the Department of State. The annexation of Texas was a subject of conversation, not confidential, with the President and heads of departments, as well as with other public men. No serious attempt was then made, however, to bring it about I left the Department of State in May, 1843, and shortly after I learned, though by means which were no way connected with official information, that a design had been taken up of bringing Texas, with her slave territory and population, into this Union. I was in Washington at the time, and persons are now here who will remember that we had an arranged meeting for conversation upon it I went home to Massachusetts and proclaimed the existence of that purpose, but I could get no audience and but little attention. Some did not believe it, and some were too much engaged in their own pursuits to give it any heed They had gone to their farms or to their merchandise. and it was impossible to arouse any feeling in New England, or in Massachusetts, that should combine the two great political parties against this annexation, and, indeed, there was no hope of bringing the Northern Democracy into that view, for their leaning was all the other way. But Sir, even with Whigs, and leading Whigs, I am ashamed to say, there was a great indifference towards the admission of Texas, with slave territory. into this Union.

The project went on. I was then out of Congress The annexation resolutions passed on the 1st of March, 1845, the legislature of Texas complied with the conditions and accepted the guaranties, for the language of the resolution is, that Texas is to come in "upon the conditions and under the guaranties herein prescribed"

I was returned to the Senate in March, 1845, and was here in December following, when the acceptance by Texas of the conditions proposed by Congress was communicated to us by the President, and an act for the consummation of the union was laid before the two houses The connection was then not completed. A final law, doing the deed of annexation ultimately, had not been passed, and when it was put upon its final passage here, l expressed my opposition to it, and recorded my vote in the negative, and there that vote stands, with the observations that I made upon that occasion. Nor is this the only occasion on which I have expressed myself to the same effect. It has happened that, between 1837 and this time, on various occasions, I have expressed my entire opposition to the admission of slave States, or the acquisition of new slave territories, to be added to the United States I know, Sir, no change in my own sentiments, or my own purposes, in that respect I will now ask my friend from Rhode Island to read another extract from a speech of mine made at a Whig Convention in Springfield, Massachusetts, in the month of September, 1847

Mr Greene here read the following extract

"We hear much just now of a panacea for the dangers ind evils of slavery and slave annexation, which they all the 'Wilmot Proviso' That certainly is a just seniment, but it is not a sentiment to found any new party upon It is not a sentiment on which Massachusetts Whigs differ There is not a man in this hall who holds o it more firmly than I do, nor one who adheres to it note than another

"I feel some little interest in this matter, Sir Did not commit myself in 1837 to the whole doctrine, fully, ntirely? And I must be permitted to say that I cannot juite consent that more recent discoverers should claim he merit and take out a patent

"I deny the priority of their invention Allow me to ly, Sir, it is not their thunder

"We are to use the first and the last and every occasion hich offers to oppose the extension of slave power

"But I speak of it here, as in Congress, as a political uestion, a question for statesmen to act upon We just so regard it. I certainly do not mean to say that is less important in a moral point of view, that it is not ore important in many other points of view, but as a legislator, or in any official capacity. I must look at it, consider it, and decide it as a matter of political action"

On other occasions, in debates here, I have expressed my determination to vote for no acquisition, or cession, 50 or annexation, north or south, east or west. My opinion has been, that we have territory enough, and that we should follow the Spartan maxim, "Improve, adorn what you have," seek no further I think that it was in some observations that I made on the three-million loan bill that I avowed this sentiment. In short, Sir, it has been avowed quite as often, in as many places, and before as many assemblies, as any humble opinions of mine ought to be avowed

But now that, under certain conditions, Texas is in 60 the Union, with all her territory, as a slave State, with a solemn pledge, also, that, if she shall be divided into many States, those States may come in as slave States south of 36° 30', how are we to deal with this subject? I know no way of honest legislation, when the proper time comes for the enactment, but to carry into effect all that we have stipulated to do I do not entirely agree with my honorable friend from Tennessee, that, as soon as the time comes when she is entitled to another representative, we should create a new State On former 70 occasions, in creating new States out of territories, we have generally gone upon the idea that, when the population of the territory amounts to about sixty thousand, we would consent to its admission as a State But it is quite a different thing when a State is divided, and two or more States made out of it. It does not follow in such a case that the same rule of apportionment should be applied That, however, is a matter for the consideration of Congress, when the proper time arrives. I may not then be here, I may have no vote to 80 give on the occasion, but I wish it to be distinctly understood, that, according to my view of the matter, this government is solemnly pledged, by law and contract, to create new States out of Texas, with her consent, when her population shall justify and call for such a proceeding, and, so far as such States are formed out of Texan territory lying south of 36° 30', to let them come in as slave States. That is the meaning of the contract which our friends, the Northern Democracy, have left us to fulfil, and I, for one, mean to fulfil it, because I will not 90 violate the faith of the government. What I mean to say is, that the time for the admission of new States formed out of Texas, the number of such States, their boundaries, the requisite amount of population, and all other things connected with the admission, are in the free discretion of Congress, except this, to wit, that, when new States formed out of Texas are to be admitted, they have a right by legal stipulation and contract, to come in as slave States

Now, as to California and New Mexico, I hold slavery to be excluded from those territories by a law even superior to that which admits and sanctions it in Texas I mean the law of nature, of physical geography, the law of the formation of the earth. That law settles for ever, with a strength beyond all terms of human enactment, that slavery cannot exist in California or New Mexico. Understand me, Sir, I mean slavery as we regard it, the slavery of the colored race as it exists in the Southern States I shall not discuss the point, but 20 leave it to the learned gentlemen who have undertaken to discuss it, but I suppose there is no slavery of that description in California now I understand that peomsm, a sort of penal servitude, exists there, or rather a sort of voluntary sale of a man and his offspring for debt, an arrangement of a peculiar nature known to the law of Mexico But what I mean to say is, that it is as impossible that African slavery, as we see it among us, should find its way, or be introduced, into California and New Mexico, as any other natural impossibility o California and New Mexico are Asiatic in their formation and scenery. They are composed of vast ridges of mountains of great height, with broken ridges and deep valleys The sides of these mountains are entirely barren; their tops capped by perennial snow. There may be in California, now made free by its constitution, and no doubt there are, some tracts of valuable land. But it is not so in New Mexico Pray, what is the evidence which every gentleman must have obtained on this subject, from information sought by himself or communicated by others? I have inquired and read all I could find, in order to acquire information on this important subject What is there in New Mexico that could, by any possibility, induce any body to go there with slaves? There are some narrow strips of tillable land on the borders of the rivers, but the rivers themselves dry up before midsummer is gone All that the people can do in that region is to raise some little articles, some little wheat for their tortillas, and that by irrigation. And who expects to see a hundred black men cultivating tobacco, corn, cotton, rice, or any thing else on lands in . New Mexico, made fertile only by irrigation?

I look upon it, therefore, as a fixed fact, to use the current expression of the day, that both California and New Mexico are destined to be free, so far as they are settled at all, which I believe, in regard to New Mexico, will be but partially for a great length of time, free by the arrangement of things ordained by the Power above us I have therefore to say, in this respect also, that this country is fixed for freedom, to as many persons as shall ever live in it, by a less repealable law than that which & attaches to the right of holding slaves in Texas, and I will say further, that, if a resolution or a bill were now before us, to provide a territorial government for New Mexico, I would not vote to put any prohibition into it whatever Such a prohibition would be idle, as it respects any effect it would have upon the territory, and I would not take pains uselessly to reaffirm an ordinance of nature, nor to reenact the will of God I would put in no Wilmot Proviso for the mere purpose of a taunt or a reproach. I would put into it no evidence of the 7 votes of superior power, exercised for no purpose but to wound the pride, whether a just and a rational pride, or an irrational pride, of the citizens of the Southern States I have no such object, no such purpose They would think it a taunt, an indignity, they would think it to be an act taking away from them what they regard as a proper equality of privilege. Whether they expect to realize any benefit from it or not, they would think it at least a plain theoretic wrong, that something more or less derogatory to their character and their rights had taken 8 place I propose to inflict no such wound upon any body, unless something essentially important to the country, and efficient to the preservation of liberty and freedom, is to be effected. I repeat, therefore, Sir, and, as I do not propose to address the Senate often on this subject, I repeat it because I wish it to be distinctly understood, that, for the reasons stated, if a proposition were now here to establish a government for New Mexico, and it was moved to insert a provision for a prohibition of slavery. I would not vote for it

Sir if we were now making a government for New Mexico, and any body should propose a Wilmor Proviso,

I should treat it exactly as Mr. Polk treated that provision for excluding slavery from Oregon Mr Polk was known to be in opinion decidedly averse to the Wilmot Proviso; but he felt the necessity of establishing a government for the territory of Oregon The proviso was in the bill, but he knew it would be entirely nugatory; and, since it must be entirely nugatory, since it took away no right, no describable, no tangible, no appreciable right of the South, he said he would sign the bill for the sake of enacting a law to form a government in that Territory, and let that entirely useless, and, in that connection, entirely senseless, proviso remain. Sir, we hear occasionally of the annexation of Canada, and if there be any man, any of the Northern Democracy, or any one of the Free Soil party, who supposes it necessary to insert a Wilmot Proviso in a territorial government for New Mexico, that man would of course be of opinion that it is necessary to protect the everlasting snows of Canada from the foot of slavery by the same overspreading wing of an act of Congress Sir, wherever there is a substantive good to be done, wherever there is a foot of land to be prevented from becoming slave territory, I am ready to assert the principle of the exclusion of slavery I am pledged to it from the year 1837, I have been pledged to it again and again, and I will perform those pledges, but I will not do a thing unnecessarily that wounds the feelings of others, or that does discredit to my own understanding

Now, Mr President, I have established, so far as I proposed to do so, the proposition with which I set out, and upon which I intend to stand or fall, and that is, that the whole territory within the former United States, or in the newly acquired Mexican provinces, has a fixed and settled character, now fixed and settled by law which cannot be repealed, in the case of Texas without a violation of public faith, and by no human power in regard to California or New Mexico; that, therefore, under one or other of these laws, every foot of and in the States or in the Territories has already eceived a fixed and decided character.

Mr President, in the excited times in which we live, here is found to exist a state of crimination and recrimnation between the North and South There are lists of grievances produced by each; and those grievances, real or supposed, alienate the minds of one portion of the bunery from the other, exasperate the feelings, and subdue the sense of fraternal affection, patriotic love, and mutual regard I shall bestow a little attention, Sir, upon these various grievances existing on the one side and on the other I begin with complaints of the South 3 I will not answer, further than I have, the general statements of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, that the North has prospered at the expense of the South in consequence of the manner of administering this government, in the collecting of its revenues, and so forth These are disputed topics, and I have no inclination to enter into them But I will allude to other complaints of the South, and especially to one which has in my opinion just foundation, and that is, that there has been found at the North, among individuals and 60 among legislators, a disinclination to perform fully their constitutional duties in regard to the return of persons bound to service who have escaped into the free States In that respect, the South, in my judgment, is right, and the North is wrong Every member of every Northern legislature is bound by oath, like every other officer in the country, to support the Constitution of the United States, and the article of the Constitution which says to these States that they shall deliver up fugitives from service is as binding in honor and con- 70 science as any other article. No man fulfils his duty in any legislature who sets himself to find excuses, evasions, escapes from this constitutional obligation. I have always thought that the Constitution addressed itself to the legislatures of the States or to the States themselves It says that those persons escaping to other States "shall be delivered up," and I confess I have always been of the opinion that it was an injunction upon the States themselves When it is said that a person escaping into another State, and coming therefore within the jurisdic- 80 tion of that State, shall be delivered up, it seems to me the import of the clause is, that the State itself, in obedience to the Constitution, shall cause him to be delivered up That is my judgment I have always entertained that opinion, and I entertain it now But when the subject, some years ago, was before the Supreme Court of the United States, the majority of the judges held that the power to cause fugitives from service to be delivered up was a power to be exercised under the authority of this government I do not know, on the 90 whole, that it may not have been a fortunate decision. My habit is to respect the result of judicial deliberations and the solemnity of judicial decisions. As it now stands, the business of seeing that these fugitives are delivered up resides in the power of Congress and the national judicature, and my friend at the head of the Judiciary Committee has a bill on the subject now before the Senate, which, with some amendments to it, I propose to support, with all its provisions, to the fullest extent And I desire to call the attention of all sober-minded men at the North, of all conscientious men, of all men 10 who are not carried away by some fanatical idea or some false impression, to their constitutional obligations I put it to all the sober and sound minds at the North as a question of morals and a question of conscience What right have they, in their legislative capacity or any other capacity, to endeavor to get round this Constitution, or to embarrass the free exercise of the rights secured by the Constitution to the persons whose slaves escape from them? None at all, none at all. Neither in the forum of conscience, nor before the face of the Con-20 stitution, are they, in my opinion, justified in such an attempt Of course it is a matter for their consideration They probably, in the excitement of the times, have not stopped to consider of this. They have followed what seemed to be the current of thought and of motives, as the occasion arose, and they have neglected to investigate fully the real question, and to consider their constitutional obligations, which, I am sure, if they did consider, they would fulfil with alacrity. I repeat, therefore. Sir, that here is a well-founded ground of com-30 plaint against the North, which ought to be removed, which it is now in the power of the different departments of this government to remove, which calls for the enactment of proper laws authorizing the judicature of this government, in the several States, to do all that is necessary for the recapture of fugitive slaves and for their restoration to those who claim them Wherever I go, and whenever I speak on the subject, and when I speak here I desire to speak to the whole North, I say that the South has been injured in this respect, and has a right 40 to complain, and the North has been too careless of what I think the Constitution peremptorily and emphatically enjoins upon her as a duty

Complaint has been made against certain resolutions that emanate from legislatures at the North, and are sent here to us, not only on the subject of slavery in this District, but sometimes recommending Congress to consider the means of abolishing slavery in the States. I should be sorry to be called upon to present any resolutions here which could not be referable to any committee or any power in Congress, and therefore I should s be unwilling to receive from the legislature of Massachusetts any instructions to present resolutions expressive of any opinion whatever on the subject of slavery, as it exists at the present moment in the States, for two reasons first, because I do not consider that the legislature of Massachusetts has any thing to do with it, and next, because I do not consider that I, as her representative here, have anything to do with it. It has become, in my opinion, quite too common, and if the legislatures of the States do not like that opinion, they 6 have a great deal more power to put it down than I have to uphold it. it has become, in my opinion, quite too common a practice for the State legislatures to present resolutions here on all subjects and to instruct us on all subjects. There is no public man that requires instruction more than I do, or who requires information more than I do, or desires it more heartily, but I do not like to have it in too imperative a shape. I took notice, with pleasure, of some remarks made upon this subject, the other day, in the Senate of Massachusetts, by a young man of talent and character, of whom the best hopes may be entertained I mean Mr Hillard He told the Senate of Massachusetts that he would vote for no instructions whatever to be forwarded to members of Congress, nor for any resolutions to be offered expressive of the sense of Massachusetts as to what her members of Congress ought to do He said that he saw no propriety in one set of public servants giving instructions and reading lectures to another set of public servants. To his own master each of them must stand or fall, and that master 8 is his constituents. I wish these sentiments could become more common. I have never entered into the question, and never shall, as to the binding force of instructions I will, however, simply say this if there be any matter pending in this body, while I am a member of it, in which Massachusetts has an interest of her own not adverse to the general interests of the country, I shall pursue her instructions with gladness of heart and with all the efficiency which I can bring to the occasion. But if the question be one which affects her interest, and at o the same time equally affects the interests of all the other States, I shall no more regard her particular wishes or instructions than I should regard the wishes of a man who might appoint me an arbitrator or referee to decide some question of important private right between him and his neighbor, and then instruct me to decide in his favor. If ever there was a government upon earth it is this government, if ever there was a body upon earth it is this body, which should consider itself as composed by agreement of all, each member appointed by some, but organized by the general consent of all, sitting here. to under the solemn obligations of oath and conscience, to do that which they think to be best for the good of the whole

Then, Sir, there are the Abolition societies, of which I am unwilling to speak, but in regard to which I have very clear notions and opinions I do not think them useful I think their operations for the last twenty years have produced nothing good or valuable. At the same time, I believe thousands of their members to be honest and good men, perfectly well-meaning men. They have a excited feelings, they think they must do something for the cause of liberty, and, in their sphere of action, they do not see what else they can do than to contribute to an Abolition press, or an Abolition society, or to pay an Abolition lecturer. I do not mean to impute gross motives even to the leaders of these societies, but I am not blind to the consequences of their proceedings. I cannot but see what mischiefs their interference with the South has produced. And is it not plain to every man? Let any gentleman who entertains doubts on this point recur to the debates in the Virginia House of Delegates in 1832, and he will see with what freedom a proposition made by Mr Jefferson Randolph for the gradual abolition of slavery was discussed in that body. Every one spoke of slavery as he thought, very ignominious and disparaging names and epithets were applied to it. The debates in the House of Delegates on that occasion, I believe, were all published They were read by every colored man who could read, and to those who could not read, those debates were read by others At that time Virginia was not unwilling or afraid to discuss this question, and to let that part of her population know as much of the discussion as they could learn. That was in 1832 As has been said by the honorable member from South Carolina. these Abolition societies commenced their course of action in 1835. It is said, I do not know how true it may be, that they sent incendiary publications into the slave States; at any rate, they attempted to arouse, and did arouse, a very strong feeling; in other words, they created great agitation in the North against Southern slavery Well, what was the result? The bonds of the slaves were bound more firmly than before, their rivets were more strongly fastened. Public opinion, which in Virginia had begun to be exhibited against slavery, and was opening out for the discussion of the question. drew back and shut itself up in its castle I wish to know whether any body in Virginia can now talk openly as Mr Randolph, Governor McDowell, and others talked in 1832, and sent their remarks to the press? We all know the fact, and we all know the cause; and every thing that these agitating people have done has been, not to enlarge, but to restrain, not to set free, but to bind faster, the slave population of the South.

Again, Sir, the violence of the Northern press is complained of. The press violent! Why, Sir, the press is violent everywhere. There are outrageous reproaches in the North against the South, and there are reproaches as vehement in the South against the North Sir, the extremists of both parts of this country are violent; they mistake loud and violent talk for eloquence and for reason. They think that he who talks loudest reasons ? best. And this we must expect, when the press is free, as it is here, and I trust always will be, for, with all its licentiousness and all its evil, the entire and absolute freedom of the press is essential to the preservation of government on the basis of a free constitution. Wherever it exists there will be foolish and violent paragraphs in the newspapers, as there are, I am sorry to say, foolish and violent speeches in both houses of Congress. In truth, Sir, I must say that, in my opinion, the vernacular tongue of the country has become greatly vittated, de 8 praved, and corrupted by the style of our Congressional debates And if it were possible for those debates to vitiate the principles of the people as much as they have depraved their tastes, I should cry out, "God save the Republic!"

Well, in all this I see no solid grievance, no grievance presented by the South, within the redress of the government, but the single one to which I have referred. and that is, the want of a proper regard to the injunction of the Constitution for the delivery of fugitive slaves.

There are also complaints of the North against the South I need not go over them particularly. The first and gravest is, that the North adopted the Constitution, recognizing the existence of slavery in the States, and recognizing the right, to a certain extent, of the representation of slaves in Congress, under a state of sentiment and expectation which does not now exist, and that, by events, by circumstances, by the eagerness of the South to acquire territory and extend her slave population, the North finds itself, in regard to the relative influence of the South and the North, of the free States and the slave 10 States, where it never did expect to find itself when they agreed to the compact of the Constitution They complain, therefore, that instead of slavery being regarded as an evil, as it was then, an evil which all hoped would be extinguished gradually, it is now regarded by the South as an institution to be cherished, and preserved, and extended, an institution which the South has already extended to the utmost of her power by the acquisition of new territory

Well, then, passing from that, every body in the North 20 reads and every body reads whatsoever the newspapers contain, and the newspapers, some of them, especially those presses to which I have alluded, are careful to spread about among the people every reproachful sentiment uttered by any Southern man bearing at all against the North, every thing that is calculated to exasperate and to alienate, and there are many such things, as every body will admit, from the South, or some portion of it, which are disseminated among the reading people, and they do exasperate, and alienate, and produce a most 30 mischievous effect upon the public mind at the North Sir, I would not notice things of this sort appearing in obscure quarters, but one thing has occurred in this debate which struck me very forcibly. An honorable member from Louisiana addressed us the other day on this subject. I suppose there is not a more amiable and worthy gentleman in this chamber, nor a gentleman who would be more slow to give offence to any body, and he did not mean in his remarks to give offence. But what did he say? Why, Sir, he took pains to run a contrast 40 between the slaves of the South and the laboring people of the North, giving the preference, in all points of condition, and comfort, and happiness, to the slaves of the South The honorable member, doubtless, did not suppose that he gave any offence, or did any injustice He was merely expressing his opinion. But does he know how remarks of that sort will be received by the laboring people of the North? Why, who are the laboring people of the North? They are the whole North They are the people who till their own farms with their own hands, freeholders, educated men, independent men, e Let me say, Sir, that five sixths of the whole property of the North is in the hands of the laborers of the North, they cultivate their farms, they educate their children. they provide the means of independence. If they are not freeholders, they earn wages, these wages accumulate, are turned into capital, into new freeholds, and small capitalists are created. Such is the case, and such the course of things, among the industrious and frugal And what can these people think when so respectable and worthy a gentleman as the member from Louisiana 6 undertakes to prove that the absolute ignorance and the abject slavery of the South are more in conformity with the high purposes and destiny of immortal, rational human beings, than the educated, the independent free labor of the North?

There is a more tangible and irritating cause of grievance at the North Free blacks are constantly employed in the vessels of the North, generally as cooks or stewards. When the vessel arrives at a Southern port, these free colored men are taken on shore, by the police or 7 municipal authority, imprisoned, and kept in prison till the vessel is again ready to sail. This is not only irritating, but exceedingly unjustifiable and oppressive Mr Hoar's mission, some time ago, to South Carolina, was a wellintended effort to remove this cause of complaint. The North thinks such imprisonments illegal and unconstitutional, and as the cases occur constantly and frequently, they regard it as a great grievance

Now, Sir, so far as any of these grievances have their foundation in matters of law, they can be redressed, and & ought to be redressed, and so far as they have their foundation in matters of opinion, in sentiment, in mutual crimination and recrimination, all that we can do is to endeavor to allay the agitation, and cultivate a better feeling and more fraternal sentiments between the South and the North

Mr. President, I should much prefer to have heard from every member on this floor declarations of opinion that this Union could never be dissolved, than the declaration of opinion by any body, that, in any case, under the pressure of any circumstances, such a dissolution was possible I hear with distress and anguish the word "secession," especially when it falls from the lips of those who are patriotic, and known to the country, and known all over the world, for their political services Secession! Peaceable secession! Sir, your eyes and mine are never destined to see that miracle. The dismemberment of this vast country without convulsion! The breaking up of the fountains of the great deep without ruffling the surface' Who is so foolish, I beg every body's pardon, as to expect to see any such thing? Sir, he who sees these States, now revolving in harmony around a common centre, and expects to see them quit their places and fly off without convulsion, may look the next hour to see the heavenly bodies rush from their spheres, and jostle against each other in the realms of space, without causing the wreck of the universe. There can be no such thing as a peaceable secession. Peaceable secession is an utter impossibility. Is the great Constitution under which we live, covering this whole country, is it to be thawed and melted away by secession, as the snows on the mountain melt under the influence of a vernal sun. disappear almost unobserved, and run off? No, Sir! No, Sir' I will not state what might produce the disruption of the Union, but, Sir, I see as plainly as I see the sun in heaven what that disruption itself must produce, I see that it must produce war, and such a war as I will not describe. in its twofold character.

Peaceable secession! Peaceable secession! The concurrent agreement of all the members of this great republic to separate' A voluntary separation, with alimony on one side and on the other Why, what would be the result? Where is the line to be drawn? What States are to secede? What is to remain American? What am I to be? An American no longer? Am I to become a sectional man, a local man, a separatist, with no country in common with the gentlemen who sit around me here, or who fill the other house of Congress? Heaven torbid' Where is the flag of the republic to remain? Where is the eagle still to tower? or is he to cower, and shrink, and fall to the ground? Why, Sir, our ancestors, our fathers and our grandfathers, those of them that are yet living amongst us with prolonged lives, would rebuke and reproach us, and our children and our grandchildren would cry out shame upon us, if we of this generation should dishonor these ensigns of the power of the government and the harmony of that Union which is every day felt among us with so much joy and gratitude What is to become of the army? What is to become of the navy? What is to become of the public 50 lands? How is each of the thirty States to defend itself? I know, although the idea has not been stated distinctly, there is to be, or it is supposed possible that there will be, a Southern Confederacy I do not mean, when I allude to this statement, that any one seriously contemplates such a state of things. I do not mean to say that it is true, but I have heard it suggested elsewhere, that the idea has been entertained, that, after the dissolution of this Union, a Southern Confederacy might be formed I am sorry, Sir, that it has ever been thought of, talked 60 of, or dreamed of, in the wildest flights of human imagination. But the idea, so far as it exists, must be of a separation, assigning the slave States to one side and the free States to the other Sir, I may express myself too strongly perhaps, but there are impossibilities in the natural as well as in the physical world, and I hold the idea of a separation of these States, those that are free to form one government, and those that are slave-holding to form another, as such an impossibility. We could not separate the States by any such line, if we were to 70 draw it. We could not sit down here to-day and draw a line of separation that would satisfy any five men in the country There are natural causes that would keep and tie us together, and there are social and domestic relations which we could not break if we would, and which we should not if we could

Sir, nobody can look over the face of this country at the present moment, nobody can see where its population is the most dense and growing, without being ready to admit, and compelled to admit, that ere long the 80 strength of America will be in the Valley of the Mississippi Well, now, Sir, I beg to inquire what the wildest enthusiast has to say on the possibility of cutting that river in two, and leaving free States at its source and on its branches, and slave States down near its mouth, each forming a separate government? Pray, Sir, let me say to the people of this country, that these things are worthy of their pondering and of their consideration Here, Sir, are five millions of freemen in the free States north of the river Ohio Can any body suppose that this 90 population can be severed, by a line that divides them from the territory of a foreign and an alien government. down somewhere, the Lord knows where, upon the lower banks of the Mississippi? What would become of Missourt? Will she join the arrondissement of the slave States? Shall the man from the Yellow Stone and the Platte be connected, in the new republic, with the man who lives on the southern extremity of the Cape of Florida? Sir, I am ashamed to pursue this line of remark I dislike it, I have an utter disgust for it I would rather hear of natural blasts and mildews, war, pestilence, and famine, than to hear gentlemen talk of secession. To break up this great government! to dismember this glorious country! to astonish Europe with an act of folly such as Europe for two centuries has never beheld in any government or any people!! No, Sir, no, Sir! There will be no secession! Gentlemen are not serious when they talk of secession

Sir. I hear there is to be a convention held at Nashville I am bound to believe that, if worthy gentlemen meet at Nashville in convention, their object will be to adopt conciliatory counsels, to advise the South to forbearance and moderation, and to advise the North to forbearance and 20 moderation, and to inculcate principles of brotherly love and affection, and attachment to the Constitution of the country as it now is I believe, if the convention meet at all, it will be for this purpose, for certainly, if they meet for any purpose hostile to the Union, they have been singularly inappropriate in their selection of a place I remember, Sir, that, when the treaty of Amiens was concluded between France and England, a sturdy Englishman and a distinguished orator, who regarded the conditions of the peace as ignominious to England, 30 said in the House of Commons, that, if King William could know the terms of that treaty, he would turn in his coffin! Let me commend this saving of Mr Windham, in all its emphasis and in all its force, to any persons who shall meet at Nashville for the purpose of concerting measures for the overthrow of this Union over the bones of Andrew Jackson!

Sir, I wish now to make two remarks, and hasten to a conclusion. I wish to say, in regard to Texas, that if it should be hereafter, at any time, the pleasure of the govto eriment of Texas to cede to the United States a portion, larger or smaller, of her territory which lies adjacent to New Mexico, and north of 36° 30' of north latitude, to be formed into free States, for a fair equivalent in money or in the payment of her debt, I think it an object well worthy the consideration of Congress, and I shall be happy to concur in it myself, if I should have a connection with the government at that time.

I have one other remark to make. In my observations upon slavery as it has existed in this country, and as it now exists, I have expressed no opinion of the mode of its extinguishment or melioration. I will say, however, though I have nothing to propose, because I do not deem myself so competent as other gentlemen to take any lead on this subject, that if any gentleman from the South shall propose a scheme, to be carried on by this government upon a large scale, for the transportation of free colored people to any colony or any place in the world, I should be quite disposed to incur almost any degree of expense to accomplish that object Nay, Sir, following an example set more than twenty years ago by a great man, then a Senator from New York, I would return to Virginia, and through her to the whole South. the money received from the lands and territories ceded by her to this government, for any such purpose as to remove, in whole or in part, or in any way to diminish or deal beneficially with, the free colored population of the Southern States I have said that I honor Virginia for her cession of this territory. There have been received into the treasury of the United States eighty millions of dollars, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands ceded by her. If the residue should be sold at the same rate, the whole aggregate will exceed two hundred millions of dollars If Virginia and the South see fit to adopt any proposition to relieve themselves from the free people of color among them, or such as may be made free, they have my full consent that the government shall pay them any sum of money out of the proceeds of that cession which may be adequate to the purpose

And now, Mr. President, I draw these observations to a close I have spoken freely, and I meant to do so I have sought to make no display. I have sought to enliven the occasion by no animated discussion nor have I attempted any train of elaborate argument I have wished only to speak my sentiments, fully and at length, being desirous, once and for all, to let the country know the opinions and sentiments which I entertain on all these subjects. These opinions are not likely to be suddenly changed. If there be any future service that I can render to the country, consistently with these sentiments and opinions, I shall cheerfully render it. If there be not, I shall still be glad to have had an opportunity to disburden myself from the bottom of my heart, and to make known every political sentiment that therein exists.

And now, Mr. President, instead of speaking of the o possibility or utility of secession, instead of dwelling in those caverns of darkness, instead of groping with those ideas so full of all that is horrid and horrible, let us come out into the light of day, let us enjoy the fresh air of Liberty and Union; let us cherish those hopes which belong to us; let us devote ourselves to those great objects that are fit for our consideration and our action: let us raise our conceptions to the magnitude and the importance of the duties that devolve upon us, let our comprehension be as broad as the country for which we act, our aspirations as high as its certain destiny. let us not be pigmies in a case that calls for men. Never did there devolve on any generation of men higher trusts than now devolve upon us, for the preservation of this Constitution and the harmony and peace of all who are destined to live under it. Let us make our generation one of the strongest and brightest links in that golden chain which is destined, I fondly believe, to grapple the people of all the states to this Constitution for ages to come. We have a great, popular, constitutional government, guarded by law and by judicature, and de- 30 fended by the affections of the whole people. No monarchical throne presses these States together, no iron chain of military power encircles them; they live and stand under a government popular in its form, representative in its character, founded upon principles of equality, and so constructed, we hope, as to last for ever. In all its history it has been beneficent, it has trodden down no man's liberty; it has crushed no State. Its daily respiration is liberty and patriotism, its vet vouthful veins are full of enterprise, courage, and honorable love 40 of glory and renown. Large before, the country has now, by recent events, become vastly larger. This republic now extends, with a vast breadth, across the whole continent. The two great seas of the world wash the one and the other shore We realize, on a mighty scale, the beautiful description of the ornamental border of the buckler of Achilles

"Now, the broad shield complete, the artist crown'd With his last band, and poured the ocean round, In living silver seem'd the waves to roll, And beat the buckler's verge, and bound the whole"

John Greenleaf Whittier

The background of John Greenleaf Whittier in more than one way helped make him one of the most effective battlers for abolition. Born on a farm near Haverhill, Massachusetts, educated in country schools, long a worker on his father's farm and at the cobbler's bench, he saw things through the eyes of a common man and his words were drawn from nature rather than art From Robert Burns, his first and most important model, he learned a simple style of versifying which pleased ordinary readers. A member of a religious sect which had contributed many great opponents of the slave system, Whittier followed the promptings of his Quaker inner light to work zealously for reform

For several decades Whittier devoted a large share of his energy to the antislavery cause. He was successful in practical politics, winning his own election to the Massachusetts legislature in 1835, acting as a lobbyist at the State House, and giving assistance to political leaders who were helpful to abolitionism. As a pamphleteer and as an editor of various periodicals, notably of the National Era (1845-1860), he attacked slavery ferociously. Finally, as a poet he composed fiery or touching songs which spoke directly to hosts of readers. His propagandistic verse, though far from great as poetry, was admirable as rhetoric. After broadside or newspaper publication, this work was brought together chiefly in Poems Written During the Progress of the Abolition Question . . . (1837), Voices of Freedom (1846), Songs of Labor and Other Poems (1850), and In War Time and Other Poems (1863).

After the war, Whittier turned to a field of work in which he had already shown proficiency—the portrayal of New England. It was as a local colorist that he did his most distinguished writing. (See Chapter 5 for this phase of his career.)

The Moral Warfare

When Freedom, on her natal day,
Within her war-rocked cradle lay,
An iron race around her stood,
Baptized her infant brow in blood;
And, through the storm which round her swept,
Their constant ward and watching kept

Then, where our quiet herds repose The roar of baleful battle rose, And brethren of a common tongue To mortal strife as tigers sprung, And every gift on Freedom's shrine Was man for beast, and blood for wine!

Our fathers to their graves have gone, Their strife is past, their triumph won; But sterner trials wait the race Which rises in their honored place, A moral warfare with the crime And folly of an evil time

So let it be In God's own might

We gird us for the coming fight,
And, strong in Him whose cause is ours
In conflict with unholy powers,
We grasp the weapons He has given,—
The Light, and Truth, and Love of Heaven.

Massachusetts to Virginia

Whither printed the following explanatory note with a later edition of the poem "Written on reading an account of the proceedings of the citizens of Norfolk, Virginia, in reference to George Latimer, the alleged fugitive slave, who was seized in Boston without warrant at the request of James B Grey, of Norfolk, claiming to be his master. The case caused great excitement North and South, and led to the presentation of a petition to Congress, signed by more than fifty thousand citizens of Massachusetts, calling for such laws and proposed amendments to the Constitution as should relieve the Commonwealth from all further participation in the crime of oppression. George Latimer himself was finally given free papers for the sum of four hundred dollars."

"Massachusetts to Virginia" is one of the most stirring of Whittier's poems against slavery. The use of place names, rich in association, is particularly effective

The blast from Freedom's Northern hills, upon its Southern way,

Bears greeting to Virginia from Massachusetts Bay, No word of haughty challenging, nor battle bugle's peal, Nor steady tread of marching files, nor clang of horsemen's steel

No trains of deep-mouthed cannon along our highways go.

Around our silent arsenals untrodden lies the snow,

And to the land-breeze of our ports, upon their errands far,

A thousand sails of commerce swell, but none are spread for war.

We hear thy threats, Virginia! thy stormy words and high Swell harshly on the Southern winds which melt along our sky,

Yet, not one brown, hard hand foregoes its honest labor here,

No hewer of our mountain oaks suspends his axe in fear.

Wild are the waves which lash the reefs along St. George's bank,

Cold on the shores of Labrador the fog lies white and dank,

Through storm, and wave, and blinding mist, stout are the hearts which man

The fishing-smacks of Marblehead, the seacoasts of Cape Ann

The cold north light and wintry sun glare on their icy forms.

Bent grimly o'er their straining lines or wrestling with the storms,

Free as the winds they drive before, rough as the waves they roam,

They laugh to scorn the slaver's threat against their rocky home

What means the Old Dominion? Hath she forgot the day When o'er her conquered valleys swept the Briton's steel array?

How side by side, with sons of hers, the Massachusetts men Encountered Tarleton's charge of fire, and stout Cornwallis, then?

Forgets she how the Bay State, in answer to the call
Of her old House of Burgesses, spoke out from Faneuil Hall'

When, echoing back her Henry's cry, came pulsing in each breath

Of Northern winds the thrilling sounds of "Liberty or Death!"

What asks the Old Dominion? If now her sons have proved False to their fathers' memory, false to the faith they loved.

If she can scoff at Freedom, and its great charter spurn, Must we of Massachusetts from truth and duty turn?

We hunt your bondmen, flying from Slavery's hateful hell.

Our voices, at your bidding, take up the bloodhound's yell,

We gather, at your summons, above our fathers' graves, From Freedom's holy altar-horns to tear your wretched slaves!

Thank God' not yet so vilely can Massachusetts bow,

The spirit of her early time is with her even now,

Dream not because her Pilgrim blood moves slow and calm and cool,

She thus can stoop her chainless neck, a sister's slave and tool!

All that a sister State should do, all that a free State may, Heart, hand, and purse we proffer, as in our early day, But that one dark loathsome burden ye must stagger with alone.

And reap the bitter harvest which ye yourselves have sown!

Hold, while ye may, your struggling slaves, and burden God's free air

With woman's shriek beneath the lash, and manhood's wild despair,

Cling closer to the "cleaving curse" that writes upon your plains

The blasting of Almighty wrath against a land of chains

Still shame your gallant ancestry, the cavaliers of old,

By watching round the shambles where human flesh is sold,

Gloat o'er the newborn child, and count his market value, when

The maddened mother's cry of woe shall pierce the slaver's den'

Lower than plummet soundeth, sink the Virginia name, Plant, if ye will, your fathers' graves with rankest weeds of shame.

Be, if ye will, the scandal of God's fair universe;

We wash our hands forever of your sin and shame and curse.

You've spurned our kindest counsels; you've hunted for our lives:

And shaken round our hearths and homes your manacles and gyves!

We wage no war, we lift no arm, we fling no torch within The fire-damps of the quaking mine beneath your soil of sin.

Ichahod

"Ichabod" first appeared, May 2, 1850, in the National Era, the organ of the "American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society," which was published in Washington and of which Whittier was an editor. In his collected poems Whittier supplied the following note "This poem was the outcome of the surprise and grief and forecast of evil consequences which I felt on reading the seventh of March speech of Daniel Webster in support of the 'compromise' and the Fugitive Slave Bill No partisan or personal enmity dictated it. On the contrary my admiration of the splendid personality and intellectual power of the areat senator was never stronger than when I laid down his speech, and, in one of the saddest moments of my life, penned my protest . . . in tones of stern and sorrowful rebuke"

The title is taken from I Samuel 4.21: "And she named the child Ichabod, saying, the glory is departed from Israel "

So fallen' so lost' the light withdrawn Which once he wore' The glory from his gray hairs gone Forevermore!

Revile him not,-the Tempter hath A snare for all. And pitying tears, not scorn and wrath. Befit his fall!

Oh, dumb be passion's stormy rage, When he who might Have lighted up and led his age, Falls back in night

Scorn! would the angels laugh, to mark
A bright soul driven,
Fiend-goaded down the endless dark.

Frend-goaded, down the endless dark, From hope and heaven!

Let not the land once proud of him Insult him now,

Nor brand with deeper shame his dim, Dishonored brow

But let its humbled sons, instead, From sea to lake,

A long lament, as for the dead, In sadness make

Of all we loved and honored, naught Save power remains,—

A fallen angel's pride of thought, Still strong in chains

All else is gone, from those great eyes

The soul has fled.

When faith is lost, when honor dies,

Then, pay the reverence of old days
To his dead fame,
Walk backward, with averted gaze,

And hide the shame!

The man is dead!

Barbara Frietchie

The story of "Barbara Frietchie" was told to Whittier in a letter by a Mrs Southworth of Georgetown, D C For Mrs Southworth's account, which Whittier regarded as authentic and which he followed closely in the poem, see S T Pickard, Life and Letters of John Greenteaf Whittier, II, 454-456. The historical authenticity of the narrative has been denied by Allen Tate, who remarks in his Stonewall Jackson: "Among the women . whom General Jackson never saw, was an old woman named Barbara Frietchie" But whether fact or myth, the story became in Whittier's hands one of the most successful ballads of the Civil War

"Barbara Frietchie" was first printed in the Atlantic Monthly, October 1863.

Up from the meadows rich with corn, Clear in the cool September morn,

The clustered spires of Frederick stand Green-walled by the hills of Maryland

Round about them orchards sweep, Apple and peach tree fruited deep,

Fair as the garden of the Lord To the eyes of the famished rebel horde,

On that pleasant morn of the early fall When Lee marched over the mountain-wall,

Over the mountains winding down, Horse and foot, into Frederick town

Forty flags with their silver stars, Forty flags with their crimson bars,

Flapped in the morning wind the sun Of noon looked down, and saw not one

Up rose old Barbara Frietchie then, Bowed with her fourscore years and ten,

Bravest of all in Frederick town

She took up the flag the men hauled down,

In her attic window the staff she set, To show that one heart was loyal yet.

Up the street came the rebel tread, Stonewall Jackson riding ahead

"Halt!"—the dust-brown ranks stood fast.
"Fire!"—out blazed the rifle-blast.

It shivered the window, pane and sash: It rent the banner with seam and gash.

Ouick, as it fell, from the broken staff Dame Barbara snatched the silken scarf

She leaned far out on the window-sill And shook it forth with a royal will Shoot, if you must, this old gray head, But spare your country's flag," she said

A shade of sadness, a blush of shame, Over the face of the leader came.

The nobler nature within him stirred To life at that woman's deed and word.

"Who touches a hair of yon gray head Dies like a dog! March on:" he said

All day long through Frederick street Sounded the tread of marching feet

All day long that free flag tost Over the heads of the rebel host.

Fver its torn folds rose and fell On the loyal winds that loved it well.

And through the hill-gaps sunset light Shone over it with a warm good-night

Barbara Frietchie's work is o'er And the Rebel rides on his raids no more

Honor to ber! and let a rear Fall for her sake on Stonewall's bier

Over Barbara Frietchie's grave, Flag of Freedom and Union, wave'

Peace and order and beauty draw Round thy symbol of light and law,

And ever the stars above look down On thy stars below in Frederick town! 30

Whittier supplied the following note to this poem "On hearing the bells ring on the passage of the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery. The resolution was adopted by Congress, January 31, 1865. The ratification by the requisite number of states was announced December 18. 1865 "

The Latin title means "Praise be to God" Writing with Hebraic fervor, Whittier drew extensively (as the footnotes will point out) upon the imagery and phraseology of the Old Testament

It is done!

Clang of bell and roar of gun Send the tidings up and down How the belfries rock and reel! How the great guns, peal on peal, Fling the joy from town to town!

Ring, O Bells! Every stroke exulting tells Of the burial hour of crime Loud and long, that all may hear, Ring for every listening ear Of Eternity and Time!

Let us kneel

God's own voice is in that peal, And this spot is holy ground Lord, forgive us' What are we, That our eyes this glory see. That our ears have heard the sound!

For the Lord On the whirlwind is abroad. In the earthquake He has spoken. He has smitten with His thunder

19 Lord . . whirlwind. Compare Job 38 1: "Then the Lord answered Job out of the whirlwind"

The iron walls asunder, And the gates of brass are broken!

Loud and long
Lift the old exulting song,
Sing with Miriam by the sea,
He has cast the mighty down,
Horse and rider sink and drown;
"He hath triumphed gloriously!"

Did we dare,
In our agony of prayer,
Ask for more than He has done?
When was ever His right hand
Over any time or land
Stretched as now beneath the sun?

How they pale,
Ancient myth and song and tale,
In this wonder of our days,
When the cruel rod of war
Blossoms white with righteous law,
And the wrath of man is praise!

Blotted out!
All within and all about
Shall a fresher life begin,

Freer breathe the universe
As it rolls its heavy curse
On the dead and buried sin!

It is done!
In the circuit of the sun
Shall the sound thereof go forth.
It shall bid the sad rejoice,
It shall give the dumb a voice,
It shall belt with joy the earth!

Ring and swing,
Bells of joy! On morning's wing
Send the song of praise abroad!
With a sound of broken chains
Tell the nations that He reigns,
Who alone is Lord and God!

George L. Aiken

Although obscure as both an actor and a playwright, George L. Aiken in 1852 wrote, in Uncle Tom's Cabin, a drama destined to have an almost continuous stage history from its first production down to the present day. It is a drama with notable faults, to be sure; but by and large it has stirred more Americans than any other native play Somewhere, this very year, some little theater groups and several showboat or traveling companies are doubtless acting out this drama. Because it appeals to something very basic in popular taste, one may learn a great deal about Americans by studying this old play.

Few details are known about Aiken's life. He was born in Boston on December 19, 1830. How much education he had is not known. Eventually, however, he was attracted to the stage, and in 1848 he made his debut in Providence, Rhode Island By 1851 he had begun to write for the stage his Orion, based upon a novel. was produced that year In 1852 G. C. Howard, manager of the Museum in Troy, New York, decided that a play based upon Mrs Harriet Beecher Stowe's famous novel, L'ncle Tom's Cabin (1852), would provide excellent rôles tor his daughter and his wife, and he commissioned Asken to write such a dramatization. The play opened in September 1852, with Cordelia Howard playing Eva, her mother playing Topsy, and with Aiken assuming two rôles-those of George Shelby and George Harris The play ran a hundred nights in Troy, moved on to Albany, and then to New York In New York it ran for 325 consecutive performances. Given by other companies in various cities-Philadelphia, Detroit, Chicago, and elsewhere-it was also notably successful. It became one of the great stand-bys for itinerant companies and has continued to be popular down to the present

Aiken's later work was undistinguished He continued to act and to write plays, most of them evanescent melodramas After retiring from the stage in 1867, Aiken wrote dramas and fictional works until his death, April 27, 1876

Much of the early appeal of the play doubtless derived from the fact that it treated a subject of contemporary controversy-slavery. There were additional and more lasting appeals, however, which Asken managed to preserve when, with relatively few changes, he turned Mrs Stowe's sensationally popular novel into a play. The daughter of one preacher and the wife of another, Mrs Stowe had exalted the piety of Little Eva and the slaves in a way certain to touch the hearts of religious Americans. Moreover, her pictures "of slave families broken up for sale, ailing and dying children, Negro women at the mercy of their masters, white households which at best are slovenly and extravagant . . . and at worst are abodes of brutality and license" were certain, as Mr. Carl Van Doren has pointed out, to deeply move readers and theatergoers who idolized the family. Finally, the stark melodrama of Negroes battling for their freedom-the race of Eliza across the ice, the underground railway, physical skirmishes—offered primitive elements of excitement.

Aiken's chief contribution was to work in most of the more interesting scenes in the novel and to point up the comic elements. In addition, as did many of the other producers of the play, he took certain liberties with Mrs Stowe's plot Chief among these was his alteration of the circumstances of St. Clare's and Legrees deaths. In the novel, St. Clare, shortly after Little Eva's death, was killed accidentally while trying to separate two unidentified brawlers in a café; Legree came to a timely end, a victim of delirium tremens and remorse The stabbing of St. Clare apparently served no other purpose in Mrs. Stowe's plot than to bring about the selling of Uncle Tom and the other slaves Aiken's version heightened the drama and perhaps provided a certain poetic justice by having it revealed in Act V that the tavern brawlers had been Gumption Cute and Legree, and that it had been Legree's bowie knifeaimed at Cute-which had struck the fatal blow at the innocent St. Clare. Armed with the knowledge that Legree was a murderer, Cute and the lawyer Marks planned to confront him at his plantation and to blackmail him, demanding a thousand dollars for their silence. Legree resisted, however, and was shot by Marks

Comedy looms large in the drama, much of it the most popular kind—that of type characters. Phineas is a typical Kentuckian of the period, incongruously turned Quaker. Topsy exploits the comic vein of minstrel show caricatures of Negroes Ophelia is a Yankee spinster comparable to those limned by the popular humorist Miriam Whitcher in the 1850's Gumption Cute, played for a long while by the famous character actor, Joseph Jefferson, is a pawky Yankee comparable to Smith's Jack Downing or, perhaps more accurately, Lowell's Birdofredum Sawin.

Tears, excitement, and laughter are thus combined in a play which, despite its lumbering construction and rather crude characterization, is a great document in our social and political history. America has, strictly speaking, no real folk plays. But Uncle Tom's Cabin comes closer to being one than any other.

ACT I

SCENE I Plain Chamber Enter Eliza, meeting George

ELIZA. Ah! George, is it you? Well, I am so glad you've come! [GEORGE regards her mountfully.] Why don't you smile, and ask after Harry?

GEORGE. [Bitterly,] I wish he'd never been born! I wish I'd never been born myself!

ELIZA. [Sinking ber head upon his breast and weeping] Oh, George!

GEORGE. There, now, Eliza, it's too bad for me to make you feel so Oh! how I wish you had never seen 10 me-vou might have been happy!

ELIZA. George! George! how can you talk so? What dreadful thing has happened, or is going to happen? Im sure we've been very happy till lately.

GEORGE. So we have, dear But oh! I wish I'd never seen vou, nor vou me.

ELIZA. Oh, George' how can you?

GEORGE Yes, Eliza, it's all misery! The very life is burning out of me' I'm a poor, miserable, forlorn drudge! I shall only drag you down with me, that's all' What's the use of our trying to do anything-trying to know anything-trying to be anything? I wish I was dead!

ELIZA. Oh' now, dear George, that is really wicked I know how you feel about losing your place in the fac tory, and you have a hard master, but pray be patient-

GEORGE. Patient' Haven't I been patient? Did I say a word when he came and took me away-for no earthly reason-from the place where everybody was kind to me? I'd paid him truly every cent of my earnings, and they all say I worked well

ELIZA. Well, it is dreadful, but, after all, he is you master, you know

GEORGE My master! And who made him my master: That's what I think of! What right has he to me? I'n as much a man as he is! What right has he to make : dray-horse of me2-to take me from things I can do better than he can, and put me to work that any horse can do? He tries to do it, he says he'll bring me dowi and humble me, and he puts me to just the hardest meanest and dirtiest work, on purpose

ELIZA Oh, George' George' you frighten me Why I never heard you talk so I'm afraid you'll do some thing dreadful. I don't wonder at your feelings at all but oh! do be careful-for my sake, for Harry's

GEORGE. I have been careful, and I have been patien but it's growing worse and worse—flesh and blood can bear it any longer. Every chance he can get to insu and torment me he takes He says that though I don say anything, he sees that I've got the devil in me, an he means to bring it out, and one of these days it wi come out, in a way that he won't like, or I'm mistake

ELIZA Well, I always thought that I must obey m master and mistress, or I couldn't be a Christian

GEORGE There is some sense in it in your case. The have brought you up like a child-fed you, clothed yo and taught you, so that you have a good education-th is some reason why they should claim you. But I have been kicked and cuffed and sworn at, and what do owe? I've paid for all my keeping a hundred time over. I won't bear it!—no, I won't! Master will find out that I'm one whipping won't tame My day will come yet, if he don't look out!

ELIZA What are you going to do? Oh! George, non't do anything wicked, if you only trust in heaven and try to do right, it will deliver you

GEORGE. Eliza, my heart's full of bitterness. I can't trust in heaven. Why does it let things be so?

ELIZA Oh, George! we must all have faith Mistress says that when all things go wrong to us, we must believe that heaven is doing the very best.

GEORGE. That's easy for people to say who are sitting on their sofas and riding in their carriages, but let them be where I am—I guess it would come some harder I wish I could be good, but my heart burns and can't be reconciled You couldn't, in my place, you can't now, if I tell you all I've got to say, you don't know the whole yet

ELIZA. What do you mean?

GEORGE Well, lately my master has been saying that he was a fool to let me marry off the place—that he hates Mr Shelby and all his tribe—and he says he won't let me come here any more, and that I shall take a wife and settle down on his place

ELIZA But you were married to me by the minister, as much as if you had been a white man

GEORGE Don't you know I can't hold you for my wife if he chooses to part us? That is why I wish I'd never seen you—it would have been better for us both—it would have been better for our poor child if he had never been born

ELIZA. Oh! but my master is so kind

GEORGE Yes, but who knows?—he may die, and then Harry may be sold to nobody knows who What pleasure is it that he is handsome and smart and bright? I tei! you, Eliza, that a sword will pierce through your soul for every good and pleasant thing your child is or has It will make him worth too much for you to keep.

ELIZA. Heaven forbid!

GEORGE. So, Eliza, my girl, bear up now, and goodby, for I'm going

ELIZA. Going, George' Going where?

GEORGE. To Canada; and when I'm there I'll buy you—that's all the hope that's left us You have a kind master, that won't refuse to sell you I'll buy you and the boy—heaven helping me, I will!

ELIZA. Oh, dreadful! If you should be taken?

GEORGE. I won't be taken, Eliza—I'll die first! I'll be free, or I'll die!

ELIZA You will not kill yourself?

GEORGE No need of that, they will kill me, fast enough I will never go down the river alive

ELIZA. Oh, George! for my sake, do be careful Don't lay hands on yourself, or anybody else. You are tempted too much, but don't. Go, if you must, but go carefully, prudently, and pray heaven to help you!

GEORGE. Well, then, Eliza, hear my plan I m going home quite resigned, you understand, as if all was over I've got some preparations made, and there are those that will help me, and in the course of a few days I shall be among the missing Well, now, good-by

ELIZA. A moment-our boy

GEORGE. [Choked with emotion.] True, I had forgotten him, one last look, and then farewell!

ELIZA. And heaven grant it be not forever! [Exeunt.]

SCENE II A dining-room Table and chairs Dessert, wine, etc., on table Shelby and Haley discovered at table

SHELBY That is the way I should arrange the matter HALEY. I can't make trade that way—I positively can't, Mr Shelby [Drinks.]

SHEI BY Why, the fact is, Haley, Tom is an uncommon fellow! He is certainly worth that sum anywhere—steady, 70 honest, capable, manages my whole farm like a clock!

HALEY. You mean honest, as niggers go [Fills glass.] SHELBY. No, I mean, really, Tom is a good, steady, sensible, pious fellow. He got religion at a camp-meeting, four years ago, and I believe he really did get it I've trusted him since then, with everything I have—money, house, horses, and let him come and go round the country, and I always found him true and square in everything!

HALEY Some folks don't believe there is pious 80 niggers, Shelby, but I do. I had a fellow, now, in this yer last lot I took to Orleans—'twas as good as a meetin' now, really, to hear that critter pray, and he was quite gentle and quiet like. He fetched me a good sum, too, for I bought him cheap of a man that was 'bliged to sell out, so I realized six hundred on him Yes, I consider religion a valeyable thing in a nigger, when it's the genuine article and no mistake.

SHELBY. Well, Tom's got the real article, if ever a fellow had Why, last fall I let him go to Cincinnati alone, to do business for me and bring home five hundred dollars

"Tom," says I to him, "I trust you, because I think you are a Christian—I know you wouldn't cheat." Tom comes back sure enough, I knew he would. Some low fellows, they say, said to him—"Tom, why don't you make tracks for Canada."

"Ah, master trusted me, and I couldn't," was his answer. They told me all about it. I am sorry to part with Tom, I must say. You ought to let him cover the whole balance of the debt, and you would, Haley, if you had any conscience

HALEY. Well, I've got just as much conscience as any man in business can afford to keep, just a little, you know, to swear by, as 'twere, and then I'm ready to do anything in reason to 'blige friends, but this yer, you see, is a leetle too hard on a fellow—a leetle too hard' [Fills glass again.]

SHELBY. Well, then, Haley, how will you trade?

HALEY. Well, haven't you a boy or a girl that you could throw in with Tom?

SHELBY. Hum! none that I could well spare, to tell the truth, it's only hard necessity makes me willing to sell at all I don't like parting with any of my hands, that's a fact [HARRY rins in] Hulloa! Jim Crow! [Throws a bunch of rations towards him.] Pick that up now [HARR1 does so]

HALEY. Bravo, little 'un' [Throws an orange, which HARRY catches. He sings and dances around the stage] Hurrah! Bravo! What a young 'un' That chap's a case, I'll promise Tell you what, Shelby, fling in that chap, and I'll settle the business Come, now, if that ain't doing the thing up about the rightest!

[ELIZA enters. Starts on beholding HALEY, and gazes fearfully at HARRY, who runs and clings to her dress, showing the orange. etc.]

SHELBY. Well, Eliza?

ELIZA. I was looking for Harry, please, sir

SHELBY. Well, take him away, then

[ELIZA grasps the child eagerly in her arms, and casting another glance of apprehension at HALEY, exiting hastily.]

HALEY. By Jupiter! There's an article, now. You 40 might make your fortune on that ar gal in Orleans any day I've seen over a thousand in my day, paid down for gals not a bit handsomer.

SHELBY. I don't want to make my fortune on her Another glass of wine. [Fills the glasses.]

HALEY. [Drinks and smacks his lips.] Capital wine—first chop! Come, how will you trade about the gal? What shall I say for her? What'll you take?

SHELBY. Mr. Haley, she is not to be sold. My wife wouldn't part with her for her weight in gold.

HALEY. Ay, ay' women always say such things, 'cause they hain't no sort of calculation. Just show 'em how many watches, feathers and trinkets one's weight in gold would buy, and that alters the case, I reckon.

SHELBY. I tell you, Haley, this must not be spoken of—I say no. and I mean no

HALEY. Well, you'll let me have the boy tho', you must own that I have come down pretty handsomely for him

SHELBY. What on earth can you want with the child?

HALEY. Why, I've got a friend that's going into this yer branch of the business—wants to buy up handsome boys to raise for the market Well, what do you sav?

SHELBY I'll think the matter over and talk with my wife

HALEY. Oh, certainly, by all means, but I'm in a devil of a hurry, and shall want to know as soon as possible, what I may depend on [Rises and puts on his overcoat, which hangs on a chair. Takes hat and whip.]

SHELBY Well, call up this evening, between six and seven, and you shall have my answer

HALEY All right Take care of yourself, old boy!

[Exit]

SHELBY. If anybody had ever told me that I should sell Tom to those rascally traders, I should never have believed it. Now it must come for aught I see, and Eliza's child too So much for being in debt, heighof The fellow sees his advantage and means to push it [Exit.]

Scene III Snowy Landscape Uncle Tom's Cabin Snow on roof Practicable door and window Dark Stage Music Enter Eliza hastily, with Harry in her arms

ELIZA. My poor boy, they have sold you, but your mother will save you yet! [Goes to Cabin and taps on window. AUNT CHLOF appears at window with a large white night-cap on]

CHLOE. Good Lord! what's that? My sakes alive if it ain't Lizy! get on your clothes, old man, quick! I'm gwine to open the door [The door opens and CHLOE enters, followed by UNCLE TOM. in his shirt sleeves, holding a tallow candle.]

TOM [Holding the light towards ELIZA.] Lord bless you! I'm skeered to look at ye, Lizy! Are ye tuck sick, or what's come over ye?

ELIZA. I'm running way, Uncle Tom and Aunt Chloe, carrying off my child! Master sold him!

TOM and CHLOE Sold him!

ELIZA. Yes, sold him! I crept into the closet by mistress' door to-night and heard master tell mistress that he had sold my Harry, and you, Uncle Tom, both, to a trader, and that the man was to take possession tomorrow

CHLOE The good Lord have pity on us! Oh! it don't seem as if it was true. What has he done that master should sell bim2

ELIZA. He hasn't done anything-it isn't for that Master don't want to sell, and mistress-she's always good I heard her plead and beg for us, but he told her twas no use-that he was in this man's debt, and he had got the power over him, and that if he did not pay him off clear, it would end in his having to sell the place and all the people and move off.

CHLOE. Well, old man, why don't you run away, too? Will you wait to be toted down the river, where they kill niggers with hard work and starving? I'd a heap rather die than go there, any day! There's time for ye, be off with Lizy-you've got a pass to come and go any time Come, bustle up, and I'll get your things together

10M. No, no-I ain't going Let Eliza go-it's her right I wouldn't be the one to say no-'tain't in natur for her to stay; but you heard what she said? If I must be sold, or all the people on the place, and everything go to rack, why, let me be sold. I s'pose I can bar it as well as any one. Mas'r always found me on the spothe always will I never have broken trust, nor used my pass no ways contrary to my word, and I never will. It's better for me to go alone, than to break up the place and sell all Mas'r ain't to blame, and he'll take care of you and the poor little 'uns! [Overcome.]

CHLOE. Now, old man, what is you gwine to cry for? Does you want to break this old woman's heart? [Crying]

ELIZA I saw my husband only this afternoon, and I st little knew then what was to come He told me he was going to run away Do try, if you can, to get word to him Tell him how I went and why I went, and tell him I'm going to try and find Canada You must give my love to him, and tell him if I never see him again on earth, I trust we shall meet in heaven!

TOM Dat is right, Lizy, trust in the Lord-He is our best friend-our only comforter

ELIZA. You won't go with me, Uncle Tom?

TOM No, time was when I would, but the Lord's 60 given me a work among these yer poor souls, and I'll stay with 'em and bear my cross with 'em till the end It's different with you-it's more'n you could stand, and you'd better go if you can ELIZA. Uncle Tom, I'll try it!

TOM Amen! The Lord help ve! [Exit ELIZA and HARRY

CHLOE What is you gwine to do, old man? What's to become of you?

TOM [Solemnly] Him that saved Daniel in the den 70 of lions-that saved the children in the fiery furnace-Him that walked on the sea and bade the winds be still-He's alive vet' and I've faith to believe He can deliver me!

CHLOE You is right, old man

TOM The Lord is good unto all that trust Him, Chloe [Exeunt into Cabin.]

SCENE IV Room in Tavern by the river side A large window, through which the river is seen, filled with floating ice Moonlight Table and chairs brought on. Enter Phineas.

PHINEAS. Chaw me up into tobaccy ends! how in the name of all that's onpossible om I to get across that yer pesky river? It's a reg'lar blockade of ice! I prom- 80 ised Ruth to meet her to-night, and she'll be into my har if I don't come. [Goes to window.] Thar's a conglomerated prospect for a loveyer! What in creation's to be done? That thar river looks like a permiscuous ice-cream shop come to an awful state of friz If I war on the adjacent bank, I wouldn't care a teetotal atom Rile up, you old varmint, and shake the ice off your back!

[Enter ELIZA and HARRY.]

ELIZA. Courage, my boy—we have reached the river Let it but roll between us and our pursuers, and we are safe! [Goes to window.] Gracious powers! the river is choked with cakes of ice!

PHINEAS. Holloa, gal!—what's the matter? You look kind of streaked

ELIZA. Is there any ferry or boat that takes people 10 over now?

PHINEAS Well, I guess not, the boats have stopped running

ELIZA. [In dismay.] Stopped running/

PHINEAS Maybe you're wanting to get over—any-body sick? Ye seem mighty anxious

ELIZA. I—I—I've got a child that's very dangerous I never heard of it till last night, and I've walked quite a distance to-day, in hopes to get to the ferry

PHINEAS. Well, now, that's onlucky, I m re'lly conzo sarned for ye That's a man, a piece down here, that's going over with some truck this evening, if he duss to, he'll be in here to supper to-night, so you'd better set down and wait That's a smart little chap. Say, young 'un, have a chaw tobaccy? [Takes out a large plug and a bowie-knise]

ELIZA No, no! not any for him

PHINEAS Oh' he don't use it, eh? Hain't come to it yet? Well. I have [Cuts off a large piece, and returns the plug and knife to pocket] What's the matter with 30 the young 'un'? He looks kind of white in the gills!

ELIZA Poor fellow! he is not used to walking, and I've hurried him on so PHINEAS. Tuckered, eh? Well, there's a little room there, with a fire in it. Take the babby in there, make yourself comfortable till that thar ferryman shows his countenance—I'll stand the damage.

ELIZA How shall I thank you for such kindness to a stranger?

PHINEAS. Well, if you don't know how, why, don t try, that's the teetotal Come, vamoose! [Exit ELIZA and HARRY.] Chaw me into sassage meat, if that ain't a perpendicular fine gal' she's a reg'lar A No 1 sort of female! How'n thunder am I to get across this refrigerated stream of water? I can't wait for that ferryman. [Enter MARKS.] Halloa! what sort of a critter's this? [Advances.] Say, stranger, will you have something to drink?

MARKS. You are excessively kind. I don't care if I do PHINEAS. Ah! he's a human Halloa, that! bring us a jug of whisky instantaneously, or expect to be teetotally chawed up! Squat yourself, stranger, and go in for enjoyment [They sit at table.] Who are you, and what's your name?

MARKS I am a lawyer, and my name is Marks

PHINEAS. A land shark, eh? Well, I don't think no worse on you for that The law is a kind of necessary evil, and it breeds lawyers just as an old stump does fungus Ah! here's the whisky [Enter WAITER, with jug and tumblers. Places them on table.] Here, you—take that shin-plaster [Gives bill.] I don't want any change—thar's a gal stopping in that room—the balance will pay for her—dye hear?—vamoose! [Exit WAITER.—Fills glass.] Take hold, neighbour Marks—don't shirk the critter Here's hoping your path of true love may never have an ice-choked river to cross! [They drink]

MARKS. Want to cross the river, eh?

PHINEAS. Well, I do, stranger Fact is, I'm in love with the teetotalist piett girl, over on the Ohio side, that ever wore a Qualter bonnet Take another swig, neighbour [Fills glasses, and they drink.]

MARKS. A Quaker, eh?

PHINEAS. Yes—kind of strange, ain't it? The way of it was this —I used to own a grist of niggers—had 'em to work on my plantation, just below here Well. stranger, do you know I fell in with that gal—of course I was considerably smashed—knocked into a pretty conglomerated heap—and I told her so She said she wouldn't hear a word from me so long as I owned a nigger'

MARKS. You sold them, I suppose

PHINEAS You're teetotally wrong, neighbour I gave them all their freedom, and told 'em to vamoose'

MARKS. Ah' yes—very noble, I dare say, but rather expensive This act won you your lady-love, eh?

PHINEAS. You're off the track again, neighbour She felt kind of pleased about it, and smiled, and all that; but she said she could never be mine unless I turned Quaker! Thunder and earth! what do you think of that? You're a lawyer—come, now, what's your opinion? Don't you call it a knotty point?

MARKS. Most decidedly. Of course you refused PHINFAS. Teetotally, but she told me to think better of it, and come to-night and give her my final conclusion Chaw me into mincemeat, if I haven't made up my mind to do it!

MARKS. You astonish me

PHINEAS. Well, vou see, I can't get along without that gal,-she's sort of fixed my flint, and I'm sure to hang fire without her I know I shall make a queer sort of Ouaker, because you see, neighbour, I ain't precisely the kind of material to make a Quaker out of

MARKS. No, not exactly

PHINEAS. Well, I can't stop no longer I must try to get across that candaverous river some way. It's getting late-take care of yourself, neighbour lawyer I m a teetotal victim to a pair of black eyes Chaw me up to feed hogs if I'm not in a ruinatious state! [Exit.]

MARKS. Queer genius, that, very! [Enter TOM 10KFR | So you've come at last

IOKER Yes [Looks into jug.] Empty! Waiter! more whisky! [WAITER enters with jug, and removes the onbty one]

[Enter HALEY.]

HALEY. By the land' if this yer ain't the nearest, now, to what I've heard people call Providence! Why, Loker, how are ye?

LOKER The devil' What brought you here, Haley? HALEY. [Sitting at table] I say, Tom, this yer's the luckiest thing in the world. I'm in a devil of a hobble, ind you must help me out!

LOKER. Ugh! aw! like enough A body may be pretty sure of that when you're glad to see 'em, or can make something off of 'em What's the blow now?

HALEY You've got a friend here-partner, perhaps? LOKER. Yes, I have Here, Marks-here's that ar tellow that I was with in Natchez

MARKS [Grasping HALEY'S hand.] Shall be pleased with his acquaintance Mr Haley, I believe?

HALEY. The same, sir The fact is, gentlemen, this morning I bought a young 'un of Shelby up above here His mother got wind of it, and what does she do but cut her lucky with him; and I'm afraid by this time that she has crossed the river, for I tracked her to this very place

MARKS So, then, ye're fairly sewed up, ain't ye' He! he' he' he' It's neatly done, too.

HALEY. This young 'un business makes lots of trouble in the trade

MARKS. Now, Mr Haley, what is it? Do you want us to undertake to catch this gal?

HALEY. The gal's no matter of mine—she's Shelby's— ! it's only the boy. I was a fool for buying the monkey LOKER You're generally a fool!

MARKS Come now, Loker, none of your huffs, you see, Mr Haley's a-puttin' us in a way of a good job, I reckon, just hold still—these yer arrangements are my forte This yer gal, Mr Haley-how is she?-what is she?

[FLIZA appears, with HARRY, listening.]

HALEY Well, white and handsome-well brought up I'd have given Shelby eight hundred or a thousand, and then made well on her

MARKS White and handsome-well brought up! Look here, now, Loker, a beautiful opening We'll do a business here on our own account. We does the catchin', the boy, of course, goes to Mr Haley-we takes the gal to Orleans to speculate on Aint it beautiful?

[They confer together]

ELIZA. Powers of mercy, protect met How shall I escape these human bloodhounds? Ah! the window-the river of ice! That dark stream lies between me and liberty! Surely the ice will bear my trifling weight. It is my only chance of escape—better sink beneath the cold waters, with my child locked in my arms, than have him torn from me and sold into bondage. He sleeps upon my breast-Heaven, I put my trust in thee! [Gets out of window]

MARKS Well, Tom Loker, what do you say?

LOKER. It'll do! [Strikes his hand violently on the table - ELIZA screams - They all start to their feet .--ELIZA disappears

HALEY. By the land, there she is now! [They all rush to the window]

MARKS She's making for the river!

LOKER. Let's after her!

[They all leap through the window.—Change]

SCENE V Snowy Landscape Enter Eliza, with Harry, hurriedly

ELIZA. They press upon my footsteps-the river is my only hope! Heaven grant me strength to reach it, ere they overtake me! Courage, my child!—we will be free —or perish' [Rushes off.]

[Enter LOKER, HALEY and MARKS.]

HALEY. We'll catch her yet, the river will stop her!

MARKS. No, it won't, for look! she has jumped upon the ice! She's a brave gal, anyhow!

LOKER. She'll be drowned

HALLY. Curse that young 'un I shall lose him, after all LOKER. Come on, Marks, to the ferry!

HALEY. Aye, to the ferry!—a hundred dollars for a boat! [They rush off.]

SCENE VI The entire depth of stage, representing the Ohio River filled with Floating Ice Bank on right hand Eliza appears, with Harry, on a cake of ice, and floats slowly across Haley, Loker and Marks, on bank, right hand, observing Phineas on opposite shore

ACT II

SCENE I A Handsome Parlour Marie discovered reclining on a sofa

MARIE [Looking at a note] What can possibly detain St Clare? According to this note, he should have been here a fortnight ago [Noise of carriage without] I do believe he has come at last

[EVA runc in]

EVA Mamma! [Throws her arms around MARIF'S neck, and kisses her.]

MARIF That will do—take care, child—don't you make my head ache! [Kivies ber languidly.]

[Enter ST CLARE, OPHELIA, and TOM, nicely dressed] ST. CLARE Well, my dear Marie, here we are at last

The wanderers have arrived, you see Allow me to present my cousin, Miss Ophelia, who is about to undertake the office of our housekeeper

MARIE [Rising to a sitting posture.] I am delighted to see you How do you like the appearance of our city?

EVA. [Running to OPHELIA.] Oh! is it not beautiful? My own darling home!—is it not beautiful?

OPHELIA Yes, it is a pretty place, though it looks rather old and heathenish to me

ST. CLARE Tom, my boy, this seems to suit you?

TOM. Yes, mas'r, it looks about the right thing ST. CLARE. See here, Marie, I've brought you a coachman, at last, to order I tell you, he's a regular hearse fo blackness and sobriety, and will drive you like a funeral if you wish Open your eyes, now, and look at him Now, don't say I never think about you when I'm gone

MARIE. I know he'll get drunk

ST. CLARE. Oh! no he won't He's warranted a pious and sober article

MARIE. Well, I hope he may turn out well, it's more than I expect, though

ST. CLARE. Have you no curiosity to learn how and where I picked up Tom?

EVA Uncle Tom, papa, that's his name

ST CLARE. Right, my little sunbeam!

TOM Please, mas'r, that ain't no 'casion to say nothing bout me

ST CLARE You are too modest, my modern Hannibal Do you know, Marie, that our little Eva took a fancy to Uncle Tom—whom we met on board the steamboat—and persuaded me to buy him?

MARIE. Ah! she is so odd!

ST. CLARF As we approached the landing, a sudden rush of the passengers precipitated Eva into the water— MARIE Gracious heavens!

ST CLARE A man leaped into the river, and, as she rose to the surface of the water, grasped her in his arms, and held her up until she could be drawn on the boat again. Who was that man, Eva?

FVA Uncle Tom! [Runs to him—He lifts her in his arms—She kisses him.]

TOM The dear soul!

OPHELIA. [Astonished] How shiftless!

ST. CLARE. [Overhearing her] What's the matter now, pray?

OPHELIA. Well, I want to be kind to everybody, and I wouldn't have anything hurt, but as to kissing—

ST. CLARE Niggers! that you're not up to, hey?

OPHELIA Yes, that's it-how can she?

ST. CLARE. Oh' bless you, it's nothing when you are used to it'

OPHELIA I could never be so shiftless!

EVA Come with me, Uncle Tom, and I will show you about the house [Crosses with Tom]

TOM Can I go, mas'r?

ST CLARE Yes, Tom, she is your little mistress—your only duty will be to attend to her!

[TOM bows and exits]

MARIE Eva, my dear!

EVA Well, mamma?

MARIE. Do not exert yourself too much!

EVA No, mamma! [Runs out]

OPHELIA [Lifting up her hands.] How shiftless!

ST CLARE sats next to MARIE on sofa-OPHELIA next to ST. CLARE]

ST CLARE Well, what do you think of Uncle Tom. Marie?

MARIE He is a perfect behemoth!

ST CLARE Come, now Marie, be gracious, and say something pretty to a fellow!

MARIE You've been gone a formight beyond the time! ST CLARE Well, you know I wrote you the reason MARIE Such a short, cold letter!

ST CLARE Dear me' the mail was just going, and it had to be that or nothing

MARIE That's just the way, always something to mike your journeys long and letters short!

SI CLARE Took at this [Takes in elegant velvet case from his pocket! Here's a present I got for you in New York-a daguerreotype of Eva and myself

MARIE [Looks at it with a division of air] What made you sit in such an awkward position?

ST CLARE Well, the position may be a matter of opinion, but what do you think of the likeness?

MARIE [Closing the case snapp shly] If you don't think anything of my opinion in one case. I suppose you wouldn't in another OPHELIA [Sententiously, ande] How shiftless!

ST CLARE Hang the woman' Come, Marie, what do you think of the likeness? Don't be nonsensical now

MARIE It's very inconsiderate of you, St Clare, to insist on my talking and looking at things. You know I've been lying all day with the sick headache, and there's been such a rumult made ever since you came, Im half dead!

OPHELIA You re subject to the sick headache, ma'am? MARIE Yes, I'm a perfect martyr to it!

OPHELIA Juniper-berry tea is good for sick headache, at least, Molly, Deacon Abraham Perry's wife, used to say so, and she was a great nurse

ST CLARE I'll have the first juniper-berries that get ripe in our garden by the lake brought in for that especial purpose Come, cousin, let us take a stroll in the garden Will you join us, Marie?

MARIE. I wonder how you can ask such a question, when you know how fragile I am I shall retire to my chamber and repose till dinner time [Exit.]

OPHELIA. [Looking after bet.] How shiftless!

ST. CLARE Come, cousin' [As he goes out] Look out for the babies! If I step upon anybody, let them 50 mention it

OPHELIA Babies under toot! How shiftless! [Exeunt.]

SCENE II A Garden Tom discovered, seated on a bank, with Eva on his knee, his button-holes are filled with flowers, and Eva is hanging a wreath around his neck Enter St. Clare and Ophelia, observing

EVA Oh, Tom, you look so funny

TOM [Sees ST (LARF, and puts EVA down] I begs pardon, mas r, but the young missis would do it Look ver. Im like the ox, mentioned in the Good Book, dressed for the sacrifice

ST CLARE I say, what do you think, Pussy? Which do you like the best-to live as they do at your uncle's, up in Vermont, or to have a house full of servants, as 60 me do?

IVA Oh! of course our way is the pleasantest

ST CLARE [Patting her head] Why so?

EVA Because it makes so many more round you to love, you know

OPHLLIA Now, that's just like Fva-just one of her odd speeches

EVA Is it an odd speech, papa?

ST. CLARE Rather, as this world goes, Pussy But where has my little Eva bren?

EVA Oh! I've been up in Tom's room, hearing him sing

ST CLARE Hearing Tom sing, hey?

EVA Oh, yes! he sings such beautiful things about the new Jerusalem, and bright angels and the land of Canaan

ST CLARE I dare say, it's better than the opera, isn't 117

EVA Yes, and he's going to teach them to me

ST CLARE Singing lessons, hey? You are coming on EVA Yes, he sings for me, and I read to him in my Bible, and he explains what it means Come, Tom [She takes his hand and they exit]

ST. CLARE. [Aude.] Oh, Evangeline! Rightly named, hath not heaven mide thee an evangel to me?

OPHELIA. How shiftless! How can you let her? ST. CLARE Why not?

OPHELIA. Why, I don't know, it seems so dreadful. ST CLARE. You would think no harm in a child's caressing a large dog, even if he was black, but a cleature that can think, reason and feel, and is immortal, you shudder at Confess it, cousin I know the feeling among some of you Northerners well enough. Not that there is a particle of virtue in our not having it, but custom with us does what Christianity ought to do obliterates the feeling of personal prejudice. You loathe them as you would a snake or a toad, yet you are indignant at their wrongs. You would not have them abused, but you don't want to have anything to do with them yourselves. Isn't that it?

OPHELIA. Well, cousin, there may be some truth in this

ST CLARE What would the poor and lowly do without children? Your little child is your only true democrat. Tom, now, is a hero to Eva, his stories are wonders in her eyes, his songs and Methodist hymns are better than an opera, and the traps and little bits of trash in his pockets a mine of jewels, and he the most wonderful. Tom that ever wore a black skin. This is one of the roses of Eden that the Lord has dropped down expressly for the poor and lowly, who get few enough of any other kind.

OPHELIA It's strange, cousin, one might almost think you was a professor, to hear you talk

ST. CLARE. A professor?

OPHELIA Yes, a professor of religion

ST. CLARE. Not at all, not a professor as you town folks have it, and, what is worse, I'm afraid, not a practicer, either OPHELIA What makes you talk so, then?

ST. CLARE. Nothing is easier than talking My forte lies in talking, and yours, cousin, lies in doing. And speaking of that puts me in mind that I have mide a purchase for your department. There's the article now Here, Topsy! [Whistles. TOPSY runs on.]

OPHELIA. Good gracious! what a heathenish, shiftless looking object! St. Clare, what in the world have you brought that thing here for?

ST. CLARE For you to educate, to be sure, and train in the way she should go I thought she was a rather funny specimen in the Jim Crow line Here, Topsy, give us a song, and show us some of your dancing

[TOPSY sings a verse and dances a breakdown.]

OPHELIA [Paralyzed.] Well, of all things' If I ever saw the like!

ST. CLARE. [Smothering a laugh.] Topsy, this is your new mistress—I'm going to give you up to her See now that you behave yourself

TOPSY Yes mas r

ST. CLARE. You're going to be good, Topsy, you understand?

TOPSY. Oh, yes, mas'r

OPHELIA Now, St Claic, what upon earth is this for? Your house is so full of these plagues now, that a body can't set down their foot without treading on 'em I get up in the morning and find one asleep behind the door, and see one black head poking out from under the table—one lying on the door mat and they are moping and mowing and grinning between all the railings, and tumbling over the kitchen floor! What on earth did you want to bring this one for?

ST. CLARE. For you to educate—didn't I tell you? You're always preaching about educating, I thought I would make you a present of a fresh caught specimen and let you try your hand on her and bring her up in the way she should go

OPHELIA. I don't want her, I am sure. I have more to do with 'em now than I want to

ST. CLARE That's you Christians all over You'll get up a society, and get some poor massionary to spend all his days among just such heathens, but let me see one of you that would take one into your house with you, and take the labour of their conversion upon yourselves:

OPHELIA Well, I didn't think of it in that light It might be real missionary work Well, I'll do what I can [Advances to TOPSY.] She's dreadful dirty and shiftless! How old are you, TOPSY?

TOPSY. Dunno, missis

OPHELIA. How shiftless! Don't know how old you are? Didn't anybody ever tell you? Who was your mother?

TOPSY. [Grinning.] Never had none

OPHELIA. Never had any mother? What do you mean? Where was you born?

TOPSY Never was born.

OPHELIA. You mustn't answer me in that way I'm not playing with you Tell me where you was born, and who your father and mother were?

10PSY Never was born, tell you, never had no father, nor mother, nor nothin' I war raised by a speculator, with lors of others Old Aunt Sue used to take care on us

ST CLARE She speaks the truth, cousin Speculators but them up cheap, when they are little, and get them raised for the market

OPHELIA. How long have you lived with your master and mistress?

TOPSY Dunno, missis

OPHELIA. How shiftless! Is it a year, or more, or less? TOPSY. Dunno, missis

SI CLARE She does not know what a year is, she don't even know her own age

OPHFUA. Have you ever heard anything about heaven, Topsy? [TOPSY looks beurlilered and grint.]
Do you know who made you?

FOPSY Nobody, as I knows on, he, he, he' I 'spect I growed Don't think nobody never made me

OPHELIA The shiftless heathen! What can you do? What did you do for your master and mistress?

TOPSY. Fetch water—and wash dishes—and rub knives—and wait on folks—and dance breakdowns OPHELIA. I shall break down, I'm afraid, in trying to make anything of you you shiftless mortal!

ST. CLARE. You find virgin soil there, cousin, put in your own ideas—you won't find many to pull up [Exil langhing]

OPHELIA [Takes out her handkerchief—a pair of gloves falls TOPSY picks them up slyly and puts them m her sleeve.] Follow me, you benighted innocent!

10PSY Yes, missis [As OPHELIA turns her back to her, she seizes the end of the ribbon she wears around her usist, and twitches it off—OPHELIA turns and sees her as she is putting it in her other sleeve—OPHELIA takes ribbon from her]

OPHELIA. What's this? You naughty, wicked girl, You've been stealing this?

TOPSY. Laws' why, that ar's missis' ribbon, ain't it? How could it got caught in my sleeve?

OPHELIA. Topsy you naughty girl, don't you tell me a lie—you stole that ribbon'

TOPSY. Missis, I declare for't, I didn't—never seed it till dis yer blessed minnit OPHELIA. Tops), don't you know it's wicked to tell

TOPSY I never tells no lies, missis, it's just de truth I ve been telling now, and nothing else

OPHELIA. Topsy, I shall have to whip you, if you tell lies so

TOPSY Laws, missis, if you's to whip all day, couldn't say no other way. I never seed dat ar—it must a got caught in my sleeve. [Blubbers.]

OPHELIA. [Serzes her by the shoulders] Don't you rell me that agun, you barefaced fibber! [Shakes her.—The gloves fall on stage] There you, my gloves too—you outrageous young heathen! [Picks them up.] Will you tell me, now, you didn't steal the ribbon?

TOPSY. No, missis, stole de gloves, but didn't steal de ribbon. It was permiskus

OPHELIA Why, you young reprobate!

TOPSY. Yes-I's knows I's wicked!

OPHELIA Then you know you ought to be punished [Boxes her ears] What do you think of that?

TOPSY He he, he' De Lord, missis, dat wouldn't kill a 'skeeter' [Runs off laughing—OPHELIA follows indignantly]

SCENE III The Tavern by the River Table and chairs Jug and glasses on table. On flat is a printed placard, headed "Four Hundred Dollars Reward—Runaway—George Harrisl" Phineas is discovered, seated at table.

PHINEAS So yer I am, and a pretty business I've to undertook to do Find the husband of the gal that crossed the river on the ice two or three days ago. Ruth said I must do it, and I'll be teetotally chawed up if I don't do it. I see they've offered a reward for him, dead or alive. How in creation am I to find the varmint? He isn't likely to go round looking natural, with a full description of his hide and figure staring him in the face. [Enter MR WILSON.] I say, stranger, how are ye? [Rises and comes forward.]

WILSON Well, I reckon

PHINEAS. Any news' [Takes out plug and knife.] WILSON. Not that I know of PHINEAS [Cutting a piece of tobacco and offering it.] Chaw?

WILSON. No, thank ye--it don't agree with me

PHINEAS. Don't, eh? [Putting it in his own mouth.]

I never felt any the worse for it

WILSON. [Sees placard.] What's that?

PHINFAS Nigger advertised [Advances towards it and spits on it.] There's my mind upon that

WILSON. Why, now stranger, what's that for?

PHINEAS. I'd do it all the same to the writer of that ar paper, if he was here. Any man that owns a boy like that and can't find any better way of treating him than to branding him on the hand with the letter H, as that paper states, deserves to lose him. Such papers as this ar' a shame to old Kaintuck! that's my mind right out, if any-body wants to know.

WILSON Well, now, that's a fact

PHINFAS I used to have a gang of boys, sir—that was before I fell in love—and I just told 'em —"Boys, says I, 'run now! Dig' put! jest when you want to I never shall come to look after you!" That's the way I kept mine Let 'em know they are free to run any time, and it jest stops their wanting to It stands to reason it should Treat 'em like men, and you'll have men's work

WILSON I think you are altogether right, friend, and this man described here is a fine fellow—no mistake about that He worked for me some half dozen years in my bagging factory, and he was my best hand, sir. He is an ingenious fellow, too, he invented a machine for the cleaning of hemp—a really valuable affair, it's gone into use in several factories. His master holds the patent of it

PHINEAS I'll warrant ye, holds it, and makes money so out of it, and then turns round and brands the boy in his right hand! If I had a fair chance, I'd mark him, I reckon, so that he'd carry it one while!

[Enter GEORGE HARRIS, disguised]

GEORGE [Speaking as he enters] Jim, see to the trunks [Seer WILSON] Ah! Mr Wilson here?

WILSON Bless my soul, can it be?

GEORGE [Advances and gravpy his hand] Mr Wilson, I see you remember me, Mr Butler, of Oaklands, Shelby county

wilson. Ye-yes-yes-sir

PHINEAS. Halloa! there's a screw loose here somewhere. That old gentleman seems to be struck into a pretty considerable heap of astonishment. May I be teetotally chawed up! if I don't believe that's the identical man I'm arter [Crosses to GEORGE] How are ye, George Harris?

GEORGE. [Starting back and thrusting his hands into his breast] You know me?

PHINEAS Ha, ha, ha! I rather conclude I do, but don't get riled, I ain't a bloodhound in disguise

GEORGE How did you discover me?

PHINEAS By a teetotal smart guess. You're the very man I want to see. Do you know I was sent after you?

GLORGE Ah! by my master?

PHINEAS No, by your wife

GEORGE My wife! Where is she?

PHINEAS She's stopping with a Quaker family over on the Ohio side

GFORGE Then she is safe?

PHINEAS Teetotally!

GEORGE Conduct me to her

PHINEAS Just wait a brace of shakes and I'll do it I've got to go and get the boat ready "Twon't take me but a minute—make yourself comfortable till I get back Chaw me up! but this is what I call doing things in short order [Exit]

WILSON George!

GEORGE Yes, George!

WILSON I couldn't have thought it!

GFORGE I am pretty well disguised, I fancy, you see I don't answer to the advertisement at all

WILSON George, this is a dangerous game you are playing, I could not have advised you to it

GFORGE I can do it on my own responsibility

WILSON. Well, George I suppose you're running away—leaving your lawful master George (I don't wonder at it), at the same time, I'm sorry, George, yes, decidedly I think I must say that it's my duty to tell you so

GEORGE Why are you sorry, sir2

WILSON Why, to see you, as it were, setting yourself in opposition to the laws of your country

GEORGE My country! What country have I, but the grave? And I would to heaven that I was laid there!

WILSON. George, you ve got a hard master, in fact he is—well, he conducts himself reprehensibly—I can't pretend to defend him. I'm sorry for you, now, it's a bad case—very bad, but we must all sudmit to the indications of Providence, George, don't you see?

GEORGE. I wonder, Mr Wilson, if the Indians should come and take you a prisoner away from your wife and children, and want to keep you all your life hoeing corn for them, if you'd think it your duty to abide in the condition in which you were called? I rather imagine that you'd think the first stray horse you could find an indication of Providence, shouldn't you?

wilson Really, George, putting the case in the somewhat peculiar light—I don't know—under those circumstances—but what I might. But it seems to me you are running an awful risk. You can't hope to carry it out If you're taken it will be worse with you than ever, they'll only abuse you, and half kill you, and sell you down river.

GEORGE. Mr Wilson, I know all this I do run a risk, but—[Throws open coat and shows pistols and knife in his belt] There' I'm ready for them Down South I never will go! no, if it comes to that, I can earn myself at least six feet of free soil—the first and last I shall ever own in Kentucky!

wilson. Why, George, this state of mind is awful it's getting really desperate. I'm concerned. Going to break the laws of your country?

GEORGE My country again! Sir, I haven't any country any more than I have any father I don't want anything of your country, except to be left alone—to go peaceably out of it, but if any man tries to stop me, let him take care, for I am desperate I'll fight for my liberty, to the last breath I breathe! You say your fathers did it, if it was right for them, it is right for me!

WILSON [Walking up and down, and fanning his face with a large yellow silk handkerchief] Blast 'cm all' Haven t I always said so—the infernal old cusses' Bless me' I hope I ain't swearing now' Well, go ahead, George, go ahead But be careful, my boy, don't shoot an body, unless—well, you'd better not shoot—at least I wouldn't hit anybody, you know

GEORGE Only in self-defense

WILSON Well, well [Fumbling in his pocket.] I suppose, perhaps, I ain't following my judgment—hing it, I won't follow my judgment So here, George Tikes out a pocket-book and offers GEORGE a roll of bills.]

GEORGE No, my kind, good sir, you've done a great deal for me, and this might get you into trouble I have money, enough I hope to take me as far as I need it

WILSON No, but you must, George Money is a great help everywhere, can't have too much, if you get it honestly. Take it, do take it, now do, my boy!

GEORGE. [Taking the money.] On condition, sir, that I may repay it at some future time, I will.

WILSON. And now, George, how long are you going to travel in this way? Not long or far, I hope? It's well so carried on, but too bold

GEORGE Mr Wilson, it is so bold, and this tavern is so near, that they will never think of it, they will look for me on ahead, and you yourself wouldn't know me.

WILSON But the mark on your hand?

GEORGE. [Draws off his glove and shows scar.] That is a parting mark of Mr Harris' regard. Looks interesting, doesn't it? [Puts on glove again.]

WILSON I declare, my very blood runs cold when I think of it—your condition and your risks!

GEORGE Mine has run cold a good many years, at present, it's about up to the boiling point

WILSON George, something has brought you out wonderfully. You hold up your head, and move and speak like another man GFORGE. [Proudly] Because I'm a freeman. Yes, sir, I've said "master" for the last time to any man I'm free!

WILSON. Take care! You are not sure, you may be taken

GEORGE. All men are free and equal in the grave, if it comes to that, Mr Wilson

[Enter PHINEAS]

PHINEAS Them's my sentiments, to a teetotal atom, and I don't care who knows it! Neighbour, the boat is ready, and the sooner we make tracks the better. I've seen some mysterious strangers lurking about these diggings, so we'd better put GEORGE. Farewell, Mr Wilson, and heaven reward you for the many kindnesses you have shown the poor fugitive!

WILSON. [Grasping his hand] You're a brave fellow, George I wish in my heart you were safe through, though—that's what I do

PHINEAS And ain't I the man of all creation to put him through, stranger? Chaw me up if I don't take him to his dear little wife, in the smallest possible quantity of time. Come, neighbour, let's vamoose

GEORGE Farewell, Mr Wilson

WILSON My best wishes go with you, George. [Extl.]
PHINEAS You're a trump, old Slow-and-Easy
GEORGE. [Looking off.] Look! Look!

PHINEAS. Consarn their picters, here they come! We can't get out of the house without their seeing us. We're teetotally treed!

GEORGE. Let us fight our way through them!

PHINFAS. No, that won't do, there are too many of them for a fail fight—we should be chawed up in no time [Looks round and sees trap door] Holloa! here's a cellar door Just you step down here a few minutes, while I parley with them [Lifts trap]

GEORGE I am resolved to perish sooner than surrender! [Goes down trap]

PHINEAS. That's your sort' [Closes trap and stands on tt] Here they are!

[Enter HALEY, MARKS, LOKER and three MEN]

HALEY. Say, stranger, you haven't seen a runaway darkey about these parts, eh/

PHINEAS What kind of a darkey?

HALEY. A mulatto chap, almost as light-complextioned as a white man

PHINEAS Was he a pretty good-looking chap?

HALEY Yes

PHINEAS Kind of tall?

HALEY. Yes

PHINEAS With brown hair?

HALEY. Yes

PHINEAS And dark eyes?

HALEY. Yes

PHINEAS Pretty well dressed?

HALEY. Yes

PHINEAS Scar on his right hand?

30 HALEY Yes, yes

PHINEAS. Well, I ain't seen him

HALEY. Oh, bother! Come, boys, let's search the house [Exeunt]

PHINEAS [Raises trap] Now, then, neighbour George [GEORGF enters, up trap] Now's the time to cut your lucky

GEORGF. Follow me, Phineas [Exit]

PHINEAS. In a brace of shakes [Is cloving trap as HALEY, MARKS, LOKER, etc., re-enter.]

HALEY. Ah! he's down in the cellar Follow me, boys!

[Thrusts PHINEAS asule, and rushes down trap, followed by the others. PHINEAS cloves trap and stands on st.]

PHINEAS. Chaw me up' but I've got em all in a trap [Knocking below.] Be quiet, you pesky varmints' [Knocking] They're getting mighty oneasy [Knocking.] Will you be quiet, you savagerous critters! [The trap is forced open. HALEY and MARKS appear PHINEAS serzes a chair and stands over trap.] Down with you or I ll smash you into apple-fritters! [Tableau.]

SCENE IV A Plain Chamber

TOPSY. [Without.] You go long No more nigger dan you be! [Enters—shouts and laughter without—looks off.] You seem to think yourself white folks. You ain't nerry one—black nor white. I'd like to be one or turrer. Law! you niggers, does you know you's all sinners? Well, you is—everybody is. White folks is sinners too—Miss. Feely says so—but I 'spects niggers is the biggest ones. But Lor'! ye ain t any on ye up to me. I's so awful wicked there can't nobody do nothin' with me. I used to keep old missis a-swarin' at me half de time. I spects I's de wickedest critter in de world. [Song and dance introduced.]

[Enter EVA]

EVA. Oh, Topsy! Topsy! you have been very wrong again

TOPSY Well, I 'spects I have

EVA What makes you do so?

TOPSY I dunno, I spects it's cause Is so wicked

EVA Why did you spoil Jane's earrings?

TOPSY 'Cause she's so proud She called me a little black imp, and turned up her pretty nose at me 'cause she is whiter than I am I was gwine by her room, and I seed her coral earnings lying on de table, so I threw dem on de floor, and put my foot on em, and scrunched em all to little bits—he! Is so wicked

EVA Don't you know that was very wrong?

TOPSY I don't car' I despises dem what sets up for fine ladies, when dey ain't nothin' but cream-coloured niggers! Dere's Miss Rosa—she gives me lots of 'pertinent remarks. T'other night she was gwine to ball. She put on a beau'ful dress that missis give her—wid her har curled, all nice and pretty. She hab to go down de back stairs—dey am dark—and I puts a pail of hot water on dem, and she puts her foot into it, and den she go tumblin to de bottom of de stairs, and de water go all ober her, and spile her dress, and scald her dreadful bad'. He' he' lis so wicked!

EVA Oh! how could you!

TOPSY Don't dey despise me 'cause I don't know nothin'? Don't dev laugh at me 'cause I'm brack and dey ain't?

EVA. But you shouldn't mind them

TOPSY. Well, I don't mind dem, but when dey are DASSING under my winder, I trows dirty water on 'em, and dat spiles der complexions

EVA. What does make you so bad, Topsy? Why don't you try and be good? Don't you love anybody, Topsy?

TOPSY Can't recommember

FVA But you love your father and mother?

TOPSY Never had none, ye know, I telled ye that, Miss Eva

EVA Oh! I know, but hadn't you any brother, or sister, or aunt, or-

TOPSY No, none on 'em-never had nothin' nor nobody Is brack-no one loves me'

IVA. Oh! Topsy, I love you! [Laying her hand on 10PSY's shoulder I I love you because you haven't had any tather, or mother, or friends I love you, and I want you to be good. I wish you would try to be good for my sake TIOPSY looks astonished for a moment, and then bursts into tears.] Only think of it, Topsy-you can be one of those spirits bright Uncle Tom sings about!

TOPSY. Oh! dear Miss Eva-dear Miss Eva! I will try -I will try! I never did care nothin' about it before FVA. If you try you will succeed Come with me [Takes TOPSY'S hand]

TOPSY. I will try but den I's so wicked! [Exit EVA, followed by TOPSY, crying.]

SCENE V Chamber Enter George, Eliza and Harry.

GEORGE At length, Eliza, after many wanderings, we are again united

ILIZA Thanks to these generous Quakers, who have so kindly sheltered us

GLORGE Not forgetting our friend Phineas

ELIZA I do indeed owe him much 'Twas he I met upon the icy river's bank, after that tearful but successtul attempt, when I fled from the slave-trader with my child in my arms

GEORGE. It seems almost incredible that you could have crossed the river on the ice

ELIZA. Yes, I did Heaven helping me, I crossed on the ice, for they were behind me-right behind-and there was no other way.

GEORGF. But the ice was all in broken-up blocks, swinging and heaving up and down in the water.

ELIZA I know it was-I know it, I did not think I should get over, but I did not care-I could but die if I did not! I leaped on the ice, but how I got across I don't know, the first I remember, a man was helping me up the bank-that man was Phineas

GEORGE My brave girl' you deserve your freedom- 50 you have richly earned it!

FLIZA And when we get to Canada I can help you to work, and between us we can find something to live on GEORGE Yes, Eliza, so long as we have each other, and our boy Oh, Eliza, if these people only knew what a blessing it is for a man to feel that his wife and child belong to bim! I've often wondered to see men that could call their wives and children their own, fretting and worrying about anything else. Why, I feel rich and strong, though we have nothing but our bare hands 60 If they will only let me alone now, I will be satisfiedthankful!

FLIZA But we are not quite out of danger, we are not vet in Canada

GEORGE. True, but it seems as if I smelt the free air, and it makes me strong

[Enter PHINEAS, dressed as a Quaker.]

PHINEAS. [With a snuffle] Verily, friends, how is it with thee?-hum!

GEORGE Why. Phineas, what means this metamorphosis?

PHINEAS. I've become a Quaker! that's the meaning on't

GEORGE What-you?

PHINEAS Teetotally! I was driven to it by a strong argument, composed of a pair of sparkling eyes, rosy cheeks, and pouting lips. Them lips would persuade a man to assassinate his grandmother! [Assumes the Ouaker tone again | Verily, George, I have discovered something of importance to the interests of thee and thy party, and it were well for thee to hear it

GEORGE. Keep us not in suspense!

PHINEAS. Well, after I left you on the road, I stopped at a little, lone tavern, just below here Well, I was tired with hard driving, and, after my supper, I stretched myself down on a pile of bags in the corner, and pulled a buffalo hide over me-and what does I do but get fast asleep

GEORGE. With one ear open, Phineas?

PHINEAS. No, I slept ears and all for an hour or two, for I was pretty well tired, but when I came to myself a little, I found that there were some men in the room, sitting round a table, drinking and talking, and I thought, before I made much muster, I'd just see what they were up to, especially as I heard them say something about the Quakers Then I listened with both ears and found they were talking about you. So I kept quiet, and 10 heard them lay off all their plans. They've got a right notion of the track we are going to-night, and they'll be down after us, six or eight strong. So, now, what's to be done?

ELIZA. What shall we do, George?

GEORGE I know what I shall do! [Takes out pistols.]

PHINEAS Ay—ay, thou seest, Eliza, how it will work—pistols—phitz—poppers!

ELIZA I see, but I pray it come not to that!

GEORGE. I don't want to involve anyone with or for 20 me. If you will lend me your vehicle, and direct me, I will drive alone to the next stand

PHINFAS Ah' well, friend, but thee'll need a driver for all that Thee's quite welcome to do all the fighting thee knows, but I know a thing or two about the road that thee doesn't

GFORGE But I don't want to involve you

PHINFAS Involve me¹ Why, chaw me—that is to say —when thee does involve me, please to let me know FLIZA. Phineas is a wise and skillful man You will 30 do well, George, to abide by his judgment And, oh¹
George, be not hasty with these—young blood is hot¹
[Laying her hand on pixtoli]

GEORGE I will attack no man. All I ask of this country is to be left alone, and I will go out peaceably. But I'll fight to the last breath before they shill take from me my wife and son! Can you blame me?

PHINFAS Mortal man cannot blame thee neighbour George! Flesh and blood could not do otherwise. Woe unto the world because of offenses, but woe unto them through whom the offense cometh! That's gospel, teetotally!

GEORGF. Would not even you, sir, do the same, in my blace?

PHINEAS. I pray that I be not tried, the flesh is weak—but I think my flesh would be pretty tolerably strong in such a case, I ain t sure, friend George, that I shouldn't hold a fellow for thee, if thee had any accounts to settle with him

ELIZA. Heaven grant we be not tempted

PHINEAS But if we are tempted too much, why, consarn 'em' let them look out, that's all

GEORGE It's quite plain you was not born for a Quaker The old nature has its way in you pretty strong yet PHINEAS Well, I reckon you are pretty teetotally right

GEORGE Had we not better hasten our flight?

PHINEAS Well, I rather conclude we had, we're full two hours ahead of them, if they start at the time they planned, so let's vamoose [Exeum]

SCENE VI A Rocky Pass in the Hills Large set rock and platform

PHINEAS. [Without] Out with you in a twinkling every one, and up into those rocks with me' run now, if you ever did run!

[PHINEAS enters, with HARRY in his arms—GEORGF supporting ELIZA]

Come up here, this is one of our old hunting dens. Come up [They ascend the rock] Well here we are Let 'em get us if they can. Whoever comes here has to walk single file between those two rocks in fair range of your pistols—dive see?

GEORGE I do see And now, as this affair is mine, let me take all the risk, and do all the fighting

PHINEAS Thee's quite welcome to do the fighting George, but I may have the fun of looking on, I suppose But see these fellows are kind of debating down there and looking up, like hens when they are going to fly up onto the roost. Hadn't thee better give 'em a word of advice before they come up, jest to tell 'em handsomely they'll be shot if they do

[IOKER, MARKS, and three MEN enter]

MARKS Well, Tom your coons are fairly treed

LOKER Yes, I see 'em go up right here, and here's a path—I'm for going right up They can't jump down in a hurry, and it won't take long to ferret 'em out

MARKS But, Tom, they might fire at us from behind the rocks. That would be ugly, you know

LOKER Ugh! always for saving your skin, Marks No danger, niggers are too plaguy scared!

MARKS I don't know why I shouldn't save my skin, it's the best I've got, and niggers do fight like the devil sometimes

GEORGE [Rising on the rock] Gentlemen who are you down there, and what do you want?

LOKER We want a party of runaway niggers One George and Eliza Harris, and their son. We've got the others here, and a warrant to take 'em too D ve hear? Ain't you George Harris, that belonged to Mr Harris of Shelby county, Kentucky?

GLORGE I am George Harris A Mr Harris, of Kennicky, did call me his property. But now I m a freeman, standing on Heaven's free soil! My wife and child I claim as mine. We have arms to defend ourselves, and we mean to do it. You can come up if you like, but the first one that comes within range of our bullets is a dead

MARKS Oh, come-come, young man, this ain't no kind of talk at all for you You see were officers of justice. We've got the law on our side, and the power and so forth, so you'd better give up peaceably, you see -for you'll certainly have to give up at last

GEORGE I know very well that you've got the law on your side, and the power, but you haven't got us We are standing here as free as you are, and by the great power that made us, we'll fight for our liberty till we die!

During this, MARKS draws a pistol, and when he concludes fires at him -ELIZA screams]

GEORGE It's nothing, Eliza, I am unhurt

PHINEAS [Drawing GEORGE down] Thee'd better keep out of sight with thy speechifying, they're teetotal mean scamps

LOKER What did you do that for, Marks?

MARKS You see, you get jist as much for him dead as alive in Kentucky

GEORGE Now, Phineas, the first man that advances I fire at, you take the second, and so on It won't do to waste two shots on one

PHINEAS But what if you don't hit?

GEORGE Ill try my best

PHINEAS Creation' chaw me up if there ain't stuff in you!

MARKS I think I must have hit some on 'em I heard a squeal

LOKER. I'm going right up for one I never was afraid of niggers, and I ain't a going to be now. Who goes after me?

[LOKER dashes up the rock-GEORGE fires .- He staggers for a moment, then strings to the tob.—PHIN-FAS seizes him -A straggle]

PHINEAS Friend, thee is not wanted here! [Throws LOKER over the rock 1

MARKS | Retreating | Lord help us—they're perfect devils! [MARKS and PARTY run off GEORGE and ELIZA kneel in an attitude of thankseiving, with the CHILD between them -- PHINEAS stands over them exulting. 1 50

ACT III

SCENE I Chamber Enter St. Clare, followed by Tom.

ST CLARE [Giving money and papers to TOM] There, Tom, are the bills, and the money to liquidate them

TOM Yes, mas'r

ST CLARE Well, Tom, what are you waiting for? Isn't all right there?

TOM I'm 'fraid not, mas'r

ST CLARF Why, Tom, what's the matter? You look as solemn as a coffin

TOM I feel very bad, mas'r I allays have thought that 60 mas'r would be good to everybody

ST CLARE Well, Tom, haven't I been? Come, now, what do you want? There's something you haven't got, I suppose, and this is the preface

TOM Mas'r allays been good to me. I haven't nothing to complain of on that head, but there is one that mas'r isn't good to ST CLARF Why, Tom, what's got into you? Speak out -what do you mean?

TOM Lest night, between one and two. I thought so I 70 studied upon the matter then—mas rish i good to bimself

ST CLARE. Ah! now I understand, you allude to the state in which I came home last night. Well, to tell the truth, I was slightly clevated—a little more champagne on board than I could comfortably carry That's all, isn't it?

TOM [Deeply affected—clasping his hands and weeping] All! Oh! my dear young mas'r, I'm 'fraid it will be loss of all-all, body and soul The Good Book says, "It biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder," 80 mv dear mas'r

ST. CLARE You poor, silly fool! I'm not worth crying over

TOM. Oh, mas'r! I implore you to think of it before it gets too late

ST. CLARE. Well, I won't go to any more of their cursed nonsense, Tom—on my honour, I won't I don't know why I haven't stopped long ago, I've always despised tt, and myself for it. So now, Tom, wipe up your eyes and go about your errands

TOM. Bless you, mas'r I feel much better now You have taken a load from poor Tom's heart. Bless you!

ST CLARE Come, come, no blessings! I'm not so wonderfully good, now There, I'll pledge my honour to you, Tom, you don't see me so again [Exil TOM] I'll keep my faith with him, too OPHELIA [Without] Come along, you shiftless mortal!

ST. CLARE What new witchcraft has Topsy been brewing? That commotion is of her raising I'll be bound

[Inter OPHFLIA, dragging in TOPSY]

OPHFLIA Come here now, I will tell your master

$1. (LARE What's the matter now?

OPHELIA The matter is that I cannot be plagued with this girl any longer. It's past all bearing, flesh and blood cannot endure it. Here I locked her up and gave her a hymn to study, and what does she do but spy out where I put my key, and has gone to my bureau, and got a bonnet-trimming and cut it all to pieces to make dolls' jackets! I never saw anything like it in my life!

ST. CLARE What have you done to her?

OPHELIA. What have I done? What haven't I done? Your wife says I ought to have her whipped till she couldn't stand

ST. CLARE I don't doubt it Tell me of the lovely rule of woman I never saw above a dozen women that wouldn't half kill a horse, or a servant, either, if they had their own way with them—let alone a man OPHELIA. I am sure, St Clare, I don't know what to do. I've taught and taught—I've talked till I'm tired, I've whipped her, I've punished her in every way I 40 could think of, and still she's just what she was at first.

ST. CLARE. Come here, Tops, you monkey! [TOPSY crosses to ST. CLARE, grinning] What makes you behave so?

TOPSY 'Spects it's my wicked heart—Miss Feely says so

ST. CLARE. Don't you see how much Miss Ophelia has done for you? She says she has done everything she can think of TOPSY Lor', yes, mas'r' Old missis used to say so, too! She whipped me a heap harder, and used to pull my ha'r, and knock my head agin the door, but it didn't do me no good. I 'spects if they's to pull every spear of ha'r out o' my head, it wouldn't do no good neither—I's so wicked! Laws! I's nothin' but a nigger, no ways! [Goes np.]

OPHELIA. Well, I shall have to give her up, I can't have that trouble any longer

ST CLARE Id like to ask you one question OPHELIA What is it?

ST. CLARE Why, if your doctrine is not strong enough to save one heathen child, that you can have at home here, all to yourself, what's the use of sending one or two poor missionaries off with it among thousands of just such? I suppose this girl is a fair sample of what thousands of your heathen are

OPHELIA I'm sure I don't know, I never saw such a girl as this

ST CLARE. What makes you so bad, Tops? Why won't you try and be good? Don't you love any one, Topsy?

TOPSY. Dunno nothing 'bout love' I loves candy and sich, that's all OPHELIA But. Topsy, if you'd only try to be good, you might

TOPSY Couldn't never be nothing but a nigger, if I was ever so good. If I could be skinned and come white. I'd try then

SI CLARE People can love you, if you are black Topsy Miss Ophelia would love you, if you were good [TOPSY laughs.] Don't you think so?

TOPSY. No, she can't b'ar me 'cause I'm a nigger—she'd's soon have a toad touch her There can't nobody love niggers, and niggers can't do nothin'! I don't car'! [Wistelet]

ST CLARE Silence, you incorrigible imp, and begone' TOPSY. He' he' he' didn't get much out of dis chile' [Exit]

OPHELIA. I've always had a prejudice against Negroes, and it's a fact—I never could bear to have that child touch me, but I didn't think she knew it

ST CLARE Trust any child to find that out, there's no keeping it from them. But I believe all the trying in the world to benefit a child, and all the substantial favours you can do them, will never excite one emotion of gratitude, while that feeling of repugnance remains in the heart. It's a queer kind of fact, but so it is

OPHELIA. I don't know how I can help it—they are disagreeable to me, this girl in particular. How can I help feeling so²

ST. CLARE. Eva does, it seems

OPHELIA Well, she's so loving I wish I was like her She might teach me a lesson

ST CLARE. It would not be the first time a little child had been used to instruct an old disciple, if it were so Come, let us seek Eva, in her favourite bower by the lake

OPHELIA. Why, the dew is falling, she mustn't be out there. She is unwell. I know

ST CLARE Don't be croaking cousin—I hate it. OPHELIA. But she has that cough

ST CLARE. Oh, nonsense, of that cough—it is not anything. She has taken a little cold, perhaps

OPHELIA. Well, that was just the way Eliza Jane was taken—and Ellen

ST CLARE. Oh, stop these hobgoblin, nurse legends You old hands get so wise, that a child cannot cough or sneeze, but you see desperation and ruin at hand. Only take care of the child, keep her from the night air, and don't let her play too hard, and she'll do we'll enough [Exemut.]

SCENE II The flat represents the lake The rays of the setting sun tinge the waters with gold A large tree—Beneath this a grassy bank on which Eva and Tom are seated side by side Eva has a Bible open on her lap.

TOM. Read dat passage again, please, Miss Eva?

EVA. [Reading] "And I saw a sea of glass, mingled with fire" [Stopping suddenly and pointing to lake.] Tom, there it is!

TOM What Miss Eva?

EVA. Don't you see there? There's a "sea of glass, mingled with fire."

TOM True enough, Miss Eva [Sings.]

Oh, had I the wings of the morning, I'd fly away to Canaan's shore, Bright angels should convey me home, To the New Jeiusalem

EVA Where do you suppose New Jerusalem 15, Uncle Tom?

Im going there, to the spirits bright, Tom. . . . "

TOM Oh, up in the clouds, Miss Eva

EVA Then I think I see it Look in those clouds, they look like great gates of pearl, and you can see beyond them—far, far off—it's all gold! Tom, sing about "spirits bright"

TOM. [Sings]

I see a band of spirits bright,

That taste the glories there,

They are all robed in spotless white, And conquering palms they bear.

EVA Uncle Tom, I've seen them

TOM To be sure you have, you are one of them your-self You are the brightest spirit I ever saw

EVA They come to me sometimes in my sleep—those spirits bright—

They are all robed in spotless white,

And conquering palms they bear

Uncle Tom, I'm going there

TOM. Where, Miss Eva?

EVA. [Pointing to the $sk\gamma$] I'm going there, to the spirits bright, Tom I'm going before long

TOM. Its jest no use trying to keep Miss Eva here, I've allays said so She's got the Lord's mark in her forehead. She wasn't never like a child that's to live—there was always something deep in her eyes [Rives and comes forward.—EVA also comes forward, leaving Bible on bank.]

[Enter ST. CLARE.]

ST CLARE Ah' my little pussy, you look as blooming as a rose! You are better now-a-days, are you not?

EVA. Papa, I've had things I wanted to say to you a great while I want to say them now, before I get weaker

ST CLARE Nay, this is an idle fear, Eva, you know you grow stronger every day

EVA. It's all no use, papa, to keep it to myself any longer. The time is coming that I am going to leave 10 you, I am going, and never to come back

ST CLARE. Oh, now, my dear little Eva! you've got nervous and low-spirited, you mustn't indulge such gloomy thoughts

EVA No, papa, don't deceive yourself, I am not any better, I know it perfectly well, and I am going before long I am not nervous—I am not low-spirited. If it were not for you, papa, and my friends, I should be perfectly happy. I want to go—I long to go!

ST. CLARF Why, dear child, what has made your 20 poor little heart so sad? You have everything to make you happy that could be given you

FVA I had rather be in heaven! There are a great many things here that make me sad—that seem dreadful to me, I had rather be there, but I don't want to leave you—it almost breaks my heart!

ST CLARF What makes you sad, and what seems dreadful, Eva?

EVA I feel sad for our poor people, they love me dearly, and they are all good and kind to me I wish, to papa, they were all free!

ST CLARF Why, Eva, child, don't you think they are well enough off, now?

EVA [Not beeding the question] Papa, isn't there a way to have slaves made free? When I am dead, papa, then you will think of me, and do it for my sake?

ST. CLARE. When you are dead, Eva? Oh child, don't talk to me so! You are all I have on earth!

EVA Papa, these poor creatures love their children as much as you do me Tom loves his children Oh, do 40 something for them!

ST. CLARE There, there darling, only don't distress yourself, and don't talk of dying, and I will do anything you wish

EVA. And promise me, dear father that Tom shall have his freedom as soon as—[bevitating]—I am gone! ST. CLARE Yes, dear, I will do anything in the world—

anything you could ask me to There, Tom, take her to her chamber, this evening air is too chill for her [Kisses ber.]

[TOM takes EVA in his arms, and exit]

ST. CLARE [Gazing mournfully after EVA.] Has there ever been a child like Eva? Yes, there has been, but their names are always on grave-stones, and their sweet smiles, their heavenly eyes, their singular words and ways. are among the buried treasures of yearning hearts. It is as if heaven had an especial band of angels, whose office it is to sojourn for a season here, and endear to them the wayward human heart, that they might bear it upward with them in their homeward flight. When you see that deep, spiritual light in the eye, when the little soul reveals itself in words sweeter and wiser than the ordinary words of children, hope not to retain that child, for the seal of heaven is on it, and the light of immortality looks out from its eyes! [Exit]

SCENE III A corridor Enter Tom, he listens at door and then lies down Enter Ophelia, with candle

OPHELIA Uncle Tom, what alive have you taken to sleeping anywhere and everywhere, like a dog, for? I thought you were one of the orderly sort, that liked to lie in bcd in a Christian way

TOM [Rises — Mysteriously] I do, Miss Feely, I do, but now—

OPHELIA Well, what now?

TOM We mustn't speak loud, Mas'r St Clare won't hear on t, but Miss Feely, you know there must be somebod; watchin for the bridegroom

OPHELIA What do you mean, Tom?

TOM You know it says in Scripture, "At midnight there was a great cry made, behold the bridegroom cometh!" That's what I'm 'spectin' now, every night Miss Feely, and I couldn't sleep out of hearing, noways OPHELIA Why, Uncle Tom, what makes you think

TOM Miss Eva, she talks to me The Lord, he sends his messenger in the soul. I must be that, Miss Feely, for when that ar blessed child goes into the kingdom, the vill open the door so wide, we'll all get a look in at the glory!

OPHELIA Uncle Tom, did Miss Eva say she felt more unwell than usual to-night?

TOM No, but she telled me she was coming nearer-thar's them that tells it to the child, Miss Feely It's the angels—it's the trumpet sound afore the break o' day!

OPHELIA. Heaven grant your fears be in vain! Come in Tom [Exennt.]

SCENE IV Eva's Chamber Eva discovered on a couch A table stands near the couch, with a lamp on it. The light shines upon Eva's face, which is very pale. Scene half dark Uncle Tom is kneeling near the foot of the couch Ophelia stands at the head. St. Clare at back. Scene opens to plaintive music. Enter Marie, hastily

MARIE. St Clare! Cousin! Oh! what is the matter

SI CLARE [Hoarsely] Hush! she is dving!

MARIE [Sinking on her knees, beside TOM.] Dying' ST CLARE Oh' if she would only wake and speak once more [Bending over EVA.] Eva, darling'

EVA [Uncloses her eyes, smiles, raises her head and this to speak]

ST CLARE Do you know me, Eva?

EVA [Throwing her aims feelly about his neck.] Dear papa! [Her arms drop and she sinks back]

ST CLARE. Oh, heaven' this is dreadful! Oh! Tom, my boy, it is killing me!

TOM Look at her, mas'r [Points to FVA]

ST CLARE. Eva! [A pause] She does not hear Oh, Eva! tell us what you see What is it?

TVA [Feebly smiling] Oh' love' joy' peace' [Dies] TOM Oh' bless the Lord' it's over, dear mas'r, it's over

ST CLARE. [Sinking on his knees.] Farewell, beloved child' the bright eternal doors have closed after thee We shall see thy sweet face no more. Oh' wo for them who watched thy entrance into heaven, when they shall wake and find only the cold, gray sky of daily life, and thou gone forever.

[Solemn music, slow curtain.]

ACT IV

SCENE I A street in New Orleans Enter Gumption Cute, meeting Marks

CUTE How do ye dew?

MARKS. How are you?

CUTE Well, now, squire, it's a fact that I am dead broke and busted up

MARKS. You have been speculating, I suppose?

CUTE. That's just it and nothing shorter.

MARKS. You have had poor success, you say?

CUTE. Tarnation bad, now I tell you You see I came to this part of the country to make my fortune.

MARKS. And you did not do it?

CUTE Scarcely The first thing I tried my hand at 40 was keeping school I opened an academy for the instruction of youth in the various branches of orthography, geography, and other graphies

MARKS. Did you succeed in getting any pupils?

CUTE Oh, lots on 'em' and a pretty set of dunces they were, too After the first quarter, I called on the respectable parents of the juveniles, and requested them to fork over To which they politely answered—don't you wish you may get it?

MARKS. What did you do then?

CUTE. Well, I kind of pulled up stakes and left those diggin's Well, then I went into Spiritual Rappings for a living That paid pretty well for a short time, till I met with an accident

MARKS An accident?

CUTE Yes a tall Yahoo called on me one day, and wanted me to summon the spirit of his mother—which, of course, I did. He asked me about a dozen questions which I answered to his satisfaction. At last he wanted to know what she died of—I said, Cholera. You never 60 did see a critter so riled as he was: "Look yere, stranger," said he "It's my opinion that you're a pesky humbug! for my mother was blown up in a Steamboat!" With that he left the premises. The next day the people furnished me with a conveyance, and I rode out of town.

MARKS Rode out of town?

CUTE. Yes, on a rail!

MARKS I suppose you gave up the spirits, after that? CUTE. Well, I reckon I did, it had such an effect on my spirits

MARKS It's a wonder they didn't tar and feather you CUTE. There was some mention made of that, but when they said feathers, I felt as if I had wings, and flew away.

MARKS You cut and run?

CUTE Yes, I didn't like their company and I cut it Well, after that I let myself out as an overseer on a cotton plantation. I made a pretty good thing of that, though it was dreadful trying to my feelings to flog the darkies, but I got used to it after a while, and then I so used to lather 'em like Jehu Well, the proprietor got the fever and ague and shook himself out of town The place and all the fixings were sold at auction, and I found myself adrift once more

MARKS. What are you doing at present?

CUTF I'm in search of a rich relation of mine

MARKS. A rich relation?

CUTE. Yes, a Miss Ophelia St Clare You see, a niecc of hers married one of my second cousins—that's how I Came to be a relation of hers. She came on here from Vermont to be housekeeper to a cousin of hers, of the same name.

MARKS. I know him well

CUTE The deuce you do!-well, that's lucky

MARKS. Yes, he lives in this city

CUTE. Say, you just point out the locality, and I'll give him a call MARKS. Stop a bit Suppose you shouldn't be able to raise the wind in that quarter, what have you thought of doing?

CUTE Well, nothing particular

MARKS. How should you like to enter into a nice profitable business—one that pays well?

CUTF That's just about my measure—it would suit me to a hair. What is it?

MARKS Nigger catching

CUTF Catching niggers! What on airth do you mean?

MARKS Why, when there's a large reward offered for 10 a runaway darkey, we goes after him, catches him, and gets the reward

CUTE. Yes, that's all right so far-but spose there ain't no reward offered?

MARKS Why, then we catches the darkey on our own account, sells him, and pockets the proceeds CUTE. By chowder, that ain't a bad speculation!

MARKS. What do you say? I want a partner You see, I lost my partner last year, up in Ohio—he was a powerful fellow 40 CUTE. Lost him! How did you lose him?

MARKS. Well, you see, Tom and I—his name was Tom Loker—Tom and I were after a mulatto chap called George Harris, that run away from Kentucky We traced him through the greater part of Ohio, and came up with him near the Pennsylvania line. He took refuge among some rocks, and showed fight

CUTE. Oh' then runaway darkies show fight, do then a MARKS. Sometimes Well, Tom—like a headstrong fool as he was—rushed up the rocks, and a Quaker chap who was helping this George Harris, threw him over the cliff

CUTE Was he killed?

MARKS. Well, I didn't stop to find out Seeing that the darkies were stronger than I thought, I made tracks for a safe place

CUTE. And what became of this George Harris?

MARKS. Oh' he and his wife and child got away safe into Canada You see, they will get away sometimes, though it isn't very often Now what do you say? You are just the figure for a fighting partner. Is it a bargain.

CUTE. Well, I rather calculate our teams won't hitch, no how By chowder, I hain't no idea of setting myself up, as a target for darkies to fire at—that's a speculation that don't suit my constitution

MARKS You're afraid, then?

CUTE No, I ain't, it's against my principles

MARKS Your principles—how so?

CUTE Because my principles are to keep a sharp look out for No I I shouldn't feel wholesome if a darket was to throw me over that cliff to look after Tom Loker [Excunt, arm-in-arm]

SCENE II Gothic Chambei St Clare discovered, seated on sofa Tom to the left

ST. CLARE Oh! Tom, my boy, the whole world is as empty as an egg-shell

TOM I know it, mis'r, I know it But oh' if mas r could look up—up where our dear Miss Eva is—

ST. CLARE Ah, Tom¹ I do look up, but the trouble is, I don't see anything when I do I wish I could It seems to be given to children and poor, honest fellows like you, to see what we cannot How comes it?

TOM. "Thou hast hid from the wise and prudent, and revealed unto babes, even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight."

ST CLARE Tom, I don't believe—I ve got the habit of doubting—I want to believe and I cannot

TOM Dear mas r, pray to the good Lord "Lord, I believe, help thou my unbelief"

ST CLARE Who knows anything about anything? Was all that beautiful love and faith only one of the ever-shifting phases of human feeling, having nothing real to rest on, passing away with the little breath? And is there no more Eva—nothing?

TOM Oh' dear mas'r, there is 1 know it, I'm sure of it. Do, do, dear mas'r, believe it'

ST CLARE. How do you know there is, Tom? You never saw the Lord

TOM Felt Him in my soul, mas'r—feel Him now! Oh, mas'r, when I was sold away from my old woman and the children, I was jest a'most broken up—I felt as if there warn't nothing left—and then the Lord stood by me, and He says, "Fear not, Tom," and He brings light and joy into a poor fellow's soul—makes all peace, and I's so happy, and loves everybody, and feels willin' to be jest where the Lord wants to put me l know it couldn't come from me, 'cause I's a poor, complaining creature—it comes from above, and I know He s willin' to do for mas r

ST CLARE. [Grasping TOM'S hand] Tom, you love

TOM Is willing to lay down my life this blessed day tor you

ST. CLARE. [Sadly] Poor, foolish fellow! I'm not worth the love of one good, honest heart like yours

TOM Oh, mas r' there's more than me loves you—the blessed Saviour loves you

ST CLARE How do you know that, Tom?

TOM The love of the Saviour passeth knowledge

ST CLARE [Turns away] Singular! that the story of a man who lived and died eighteen hundred years ago, can affect people so yet. But He was no man [Riser] No man ever had such long and living power. Oh! that I could believe what my mother taught me, and pray as I did when I was a boy! But, Tom, all this time I have forgotten why I sent for you. I'm going to make a freeman of you, so have your trunk packed, and get ready to set out for Kentuck.

10M [Joyfull] Bless the Lord!

$1 CLARE. [Dryly] You haven't had such very bad times here, that you need be in such a rapture, Tom

IOM No, no, mas'r, 'tain't that, it's being a freeman—that's what I'm joyin' for ST CLARE Why, Tom, don't you think, for your own part, you've been better off than to be free?

TOM No, indeed. Mas'r St Clare—no, indeed' ST. CLARE. Why, Tom, you couldn't possibly have earned, by your work, such clothes and such living as I have given you

TOM. I know all that, Mas'r St Clare—mas'r's been too good, but I'd rather have poor clothes, poor house, 50 poor every thing, and have 'em nune, than have the best, 1f they belonged to somebody else I had 50, mas'r, I think it's natur', mas'r

ST. CLARE. I suppose so, Tom, and you'll be going off and leaving me in a month or so—though why you shouldn't no mortal knows

TOM Not while mas'r is in trouble I'll stay with mas'r as long as he wants me, so as I can be any use

ST CLARE. [Sadly] Not while I'm in trouble, Tom? And when will my trouble be over?

TOM When you are a believer

ST. CLARE. And you really mean to stay by me till that day comes? [Smiling and laying his hand on TOM's shoulder] Ah, Tom' I won't keep you till that day Go home to your wife and children, and give my love to all

TOM I's faith to think that day will come—the Lord has a work for mas'r

ST. CLARE A work, hey? Well, now, Tom, give me your views on what sort of a work it is—let's hear

TOM Why, even a poor fellow like me has a work, 70 and Mas'r St Clare, that has larnin', and riches, and friends, how much he might do for the Lord

ST CLARE. Tom, you seem to think the Lord needs a great deal done for him

TOM We does for him when we does for his creatures ST. CLARF Good theology. Tom Thank you, my boy, I like to hear you talk But go now, Tom, and leave me alone [Exil TOM] That faithful fellow's words have excited a train of thoughts that almost bear me, on the strong tide of faith and feeling to the gates of that 80 heaven I so vividly conceive. They seem to bring me nearer to Eva.

OPHELIA. [Outside] What are you doing there, you limb of Satan? You've been stealing something, I'll be bound [OPHELIA drags in TOPSY]

TOPSY You go 'long Miss Feely, 'tain't none o' your business

ST. CLARE. Heyday! what is all this commotion? OPHELIA. She's been stealing TOPSY [Sabbing] I hain't neither OPHELIA What have you got in your bosom? TOPSY. I've got my hand dar OPHELIA. But what have you got in your hand?

TOPSY. Nuffin'

OPHELIA. That's a fib, Topsy

TOPSY. Well, I 'spects it is

OPHELIA. Give it to me, whatever it is

TOPSY. It's mine—I hope I may die this bressed minute, if it don't blong to me

OPHELIA Topsy, I order you to give me that article, don't let me have to ask you again. [TOPSY reluctantly to takes the foot of an old stocking from her bosom and hands it to OPHELIA.] Sakes alive! what is all this? [Takes from it a lock of hiii, and a small book, with a bit of crape tuisted around it.]

TOPSY Dat's a lock of hair dat Miss Eva give me—she cut it from her own beau ful head herself

SI CLARE [Takes book] Why did you wrap this [Pointing to crape] around the book?

TOPSY 'Cause—'cause—'cause 'twas Miss Eva's Oh' don't take 'em away, please! [Sits down on stage, and, 20 putting her apron over her head, begins to sob tehemently]

OPHELIA Come, come, don't cry, you shall have them

TOPSY [Jumps up joyfully and takes them] I wants to keep 'em 'cause dey makes me good, I ain't half so wicked as I used to was [Runs off]

ST. CLARE I really think you can make something of that girl. Any mind that is capable of a real vorrou is capable of good. You must try and do something with her

OPHELIA The child has improved very much, I have great hopes of her

ST CLARE. I believe I'll go down the street, a few moments, and hear the news

OPHELIA Shall I call Tom to attend you?

ST CLARF. No, I shall be back in an hour [Exit]

OPHELIA. He's got an excellent heart, but then he's so dreadful shiftless! [Exit]

SCENE III Front chamber Enter Topsy.

TOPSY. Dar's somethin de matter wid me—I isn't a 40 bit like myself. I haven't done anything wrong since poor Miss Eva went up in de skies and left us. When I's gwine to do anything wicked, I tinks of her, and somehow I can't do it. Is getting to be good, dats a fact I 'spects when I's dead I shall be turned into a little brack angel

[Enter OPHELIA.]

OPHELIA. Topsy, I ve been looking for you, I've got something very particular to say to you TOPSY. Does you want me to say the catechism?

OPHELIA. No, not now

TOPSY [Aside] Golly' dat's one comfort

OPHELIA. Now, Topsy, I want you to try and understand what I am going to say to you

TOPSY Yes, missis, I'll open my ears drefful wide

OPHELIA. Mr St Clare has given you to me, Topsy TOPSY Den I b'longs to you, don't I' Golly! I thought

I always belong to you OPHELIA. Not till to-day have I received any authority to call you my property

TOPSY I's your property, am I' Well, if you say so,

I 'spects I am

OPHELIA Topsy, I can give you your liberty

TOPSY My liberty?

OPHELIA Yes, Topsy

TOPSY Has you got um with you?

OPHELIA I have, Topsy

IOPSY Is it clothes or wittles?

OPHELIA. How shiftless! Don't you know what your liberty is, Topsy?

TOPSY How should I know when I never seed um? OPHELIA Topsy, I am going to leave this place, I am going many miles away—to my own home in Vermont

TOPSY Den what's to become of dis chile?

OPHFLIA If you wish to go, I will take you with me TOPSY Miss Feely, I doesn't want to leave you no how, I loves you, I does

OPHELIA Then you shall share my home for the rest of your days. Come, Topsy

TOPSY Stop, Miss Feely, does dey hab any oberseers in Varmount?

OPHLLIA No, Topsy

TOPSY Nor cotton plantations nor sugar factories, nor darkies, nor whipping, nor nothing?

OPHELIA No, Topsy

TOPSY By golly! de quicker you is gwine de better den [Enter TOM. hartily]

TOM Oh, Miss Feely! Miss Feely!

OPHELIA Gracious me, Tom! what's the matter?

TOM Oh, Mas r St Clare! Mas r St Clare!

OPHELIA Well, Tom, well?

TOM. They've just brought him home and I do believe he's killed

OPHELIA. Killed?

TOPSY. Oh, dear! what's to become of de poor darkies now?

TOM He's dreadful weak It's just as much as he can do to speak. He wanted me to call you

OPHELIA. My poor cousin' Who would have thought of it. Don't say a word to his wife, Tom, the danger may not be so great as you think, it would only distress her Come with me, you may be able to afford some assistance [Exeunt]

SCENE IV Handsome Chamber St. Clare discovered seated on sofa Ophelia, Tom and Topsy are clustered around him Doctor back of sofa, feeling his pulse

ST. CLARE. [Raising himself feebly.] Tom-poor fellow!

10M Well, mas'r

ST CLARE I have received my death wound TOM Oh. no. no. mas r!

ST CLARE I feel that I am dying-Tom, pray! TOM [Sinking on his knees] I do pray, mas'r' I do ST CLARE. [After a pause] Tom, one thing preys ipon my mind—I have forgotten to sign your freedom papers What will become of you when I am gone?

TOM. Don't think of that, mas'r

ST CLARE I was wrong, Tom, very wrong, to neglect it I may be the cause of much suffering to you hereifter Marie, my wife-she-oh!-

OPHELIA. His mind is wandering

ST CLARE. [Energetically] No! it is coming home at last' [Sinks back] at last' at last' Eva, I come! Dies.

ACT V

pray!

SCENE I An Auction Mart Uncle Tom and Emmeline at pack Adolf, Skeggs, Marks, Mann, and various spectaors discovered Marks and Mann come folward

MARKS Hulloa, Alf! what brings you here?

MANN. Well, I was wanting a valet, and I heard that at Clare's lot was going. I thought I'd just look at them

MARKS. Catch me ever buying any of St Clare's people Spoilt niggers, every one-impudent as the devil

MANN. Never fear that, if I get 'em. I'll soon have their airs out of them-they'll soon find that they've 40 another kind of master to deal with than St. Clare 'Pon my word, I'll buy that fellow-I like the shape of him [Pointing to ADOLF]

MARKS. You'll find it ll take all you've got to keep him -he's deucedly extravagant

MANN. Yes, but my lord will find that he can't be extravagant with me. Just let him be sent to the calaboose a few times, and thoroughly dressed down. I'll tell you if it don't bring him to a sense of his ways Oh! I'll reform him, up hill and down, you'll see I'll buy 50 him, that's flat

[Enter LEGREE, he goes up and looks at ADOLF. whose boots are nicely blacked]

LEGREE A nigger with his boots blacked-bah! [Spits on them.] Holloa, you! [To TOM] Let's see your teeth [Seizes TOM by the jaw and opens his mouth.] Strip up your sleeve and show your muscle TOM does so] Where was you raised?

TOM. In Kentuck, mas'r

LEGREE What have you done?

TOM. Had care of mas'r's farm

I EGREE That's a likely story [Turns to EMMELINE] 60 You're a nice looking girl enough How old are you? [Grasps her arm.]

EMMELINE [Shrieking] Ah' you hurt me

SKEGGS. Stop that, you minx! No whimpering here The sale is going to begin [Mounts the rostrum] Gentlemen, the next article I shall offer you to-day is Adolf, late valet to Mr St Clare How much am I offered' [Various bids are made ADOLF is knocked down to MANN for eight hundred dollars] Gentlemen, I now offer a prime article—the quadroon girl, Emmeline, 70 only fifteen years of age, warranted in every respect [Business as before EMMELINE is sold to LEGREE for one thousand dollars] Now, I shall close to-day's sale by offering you the valuable article known as Uncle Tom, the most useful nigger ever raised. Gentlemen in want of an overseer, now is the time to bid

LEGREE Now look here, you two belong to me

[TOM and EMMELINE sink on their knees.]

TOM. Heaven help us, then!

[Music-LEGRE1 stands over them exulting. Picture.]

SCENE II The Garden of Miss Ophelia's House in Vermont Enter Ophelia and Deacon Perry.

DEACON Miss Ophelia, allow me to offer you my congratulations upon your safe arrival in your native place I hope it is your intention to pass the remainder of your days with us?

OPHELIA. Well, Deacon, I have come here with that express purpose

DFACON. I presume you were not over pleased with 10 the South?

OPHELIA Well, to tell the truth, Deacon, I wasn't, I liked the country very well, but the people there are so dreadful shiftless

DEACON. The result 1 presume, of living in a warm climate

OPHFLIA Well, Deacon, what is the news among you all here?

pace Nothing of any consequence has happened—Oh!

20 I forgot [Takes out handkerchiet] I ve lost my wife, my Molly has left me [Weiper his ever]

OPHFLIA. Poor soul! I pity you, Deacon

DEACON Thank you You perceive I bear my loss with resignation

OPHELIA How you must miss her tongue!

DEACON Molly certainly was fond of talking. She always would have the last word—heigho!

OPHELIA What was her complaint, Deacon?

DEACON A very mild and soothing one, Miss Ophelia, 36 she had a severe attack of the lockjaw

OPHELIA Dreadful'

DEACON Wasn't it? When she found she couldn't use her tongue she took it so much to heart that it struck to her stomach and killed her Poor dear! Excuse my handkerchief, she's been dead only eighteen months

OPHELIA Why, Deacon, by this time you ought to be setting your cap for another wife

DEACON Do you think so, Miss Ophelia?

OPHELIA I don't see why you shouldn t--vou are still 40 a good-looking man, Deacon

DEACON. Ah! well, I think I do wear well—in fact, I may say remarkably well. It has been observed to me before OPHELIA And you are not much over fifty?

DEACON. Just turned of forty, I assure you

OPHELIA Hale and hearty?

DEACON. Health excellent—look at my eye! Strong as a lion—look at my arm! A No 1 constitution—look at my leg!!!

OPHELIA Have you no thoughts of choosing another partner?

DEACON Well, to tell you the truth, I have

OPHELIA Who is she?

DEACON She is not far distant [Looks at OPHELIA in a languishing manner.] I have her in my eye at this present moment

OPHELIA [Aside.] Really, I believe he's going to pop Why, surely, Deacon, you don't mean to—

DEACON. Yes, Miss Ophelia. I do mean, and believe me when I say—[Looking off] The Lord be good to us, but I believe there is the devil coming!

[TOPSY runs on with bouquet. She is now dressed very neatly]

TOPSY Miss Feely, here is some flowers dat I hab been gathering for you [Gives houquet]

OPHELIA That's a good child

DEACON Miss Ophelia, who is this young person?

OPHELIA She is my daughter

DEACON. [Aside] Her daughter! Then she must have married a colored man off South. I was not aware that you had been married, Miss Ophelia?

OPHELIA Married? Sakes alive! what made you think I had been married?

DEACON Good gracious! I m getting confused Didn't I understand you to say that this—somewhat tanned—young lady was your daughter?

OPHELIA Only by adoption She is my adopted daughter

DEACON O-oh' [Ande.] I breathe again

TOPSY. [Ande.] By golly! dat old man's eyes stick out of 'um head dre'ful. Guess he never seed anything like me afore OPHELIA Deacon, won't you step into the house and refresh yourself after your walk?

DEACON I accept your polite invitation [Offers hivarm] Allow me

OPHELIA As gallant as ever, Deacon. I declare, you grow younger every day.

DEACON. You can never grow old, madam.

OPHELIA. Ah, you flatterer! [Exeunt.]

TOPSY. Dar dey go, like an old goose and gander. Guess dat ole gemblemun feels kind of confectionary—rather sweet on my old missis. By golly! she's been dre'ful kind to me ever since I come away from de South, and I loves her, I does, 'cause she takes such car' on me and gives me dese fine clothes. I tries to be good, too, and Is getting 'long 'mazin' fast. I'se not so wicked as I used to was [Looks out.] Hulloa! dar's someone comin' here. I wonder what he wants now [Retires, observing.] [Enter GUMPTION CUTE, very shabby—a small bundle, on a stick, over his shoulder.]

CUTE By chowder, here I am again Phew' it's a pretty considerable tall piece of walking between here and New Orleans, not to mention the wear of shoeleather. I guess I'm about done up. If this streak of bad luck lasts much longer, I'll borrow sixpence to buy a rope, and hang myself right straight up! When I went to call on Miss Ophelia, I swow if I didn't find out that she had left for Vermont, so I kind of concluded to make tracks in that direction myself, and as I didn't have any money left, why I had to foot it, and here I am in old Varmount once more They told me Miss Ophelia lived up here I wonder if she will remember the relationship [Sees 10PSY.] By chowder, there's a darkey. Look here, Charcoal!

TOPSY. [Comes forward.] My name isn't Charcoal—it's Topsy

CUTE Oh! your name is Topsy, is it, you juvenile specimen of Day & Martin?

TOPSY Tell you I don't know nothin' 'bout Day & Martin I's Topsy and I belong to Miss Feely St Clare

CUTE. I'm much obleged to you, you small extract of lapan, for your information. So Miss Ophelia lives up there in the white house, does she?

TOPSY Well, she don't do nothin' else

CUTE Well, then, just locomote your pins

TOPSY. What-what's dat?

CUTE Walk your chalks!

TOPSY By golly' dere ain't no chalk 'bout me

CUTE Move your trotters.

TOPSY How you does spoke! What you mean by trotters?

CUTE. Why, your feet, Stove Polish

TOPSY. What does you want me to move my feet for?

CUTE To tell your mistress, you ebony angel, that a gentleman wishes to see her.

TOPSY Does you call yourself a gentleman? By golly 50 you look more like a scar'-crow.

CUTE Now look here, you Charcoal, don't you be sassy I'm a gentleman in distress, a done-up speculator, one that has seen better days—long time ago—and better clothes too, by chowder! My creditors are like my boots—they've no soles I'm a victim to circumstances. I've been through much and survived it I've taken walking exercise for the benefit of my health, but as I was trying to live on air at the same time, it was a losing speculation, cause it gave me such a dreadful appetite

TOPSY Golly! you look as if you could eat an ox, horns and all

CUTE Well, I calculate I could if he was roasted—it's a speculation I should like to engage in I have returned like the fellow that run away in Scripture, and if anybody's got a fatted calf they want to kill, all they got to do is to fetch him along Do you know, Charcoal, that your mistress is a relation of mine?

TOPSY Is she your uncle?

CUTE No, no, not quite so near as that My second 70 cousin married her niece

TOPSY And does you want to see Miss Feely?

CUTE I do I have come to seek a home beneath her roof, and take care of all the spare change she don't want to use

TOPSY Den just yo' follow me, mas'r

CUTE Stop! By chowder, I've got a great idee Say, you Day & Martin, how should you like to enter into a speculation?

TOPSY Golly! I doesn't know what a spec—spec—cu— 80 what-do-you-call-'um am CUTE Well, now, I calculate I ve hit upon about the right thing. Why should I degrade the manly dignity of the Cutes by becoming a beggar—expose myself to the chance of receiving the cold shoulder as a poor relation? By chowder, my blood biles as I think of it! Topsy, you can make my fortune, and your own, too. I've an idee in my head that is worth a million of dollars.

TOPSY Golly! is your head worth dat? Guess you wouldn't bring dat out South for de whole of you

CUTE Don't you be too severe, now, Charcoal, I'm a man of genius Did you ever hear of Barnum?

TOPSY Barnum! Barnum! does he live out South?

CUTE No, he lives in New York Do you know how he made his fortin?

TOPSY What is him fortin, hey? Is it something he wears?

(UTE Chowder, how green you are!

TOPSY [Indignantly] Sar, I hab you to know I's not 10 green, I's brack

CUTE To be sure you are, Day & Martin I calculate, when a person says another has a fortune, he means he's got plenty of money, Charcoal

TOPSY And did he make the money?

CUTE Sartin sure, and no mistake

TOPSY Golly! now I thought money always growed

CUTE Oh, git out! You are too cute—you are cuter than I am, and I'm Cute by name and cute by nature Well, as I was saying, Barnum made his money by ex-20 hibiting a woolly horse, now wouldn't it be an all-fired speculation to show you as the woolly gal?

TOPSY You want to make a sight of me?

CUTE I'll give you half the receipts, by chowder!

TOPSY Should I have to leave Miss Feely?

CUTE To be sure you would

TOPSY Den you hab to get a woolly gal somewhere else. Mas r Cute [Runs off]

CUTE. There's another speculation gone to smash, by chowder! [Exit.]

SCENE III A Rude Chamber Tom is discovered, in old clothes, seated on a stool, he holds in his hand a paper containing a curl of Eva's hair The scene opens to the symphony of "Old Folks at Home"

TOM I have come to de dark places, Is going through de vale of shadows. My heart sinks at times and feels just like a big lump of lead. Den it gits up in my throat and chokes me till de tears roll out of my eyes, den I take out dis curl of little Miss Evas hair, and the sight of it brings calm to my mind and I feels strong again. [Kisset the curl and puts it in his heast—takes out a tilver dollar, which is suspended around his neck by a string.] Dere's de bright silver dollar dat Mas'r George Shelby gave me the day I was sold away from old Kentuck, and I've kept it ever since. Mas'r George must have grown to be a man by this time. I wonder if I shall ever see him again

SONG -"Old Folks at Home"

[Enter LEGREE, EMMELINE, SAMBO and QUIMBO.]

LEGREE Shut up, you black cuss! Did you think I wanted any of your infernal howling? [Turns to EMMELINE] We're' home [EMMELINE shrinks from him He takes hold of her ear.] You didn't ever weal earrings.

EMMELINE [Trembling] No. master

LEGREE Well, I'll give you a pair, if you're a good girl You needn't be so frightened, I don't mean to make you work very hard You'll have fine times with me and live like a lady, only be a good girl

EMMELINE My soul sickens as his eyes gaze upon me His touch makes my very flesh creep

LEGREE [Turns to TOM, and points to SAMBO and QUIMBO] Ye see what ye'd get if ve'd try to run off These yer boys have been raised to track niggers, and tney'd just as soon chaw one on ye up as eat their suppers, so mind yourself [To EMMELINE] Come, mistress, you go in here with me [T.skring EMMELINES band, and leading ber away]

EMMELINE [Withdrawing her hand, and shrinking back] No, no! let me work in the fields, I don't want to be a lady

LEGREE Oh! you're going to be contrary, are you? I'll soon take all that out of you

EMMELINE Kill me, if you will

LEGREE Oh! you want to be killed, do you? Now come here, you Tom—you see I told you I didn't buy you just for the common work, I mean to promote you and make a driver of you, and to-night ye may jest as well begin to get yer hand in. Now, ye jest take this yer gal, and flog her, ye've seen enough on't to know how.

TOM I beg mas'r's pardon—hopes mas'r won't set me at that It's what I ain't used to—never did, and can't do—no way possible

LEGREE Yell larn a pretty smart chance of things ye never did know before I've done with ye [Strikes TOM with uhip, three blows—Music chord each blow] There' now will ye tell me ye can't do it?

TOM Yes, mas'r! Im willing to work night and day and work while there's life and breath in me, but this yer thing I can't feel it right to do, and, mas'r, I never shall do it, never!

I BGREE What' ve black beast' tell me ve don't think it right to do what I tell ye! What have any of you cussed cattle to do with thinking what's right? I'll put a stop to it. Why, what do ye think ye are? Maybe ye think ver a gentleman, master Tom, to be telling your master what's right and what ain't! So you pretend it's wrong to flog the gal?

TOM I think so, mas'r, 'twould be downright cruel, and it's what I never will do, mas'r. If you mean to kill me, kill me, but as to raising my hand agin any one here. I never shall-I'll die first!

LEGREE Well, here's a pious dog at last, let down among us sinners-powerful holy critter he must be Here, you rascal! you make believe to be so pious, didn't you never read out of your Bible, "Servants, obey your masters?" Ain t I your m ster? Didn't I pay twelve hundred dollars, cash, for all there is inside your cussed old black shell? Ain't you mine, body and soul?

TOM No, no! My soul ain t yours, mas'r, you haven't bought it-ve can t buy it it's been bought and paid for by one that is able to keep it, and you can't harm it!

LEGREE I can't' we'll see we'll see! Here, Sambo! Ouimbo! give this dog such a breaking in as he won't get over this month!

EMMELINE Oh, no' you will not be so cruel-have some mercy! [Clings to TOM]

LEGREE Mercy? you won't find any in this shop! Away with the black cuss! Flog him within an inch of his life!

SAMBO and QUIMBO seize TOM and drag him up

[LEGREE seizes EMMELINE, and throws her. She falls on her knees, with her hands lifted in supplication -LIGREE raises his whip, as if to strike TOM -Picture]

SCENE IV Plain Chamber Enter Ophelia, followed by Topsv.

OPHELIA. A person inquiring for me, did you say, Topsy?

TOPSY. Yes, missis

OPHELIA What kind of a looking man is he?

TOPSY By golly he's very queer looking man, anyway, and den he talks so dre'ful funny What does you think?—yah! yah! he wanted to 'xibite me as de woolly gal' yah! yah!

OPHELIA Oh! I understand Some cute Yankee, who wants to purchase you, to make a show of-the heartless wretch!

TOPS) Dat's just him, missis, dat's just his name He tole me dat it was Cute-Mr Cute Speculashumdat's him

OPHELIA What did you say to him. Topsy?

TOPSY Weil, I didn't say much, it was brief and to the point—I tole him I wouldn't leave you. Miss Feely. no how

OPHELIA That's right, Topsy, you know you are very comfortable here—you wouldn't fare quite so well if you went away among strangers

TOPSY By golly! I know dat, you takes care on me, and makes me good. I don't steal any now, and I don't swar, and I don't dance breakdowns. Oh! I isn't so wicked as Lused to was

OPHELIA That's right, Topsy, now show the gentleman or whatever he is, up

IOPSY By golly' I guess he won't make much out of Miss Feely [Exit]

OPHELIA I wonder who this person can be? Perhaps it is some old acquaintance, who has heard of my arrival, 60 and who comes on a social visit

[Enter CUTF]

CUTE Aunt, how do ye do' Well, I swan, the sight of you is good for weak eyes [Offers his hand.]

OPHFLIA [Coldly draw my back] Really, sir, I can't say that I ever had the pleasure of seeing you before

CUTE Well, it's a fact that you never did You see I never happened to be in your neighbourhood afore now Of course you've heard of me' I'm one of the Cutes-Gumption Cute, the first and only son of Josiah and Maria Cute, of Oniontown, on the Onion river, in 70 the north part of this ere State of Varmount

OPHELIA Can't say I ever heard the name before

CUTE Well then, I calculate your memory must be a little ricketty. I'm a relation of yours

OPHELIA A relation of mine! Why, I never heard of any Cutes in our family

CUTE Well, I shouldn't wonder if you never did Don't you remember your niece, Mary?

OPHELIA Of course I do What a shiftless question! CUTE Well, you see, my second cousin, Abijah Blake, 80 married her, so you see that makes me a relation of yours

OPHELIA. Rather a distant one. I should say.

CUTE. By chowder! I'm near enough, just at the present

OPHELIA Well, you certainly are a sort of connection of mine

CUTE. Yes, kind of sort of OPHFLIA. And of course you are welcome to my house, as long as you choose to make it your home

CUTF By chowder! I'm booked for the next six 10 months—this isn't a bad speculation

OPHELIA. I hope you left all your folks well at home? CUTE. Well, yes, they're pretty comfortably disposed of Father and mother's dead and Uncle Josh has gone to California. I am the only representative of the Cutes left.

OPHEIA. There doesn't seem to be a great deal of you left. I declare, you are positively in rags

CUTE Well, you see, the fact is, I've been speculating —trying to get bank-notes—specie-rags, as they say—20 but I calculate I've turned out rags of another sort

OPHELIA I'm sorry for your ill luck, but I am afraid you have been shiftless

CUTE. By chowder! I've done all that a fellow could do You see, somehow, everything I take hold of kind of bursts up

OPHELIA. Well, well, perhaps you'll do better for the future, make yourself at home I have got to see to some household matters, so excuse me for a short time [Aride.] Impudent and shiftless! [Exit] cute. By chowder! I rather guess that this speculation will hitch. She's a good-natured old critter, I reckon I'll be a son to her while she lives, and take care of her valuables after she's a defunct departed. I wonder if they keep the vittles in this ere room? Guess not I've got extensive accommodations for all sorts of eatables. I'm a regular vacuum, throughout—pockets and all I'm chuck full of emptiness. [Looks out.] Holloa! who's this elderly individual coming upstairs? He looks like a compound essence of starch and dignity. I wonder if he isn't another relation of mine. I should like a rich old fellow now for an uncle.

[Enter DEACON PERRY.]

DEACON. Ha! a stranger here!

CUTE. How d've do?

DEACON. You are a friend to Miss Ophelia, I presume?

CUTE. Well, I rather calculate that I am a leetle more than a friend

DEACON. [Aside.] Bless me' what can he mean by those mysterious words? Can he be her—no, I don't think he can. She said she wasn't—well, at all events, it's very suspicious CUTE. The old fellow seems kind of stuck up DEACON. You are a particular friend to Miss Ophelia you say?

CUTE. Well, I calculate I am

DEACON. Bound to her by any tender tie?

CUTE It's something more than a tie—it's a regular double-twisted knot

DEACON. Ah! Just as I suspected [Aside] Might I inquire the nature of that tie?

CUTE Well, it's the natural tie of relationship DEACON. A relation—what relation!

CUTE. Why, you see, my second cousin, Abijah Blake, married her niece. Mary

DEACON, Oh! is that all?

CUTE By chowder, ain't that enough?

DEACON. Then you are not her husband?

CUTE To be sure I ain't What put that 'ere idee into your cranium'

DEACON [Shaking him vigorously by the hand.] 'My dear sir, I'm delighted to see you

CUTE Holloa! you ain't going slightly insane, are you?

DEACON. No, no fear of that, I'm only happy, that's all

CUTF. I wonder if he's been taking a nipper?

DEACON As you are a relation of Miss Ophelia's, I think it proper that I should make you my confidant, in fact, let you into a little scheme that I have lately conceived

CUTE Is it a speculation?

DEACON Well, it is, just at present, but I trust before many hours to make it a surety

CUTE. By chowder! I hope it won't serve you the way my speculations have served me But fire away, old boy, and give us the prospectus

DEACON Well, then, my young friend, I have been thinking, ever since Miss Ophelia returned to Vermont that she was just the person to fill the place of my lamented Molly

CUTE Say, you couldn't tell us who your lamented a Molly was, could you?

DFACON. Why, the late Mrs Perry, to be sure CUTE Oh! then the lamented Molly was your wife? DEACON. She was

CUTE. And now you wish to marry Miss Ophelia?

DEACON Exactly

CUTE [Aside.] Consarn this old porpoise! if I let him to that he'll Jew me out of my living By chowder! I'll but a spoke in his wheel

DEACON. Well, what do you say? Will you intercede or me with your aunt?

(UTE. No! bust me up, if I do!

DEACON NO?

OUTE No. I tell you I forbid the bans Now, ain't ou a purty individual, to talk about getting married, ou old superannuated Methuselah specimen of humanit! Why, you've got one foot in etarnity already, and other ain't fit to stand on Go home and go to bed! have your head shaved, and send for a lawyer to make your will, leave your property to your heirs—if you hain't got any, why leave it to me—I'll take care of it, ind charge nothing for the trouble

DEACON. Really, sir, this language, to one of my tanding, is highly indecorous—it's more, sir, than I feel villing to endure, sir. I shall expect an explanation sir. CUTE. Now, you see, old gouty toes, you're losing our temper.

DEACON. Sir, I'm a deacon, I never lost my temper $\ensuremath{\mathsf{n}}$ all my life, sir

CUTE Now, you see, you're getting excited, you had retter go, we can't have a disturbance here!

DEACON. No, sir! I shall not go, sir! I shall not go intil I have seen Miss Ophelia. I wish to know if she aill countenance this insult.

(UTE. Now keep cool, old stick-in-the-mud' Draw it mild, old timber-toes!

DEACON. Damn it all, sir, what-

CUTE. Oh! only think, now, what would people say o hear a deacon swearing like a trooper?

DEACON. Sir-I-you-this is too much, sir

CUTE. Well, now, I calculate that's just about my pinion, so we'll have no more of it. Get out of thist rart your boots, or by chowder! I'll pitch you from one ind of the stairs to the other

[Enter OPHELIA.]

OPHELIA Hosty tosty! What's the meaning of all hese loud words

[Together.]

CUTE Well, you see, Aunt-

DEACON Miss Ophelia, I beg-

CUTE. Now, look here, you just hush your yap! How can I fix up matters if you keep jabbering?

OPHELIA. Silence! for shame, Mr Cute Is that the 50 way you speak to the deacon?

CUTE. Darn the deacon!

OPHELIA Deacon Perry, what is all this?

DEACON Madam, a few words will explain everything Hearing from this person that he was your nephew, I ventured to tell him that I cherished hopes of making you my wife, whereupon he flew into a violent passion, and ordered me out of the house

OPHFLIA Does this house belong to you or me, Mr Cute?

CUTE. Well, to you, I reckon

OPHELIA. Then how dare you give orders in it?

CUTE. Well, I calculated you wouldn't care about marrying old half-a-century there

OPHELIA. That's enough, I will marry him, and as for you, [points to the right] get out

CUTE Get out?

OPHELIA. Yes, the sooner the better

CUTE Darned if I don't serve him out first though [CUTE makes a dash at DEACON who gets behind OPHELIA. TOPSY enters with a broom and beats CUTE around stage.—OPHELIA faints in DEACON'S aims.—CUTE falls, and TOPSY butts him, keeling over him.—Outch drop.]

ACT VI

SCENE I Dark Landscape An old, roofless shed Tom is discovered in shed, lying on some old cotton bagging Cassy kneels by his side, holding a cup to his lips

CASSY. Drink all ye want I knew how it would be It 10 isn't the first time I've been out in the night, carrying water to such as you.

TOM [Returning cup.] Thank you, missis

CASSY. Don't call me missis I'm a miserable slave like yourself—a lower one than you can ever be! It's no use, my poor fellow, this you've been trying to do You were a brave fellow. You had the right on your side, but it's all in vain for you to struggle. You are in the Devil's hands he is the strongest, and you must give up

TOM Oh! how can I give up?

- CASSY You see you don't know anything about it, I do Here you are, on a lone plantation, ten miles from any other, in the swamps, not a white person here who could testify, if you were burned alive. There's no law here that can do you, or any of us, the least good, and this man' there's no earthly thing that he is not bad to enough to do. I could make one's hair rise, and their teeth chatter, if I should only tell what I've seen and been knowing to here, and it's no use resisting! Did I want to live with him? Wasn't I a woman delicately bred? and he!—Father in Heaven! what was he and is he? And yet I've lived with him these five years, and cursed every moment of my life, night and day.

TOM Oh, heaven! have you quite forgot us poor critters?

cassy And what are these miserable low dogs you work with, that you should suffer on their account? Everyone of them would turn against you the first time they get a chance. They are all of them as low and cruel to each other as they can be, there's no use in your suffering to keep from hurting them!

TOM What made 'em cruel? If I give out, I shall get used to it and grow, little by little, just like 'em. No, no, missis, I ve lost everything, wife, and children, and home and a kind master, and he would have set me free if he'd only lived a day longer—I've lost everything in this world, and now I can't lose heaven, too, no, I can't get to be wicked besides all.

CASSY. But it can't be that He will lay sin to our account, he won't charge it to us when we are forced to it, he'll charge it to them that drove us to it. Can I do anything more for you? Shall I give you some more water?

TOM Oh missis! I wish you'd go to Him who can give you living waters!

CASSY. Go to Him! Where is He? Who is He?
TOM Our Heavenly Father!

CASSY. I used to see the picture of Him, over the altar, when I was a girl, but he isn't here'. There's nothing here but sin, and long, long despair! There, there, don't talk any more, my poor fellow. Try to sleep, if you can I must hasten back, lest my absence be noted. Think of me when I am gone, Uncle Tom, and pray, pray for me [Exit CASSY. TOM sinks back to sleep.]

SCENE II Street in New Orleans Enter George Shelby.

GEORGE. At length my mission of mercy is nearly finished, I have reached my journey's end I have now but to find the house of Mr St Clare, re-purchase old Uncle Tom, and convey him back to his wife and children, in old Kentucky Some one approaches, he may, perhaps, be able to give me the information I require I will accost him [Enter MARKS] Pray, sir, can you tell me where Mr St Clare dwells?

MARKS Where I don't think you'll be in a hurry to seek him

GEORGE. And where is that?

MARKS. In the grave!

GEORGE. Stay, sir' you may be able to give me some information concerning Mr St Clare

MARKS. I beg pardon, sir, I am a lawyer, I can't afford to gire anything

GEORGE But you would have no objections to selling it?

MARKS Not the slightest

GEORGE What do you value it at?

MARKS Well, say five dollars, that's reasonable

GEORGE There they are [Grees money.] Now answer me to the best of your ability. Has the death of St. Clare caused his slaves to be sold?

MARKS It has

GEORGE How were they sold?

MARKS At auction—they went dirt cheap

GEORGE How were they bought-all in one lot?

MARKS No, they went to different bidders

GLORGE Was you present at the sale?

MARKS I was

GEORGE Do you remember seeing a Negro among them called Tom?

MARKS What, Uncle Tom?

GEORGE The same—who bought him?

MARKS A Mr Legree

GFORGE Where is his plantation?

MARKS Up in Louisiana, on the Red River, but a man never could find it unless he had been there before

GEORGE Who could I get to direct me there?

MARKS Well, stranger, I don't know of any one just at present, 'cept myself, could find it for you, it's such an out-of-the-way sort of hole, and if you are a mind to come down handsomely, why. I'll do it

GEORGE. The reward shall be ample

MARKS Enough said, stranger, let's take the steampoat at once [Exeunt.]

CENE III A Rough Chamber Enter Legree. Sits

LEGREE Plague on that Sambo, to kick up this yer ow between me and the new hands [CASSY steals on, md stands behind bim.] The fellow won't be fit to work tor a week now, right in the press of the season

CASSY Yes, just like you

LEGREE Hah! you she-devil! you've come back, have

CASSY Yes, I have, come to have my own way, too LEGREE You lie, you jade! I'll be up to my word Lither behave yourself, or stay down in the quarters and tare and work with the rest CASSY. I'd rather, ten thousand times, live in the diffuset hole in the quarters, than be under your hoof!

LIGREE But you are under my hoof, for all that, that sone comfort, so sit down here and listen to reason [Grasps her urists] cassy Simon Legree, take care! [LEGREE lets go bis hold] You're afraid of me, Simon, and you've reason to be, for I ve got the Devil in me!

LEGREE I believe to my soul you have After all, Cassy, why can't you be friends with me, as you used to?
CASSY [Bitterly] Used to!

LEGREE I wish, Cassy, you'd behave yourself decently CASSY. You talk about behaving decently! and what 've you been doing? You haven't even sense enough to keep from spoiling one of your best hands, right in the most pressing season just for your devilish temper.

LEGREE I was a fool, it's a fact, to let any such brangle

Gime up, but when Tom set up his will he had to be broke in (ASSY You'll never break him in

LEGREE Won't I² I'd like to know if I won't¹ He'll be the first nigger that ever come it round me¹ I'll break every bone in his body but he shall give up

[Enter SAMBO with a paper in his hand, he stands bowing]

LEGREE What's that, you dog?

SAMBO. It's a witch thing, mas'r

LEGREE. A what?

SAMBO. Something that niggers gets from witches. Keep 'em from feeling when they's flogged. He had it tied round his neck with a black string

[LEGREE takes the paper and opens it.—A silver dollar drops on the stage, and a long curl of light hair twines around his finger.]

LEGREE Damnation [Stamping and writhing, as if the hair burned him] Where did this come from? Take it off! burn it up! burn it up! [Throws the curl away.] What did you bring it to me for?

SAMBO. [Trembling] I beg pardon, mas'r, I thought you would like to see 'um

LEGREE. Don't you bring me any more of your devilish things [Shakes his fist at SAMBO who runs off. 50 LEGREE kicks the dollar after him] Blast it! where did he get that? If it didn't look just like—whoo! I thought I d forgot that Curse me if I think there's any such thing as forgetting anything, any how CASSY What is the matter with you, Legree? What is there in a simple curl of fair hair to appal a man like you-—you who are familiar with every form of cruelty!

1 EUREE. Cassy, to-night the past has been recalled to me—the past that I have so long and vainly striven to forger CASSY Hast aught on this earth power to move a soul like thine?

LEGREE Yes, for hard and reprobate as I now seem, there has been a time when I have been rocked on the bosom of a mother, cradled with prayers and pious hymns, my now seared brow bedewed with the waters of holy baptism

CASSY. [Ande] What sweet memories of childhood can thus soften down that heart of iron

LEGREE In early childhood a fair-haired woman has 70 led me, at the sound of Sabbath bells, to worship and to pray Born of a hard-tempered sire, on whom that gentle woman had wasted a world of unvalued love, I followed in the steps of my father Boisterous, unruly and tyrannical, I despised all her counsel, and would have none of her reproof, and, at an early age, broke from her to seek my fortunes on the sea I never came home but once after that, and then my mother, with the yearning of a heart that must love something, and had nothing else to love, clung to me, and sought with passionate prayers and entreaties to win me from a life of sin

CASSY. That was your day of grace, Legree, then good angels called you, and mercy held you by the hand LEGREE. My heart inly relented, there was a conflict, but sin got the victory, and I set all the force of my rough nature against the conviction of my conscience. I drank and swore, was wilder and more brutal than ever. And one night, when my mother, in the last agony of her despair, knelt at my feet, I spurned her from me, threw her senseless on the floor, and with brutal curses fled to my ship.

CASSY Then the fiend took thee for his own!

LFGREF The next I heard of my mother was one night while I was carousing among drunken comno panions. A letter was put in my hands. I opened it and a lock of long, curling hair fell from it, and twined about my fingers, even as that lock twined but now. The letter told me that my mother was dead, and that dying she blest and forgave me! [Buries his face in his hands.]

CASSY. Why did you not even then renounce your evil ways?

LFGREF There is a dread, unhallowed necromancy of evil, that turns things sweetest and holiest to phantoms of horror and affright That pale, loving mother,—her dying prayers, her forgiving love,—wrought in my demoniac heart of sin only as a damning sentence, bringing with it a fearful looking for judgment and fiery indignation

CASSY And yet you would not strive to avert the doom that threatened you

LEGREE I burned the lock of hair and I burned the letter, and when I saw them hissing and crackling in the flame, inly shuddered as I thought of everlasting fires! I tried to drink and revel, and swear away the 30 memory, but often in the deep night, whose solemn stillness arraigns the soul in forced communion with itself, I have seen that pale mother rising by my bedside, and felt the soft twining of that hair around my fingers 'till the cold sweat would roll down my face and I would spring from my bed in horror-horror! [Falls in chair -- After a paine What the devil ails me Large drops of sweat stand on my forehead and my heart beats heavy and thick with fear. I thought I saw something white rising and glimmering in the gloom 40 before me, and it seemed to bear my mother's face! I know one thing, I'll let that fellow Tom alone, after this What did I want with his cussed paper? I believe I am bewitched sure enough! I've been shivering and sweating ever since! Where did he get that hair? It couldn't have been that! I burn'd that up, I know I did! It would be a toke if hair could rise from the dead! I'll have Sambo and Quimbo up here to sing and dance one of their dances, and keep off these horrid notions. Here Sambo! Quimbo! [Exit.]

CASSY Yes, Legree, that golden tress was charmed each hair had in it a spell of terror and remorse $f_{\rm OI}$ thee, and was used by a mightier power to bind thy crucl hands from inflicting uttermost evil on the helpless' [Ext]

cutte You're right, I calculate Yours is Marks, reckon

MARKS Just so

CUTE Well, I swow. I m glad to see you [They shak hands] How's your wholesome?

MARKS Hearty as ever Well who would hav thought of ever seeing you again. Why, I thought you wis in Vermont?

CUTE Well, so I was You see I went there afte that rich relation of mine—but the speculation didn'turn out well

MARKS How so

CUTE Why, you see, she took a shine to an old fellow—Deacon Abraham Perry—and married him

MARKS. Oh, that rather put your nose out of joint in that quarter

CUTE Busted me right up, I tell you. The deacon dithe handsome thing though he said if I would leav the neighbourhood and go out South again, he'd stanthe damage. I calculate I didn't give him much time to change his mind and so, you see, here I am again.

MARKS What are you doing in that soldier rig?

CUTE. Oh, this is my sign

MARKS Your sign?

CUTF Yes, you see, I'm engaged just at present in a all-fired good speculation, I'm a Fillibusterow

MARKS A what?

CUTE A Fillibusterow! Don't you know what that is It's Spanish for Cuban Volunteer, and means a chaj that goes the whole porker for glory and all that ere sor of thing MARKS. Oh! you've joined the order of the Lone Starl CUTE You've hit it. You see I bought this uniform at a second-hand clothing store. I puts it on and goes to a benevolent individual and I says to him,—appealing to his feelings,—I'm one of the fellows that went to Cuba and got massacred by the bloody. Spaniards. I'm in a destitute condition—give me a trifle to pay my passage back, so I can whop the tyrannical cusses and incide my brave fellow soger what got slewed there.

MARKS. How pathetic!

CUTE I tell you it works up the feelings of benevolent individuals dreadfully. It draws tears from their eves ind money from their pockets. By chowder one old chap gave me a hundred dollars to help on the cause.

MARKS I admire a genius like yours

CUTE. But I say, what are you up to?

MARKS I am the travelling companion of a young gentleman by the name of Shelby who is going to the plantation of a Mr Legree, on the Red River, to buy an old darky who used to belong to his father

(UTE Legree—Legree? Well, now, I calculate I've heard that ere name afore

MARKS. Do you remember that man who drew a bowie knife on you in New Orleans?

CUTE. By chowder! I remember the circumstance just is well as if it was yesterday, but I can't say that I recollect much about the man, for you see I was in something of a hurry about that time and didn't stop to take a good look at him.

MARKS Well, that man was this same Mr Legree CUTF Do you know, now I should like to pay that critter off?

MARKS. Then I'll give you an opportunity (UTE. Chowder! how will you do that?

MARKS. Do you remember the gentleman that inerfered between you and Legree?

CUTE Yes-well?

MARKS He received the blow that was intended for you, and died from the effects of it. So, you see, Legree is a murderer, and we are the only witnesses of the deed. His life is in our hands.

CUTE Let's have him right up and make him dance on nothing to the tune of Yankee Doodle!

MARKS. Stop a bit Don't you see a chance for a profitable speculation?

CUTE. A speculation! Fire away, don't be bashful, I'm the man for a speculation

MARKS I have made a deposition to the Governor of the State of all the particulars of that affair at Orleans

CUTE What did you do that for?

MARKS. To get a warrant for his arrest

CUTE. Oh! and have you got it?

MARKS. Yes, here it is [Takes out paper.]

CUTF Well, now, I don't see how you are going to make anything by that bit of paper?

MARKS But I do I shall say to Legree, I have got a warrant against you for murder, my friend, Mr Cute, and myself are the only witnesses who can appear against you Give us a thousand dollars, and we will tear up the warrant and be silent

CUTE Then Mr Legree forks over a thousand dollars, and your friend Cute pockets five hundred of it. Is that the calculation?

William J. Grayson

1788 · 1863

William Sumner Jenkins, in his Pro-Slatery Thought in the Old South, has shown that the defense of slavery, always roused by attack, developed gradually from apology to militance. Before 1820 Southerners tended to argue either that they were not responsible for the institution, and should be given time to work out in their own way the problem forced upon them by English and Yankee slave-traders, or that the Negro race was so inferior that slavery was its natural condition. A second stage of Southern opinion shows a more positive appeal to the authoritative sanctions of Scripture and history. Finally, and chiefly after 1835, as the abolition movement gained in fervor, Southerners came to study their peculiar institution" and to glorify it as the best of all possible solutions to the economic and moral puzzles of a biracial and agricultural society

Of the hundreds of books and pamphlets which make up proslavery literature the most readable today are probably those by William J. Grayson. As one of his biographers has said, Grayson "was a very temperate advocate of state rights, and a very anniable defender of Southern institutions." Calhoun doubtless had a sharper mind when it came to political analysis, and other Southern leaders loomed larger than Grayson in their day William Harper (Memoir on Slavery, 1838), Thomas R. Dew (Essay on Slavery, 1849), George Fitzhugh (Sociology for the South, 1854), and Albert Taylor Bledsoe (Essay on Liberty and Slavery, 1856), to name a few examples Grayson, however, succeeded in condensing most of the favorite Southern arguments into short space and reasonably attractive form, so that he provides perhaps the most convenient view of the defense of the institution which nearly split the Union

Grayson was a down-state South Carolinian, born in Beaufort District in 1788 From Columbia College, later the University of South Carolina, where he was graduated in 1809, he proceeded to law and politics. He sat in the state legislature, served two terms in the national House of Representatives, and from 1841 until 1853 was Collector of the Port of Charleston. In the conservative literary circles of Charleston he had a leading place as a contributor to the newspapers and to such magazines as DeBours Review and the Southern Literary Messenger Unlike Calhoun he rejected secession as an instrument to obtain what the South wanted, and a letter to Governor Seabrook, published in 1850, helped to halt a strong movement for separation. His Unionist sentiment, however, did not keep him from defending slavery, first in a series of essays published in the Charleston Courter and reprinted as Letters to Curtius (1851) and then in the poem for which he is best known today, The Hireling and the Slave (1854) He was also the author of a number of pamphlets and a biography of his friend and college classmate, James Louis Petigru. The last-named book appeared in 1866, three years after Grayson's death, he who reads it now can find betweer the lines its author's deep grief at the tragedy of the Civil War

Like most of his Charleston contemporaries Grayson was somewhat old-fashioned in his literary tastes, hap pier with Dryden and Pope than with most of the poet of his own time. For reasons which he gives in his Preface he chose to write his best-remembered poem if heroic couplets. As a poet he can scarcely merit much attention. His ideas, however, were those of a class and a time which the serious student, observing the South of the present day, cannot afford to ignore. As Parring ton has said, Grayson was "an intelligent and humanic writer who might be blind to certain evils in slaver but whose eves were open to the social ills that grev rankly in the muck of industrialism" Southern agrarian ism still has its force as one of the recurrent protest against mechanization in American life. Its roots are to be found in the views of the planter aristocracy which Gravson ably represented

The Hireling and the Slave

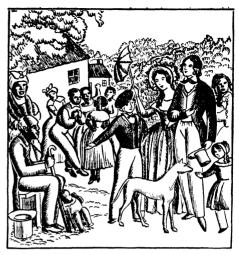

Grayson's most ambitious poem consists of nearly sixteen hundred lines in heroic couplets, together with the Preface reprinted here and more than twenty pages of explanatory notes (of which the longest have been omitted). He argues that the state of the slave is essentially the same as that of the pauperized workman of England; both are forced to labor hard for their subsistence. The hireling, however, does not always obtain his reward, being subject to starvation, vice, brutality, military service, and ex pulsion from his home—evils which the slave ordinarily escapes Part I describes the miserable condition of the free laborer and attacks the meddling of abolitionists The portion here reprinted is that directed at Harrie Beecher Stowe, together with the concluding summary o the advantages of the slave system of economy Part 1 is largely an account of the pleasures of plantation life of which the first portion is selected here. Its pictures of cabin life, Christmas pleasures, dancing, and church wor ship are the type of thing which Southern writers of the postwar era recalled with nostalgia Note that Grayson appealed strongly to nationalistic, anti-British feeling Ir lines 743-758 of Part I he effectively presents the ruling class philosophy, with its emphasis upon order and in dustry. The vitriolic treatment of Mrs Stowe and the contemptuous allusions to "Utopian" reformers are signif icant revelations of the Southern mind in the 1850's.

he malignant abuse lavished on the slaveholders of America by writers in this country and England can be accounted for but in one way consistently with any degree of charitable consideration for the slanderers. They have no knowledge of the thing abused. They substitute an ideal of their own contriving for the reality They regard slavery as a system of chains, whips, and fortures. They consider its abuses as its necessary condiand a cruel master its fair representative. Mr Clarkson took up the subject, originally, as a fit one for a college exercise in rhetoric, and it became a rhetorical exercise for life to himself and his followers. With these people the cruelty of slavery is an affair of tropes and figures But they have dealt so long in metaphorical tetters and prisons, that they have brought themselves to believe that the Negroes work in chains and live in dungeons

To prove the evils of slavery, they collect, from all quarters, its abuses, and show the same regard for fairness and common sense as they would do to gather all the atrocities of their own country committed by husbands and wives, parents and children, masters and servints, priest and people, and denounce these several elations in life in consequence of their abuses.

The laborer suffers wrong and cruelty in England, out they say it is against the law, against public opinon, he may apply to the courts for redress, these are pen to him Cruelty to the slave is equally against the and It is equally condemned by public opinion, and as o the courts of law being open to the pauper hireling, we may remember the reply of Sheridan to a similar temark, Yes, and so are the London hotels justice and a good dinner at a public house are equally within his teach. If, in consequence of the evils incident to hireling labor-because there are severe, heartless, grinding imployers, and miscrable, starving hirelings, it were proposed to abolish hireling labor, it would be quite as just ind logical as the argument to abolish slavery because here are sufferings among slaves, and hard hearts among nasters. The cruelty or suffering is no more a necessary part of the one system than of the other Notwithstandng its abuses and miseries, the hireling system works reneficially with white laborers, and so also, notwithtanding hard masters, slavery, among a Christian peole, is advantageous to the Negro. But to establish the hireling system with Africans would be as wise as to endeavor to bestow the constitutional government of England on Ashantee or Dahomey In both cases there would be an equal amount of abstract truth and practical absurdity.

Slavery is that system of labor which exchanges subsistence for work, which secures a life-maintenance from the master to the slave, and gives a life-labor from the slave to the master. The slave is an apprentice for life, and owes his labor to his master, the master owes support, during life, to the slave. Slavery is the Negro system of labor. He is lazy and improvident. Slavery makes all work, and it insures homes, food, and clothing for all It permits no idleness, and it provides for sickness, infancy, and old age. It allows no tramping or skulking, 60 and it knows no pauperism.

This is the whole system substantially. All cruelty is an abuse, does not belong to the institution, is now punished, and may be in time prevented. The abuses of slavery are as open to all reforming influences as those of any other civil, social, or political condition. The improvement in the treatment of the slave is as marked as in that of any other laboring class in the world. If it be true of the English soldier or sailor that his condition has been ameliorated in the last fifty years, it is quite as true of the Negro.

If slavery is subject to abuses, it has its advantages also It establishes more permanent, and, therefore, kinder relations between capital and labor. It removes what Stuart Mill calls "the widening and imbittering feud between the class of labor and the class of capital." It draws the relation closer between master and servant. It is not an engagement for days or weeks, but for life. There is no such thing with slavery as a laborer for whom nobody cares or provides. The most wretched feature in hircling labor is the isolated, miserable creature who has no home, no work, no food, and in whom no 20 one is particularly interested. This is seen among birelines only.

The sale of slaves is thought to be a great evil to the slave. But what is it substantially more than a transfer of labor from one employer to another? Is this an evil to the laborer? Would it be considered an evil by the European hireling if the laws required every master, before he dismissed his workmen, to secure to them another employer? Would it be an evil to the hireling to be certain of obtaining work—to be safe from the misery of having no employer, no work, while he is starving for bread? The sale of the slave is the form in which the laws secure the slave from this misery of the hireling—secure to him a certainty of employment and a certainty of subsistence. The hireling has neither

I do not say that slavery is the best system of labor, but only that it is the best for the Negro in this country. In a nation composed of the same race or similar races where the laborer is intelligent, industrious, and provident, money-wages may be better than subsistence. Even under all advantages there are great defects in the hireling system, for which, hitherto, no statesman has discovered an adequate remedy. In hireling states there are thousands of idlers, trampers, poachers, smugglers drunkards, and thieves, who make theft a profession. There are thousands who suffer for want of food and clothing, from inability to obtain them. For these two classes-those who will not work, and those who cannot-there is no sufficient provision. Among slaves there are no trampers, idlers, smugglers, poachers, and none suffer from want Every one is made to work, and no one is permitted to starve Slavery does for the Negro what European schemers in vain attempt to do for the hireling It secures work and subsistence for all lt secures more order and subordination also. The master is a Commissioner of the Poor on every plantation, to provide food, clothing, medicine, houses, for his people He is a police-officer to prevent idleness, drunkeness theft, or disorder I do not mean by formal appointment of law, but by virtue of his relation to his slaves There is, therefore, no starvation among slaves There are, comparatively, few crimes If there are paupers in slave states, they are the hirelings of other countries who have run away from their homes Pauperism be gan with them when serfage was abolished

But you must confess, it is said, that slavery is an evil True enough; in the same sense in which the hireling's hard labor is an evil. But the poet tells us that there are worse things in the world than hard labor, "with outen that would come a heavier bale," and so there are worse things for the Negro than slavery in a Christian land. Archbishop Hughes, in his late visit to Cuba asked the Africans if they wished to return to their native country, the answer was always no. If the African is happier here than in his own country, can we say that, for him, the establishment of slavery is an evil. If the master is contented with his part in the system with what reason can we regard it as an evil, so far as he is concerned? Slaves and masters are equally satisfied. The discontented are those who are neither

What more can be required of slevery, in reference to the Negro, than has been done? It has made him, from savage, an orderly and efficient laborer, it supports m in comfort and peace, it restrains his vices, it imvoves his mind, morals, and manners; it instructs him Christian knowledge.

But the quarrel is with the master, and the design is calumniate and injure him And why this attack on master? Who, among its pretended friends, will are to say that they have done for the African race what ne slaveholders of North America have done and are ping? What Abolitionist has bestowed on the Negro ie same enduring patience, the same useful education. e same care and attendance? Who among them has me, or given, or sacrificed as much? Under the mas-15 care, the miserable black savage has been fed, othed, instructed in useful arts, and made an imporet contributor to the business and enjoyments of the orld What have the Abolitionists done, what have iev given, for the Negro race? They use the slave for re purposes of self-glorification only, indifferent about is present or future condition. They are ambitious to ring about a great social revolution-what its effects av be they do not care to inquire.

All Christians believe that the affairs of the world are rected by Providence for wise and good purposes. The ming of the Negro to North America makes no exption to the rule. His transportation was a rude mode emigration; the only practicable one in his case, not tended with more wretchedness than the emigrant up often exhibits even now, notwithstanding the pasnger law. What the purpose of his coming is we may at presume to judge. But we can see much good alady resulting from it—good to the Negro in his imoved condition, to the country whose rich fields he scleared of the forest, and made productive in clitates unfit for the labor of the white man; to the Connent of Africa in furnishing, as it may ultimately, the nly means for civilizing its people

The end of slavery, then, would seem to be, present and to the slave himself, to the country in which he bors and the world at large, and future good to his the world at large, and future good to his the world are large, and future good to his the world are large, and future good to his the world are large, and future good to his the world is approve disapprove of the mode in which it has pleased dine Providence to bring all this about, the event will obably be the same. It may be doubted whether these online and their friends could have administered affairs of the world more wisely, whatever our opinion may be of their wisdom or benevolence. As they will never have the power to try, this must remain among the other unsettled questions that perplex the ingenuity of mankind.

There is, however, a plain, practicable mode in which these anti-slavery zealots may confer freedom on thousands, year after year, without offense to any party. The plan is simple and easy. Let them show their sympathy for the Negro, not by eloquent speeches, but more eloquent acts, not with sentiment, but with sovereigns. They can buy any number of Negroes and carry them where they please For such a purpose the government would not object Efficient laborers are wanted in the West Indies Here is a ready way to procure them. 60 They may, in this manner, bestow freedom on many of the slaves of America, confer a benefit on their colonies, and gratify their own excited sensibilities with something more profound than unprofitable words. They feel profoundly for the Negro, let them feel to the amount of a million a year. This would be better than bringing Coolies from Asia and Negroes from Africa by a system of very doubtful character. It would convince the world that their sympathy is an honest one, and not the offspring of vanity or arrogance

An ingenious lady of South Carolina, in a very admirable letter, has made a similar proposal to the Duchess of Sutherland. But Her Grace is a near relation of the priest in the fable, who refused a half crown to a suppliant, but was ready enough to give him a blessing. The Abolitionists all belong to this benevolent class of world-menders, who are willing at all times to help every body, if it cost them no more than pretty phrases.

In the remarks made in reference to the condition of 80 the hireling in Europe—of England especially—I have no feeling but compassion for the unfortunate paupers, and intend no reproach to their country—I venerate

⁴¹ Lord Carlisle, G W F Howard (1802-1864), seventh Earl of Carlisle P'e was or a of the philanthropists to whom Mrs. Stowe sent copies of Uncle Tom's. Cabin and who entertained her when she visited England in 1853 * 73 Duchess of Sutherland, Harriel Elizabeth Georgiana Leveson-Gower (1806-1868), wife of the second Duke of Sutherland After reading Uncle Tom's Cabin she led a group of prominent Englishwomen in the framing of An Affectionate and Christian Address (1853), a petition signed by over 500,000 women urging their American sisters to work for the abolition of slavery.

England as the great mother of nations, as our teacher in law, literature, civil and political liberty. The facts relating to the poverty, vice, brutality, and ignorance of the British laborer are taken, as may be seen from the notes attached, from English authorities, they can be multiplied a hundred fold. In adverting to them, I have merely desired to show that there is a poor and suffering class in all countries, the richest and most civilized not excepted—laborers who get their daily bread by daily work, and that the slave is as well provided for as any other. The poor we shall have with us always, and whether the poor hircling or the poor slave is most the object of pity or subject of distress, is the only question proposed, and the true one at issue.

In comparing their several conditions, no contempt is implied, certainly none intended for the situation of the hireling poor. All honest labor is worthy of honor that of the faithful slave not less so than my other. Moralists are accustomed to weigh the advantages and evils of the highest and lowest, the palace and cottage, what forbids us to do so with the good and ill of the two humblest stations of civilized life?

It may be thought unnecessary to invite public attention again to the subject of slavery. But if the subject be trite it is also of incalculable and unceasing interest. I have endcavored to diversity the mode, if not the matter of the argument, by throwing the remarks offered into verse. I have done so, not only for the reason assigned, but with the additional purpose of of-30 fering some variety to the poetic forms that are almost universally prevalent. The poetry of the day is, for the most part, subale and transcendental in its character Every sentiment, reflection, or description is wrought into elaborate modes of expression from remote and fanciful analogies. The responses of the Muses have become as mystical and sometimes as obscure as those of more ancient oracles, and disdain the older and homelier forms of English verse

It has occurred to me that a return to the more sober style of an earlier period may not be an unreasonable experiment on the public taste. The fashion in dress and furniture now and then goes back a century or two, why not the fashion of verse? The school of Dryden and Pope is not entirely forgotten. May we not imitate the poetry of Queen Anne's time as well as the tables and chairs? The common measure of that period, applied to a didactic subject, may diversity the dishes presented to the public, and provide for its appetite the same kind of relief that bread and butter or beef and pudding would offer after a long indulgence in more refined and elaborate dishes. The most fastidious appetite may tolerate an occasional change of diet, and exchange dainties now and then for plainer fare

FROM PART FIRST

There Stowe, with prostituted pen, assails One half her country in malignant tales, Careless, like Trollope, whether truth she tells, And anxious only how the libel sells, To slanders mart she furnishes supplies, And feeds its morbid appetite for lies On fictions fashioned with malicious art, The venal pencil, and malignant heart, With fact distorted, interence unsound, Creatures in fancy, not in nature found-Chaste Quadroon virgins, saints of sable hue, Martyrs, than zealous Paul more tried and true, Demoniac masters, sentimental slaves, Mulatto cavaliers, and Creole knaves-Monsters each portrait drawn, each story told! What then? The book may bring its weight in gold Enough! upon the crafty rule she leans That makes the purpose justify the means, Concocts the venom, and, with eager gaze, To Glasgow flies for patron, pence, and praise, And for a slandered country finds rewards In smiles or sneers of duchesses and lords

For profits and applauses poor as these, To the false tale she adds its falser Keys of gathered slanders-her ignoble aim. x'tth foes to traffic in her country's shame

Strange power of nature, from whose efforts flow uch diverse forms as Nightingale and Stowe! one glares a torch of discord, one a star of blessing shines amid the wrecks of war, one prone to libel, one to deeds of love, The vulture-spirit one, and one the dove. n various joys their various natures deal, one leaves her home to wound it, one to heal, That to expose its sorrows, not deplore, To help and cheer, this seeks a foreign shore

Far from her country, where Marmora flows, In Mercy's errand England's daughter goes, To tend the suffering sick with woman's care, To snatch the bleeding soldier from despair, Bend o'er his couch, his languid head sustain, With tender hand assuage the pangs of pain, Watch o'er the dying moments of the brave, And smooth, at least, his passage to the grave, love's labor this, and—her's no common fame! With the heart's homage millions bless her name

Not such with Stowe, the wish or power to please, she finds no joys in gentle deeds like these, A moral scavenger, with greedy eye, n social ills her coarser labors lie In fields where vice eludes the light of day, the hunts up crimes as beagles hunt their prev, ileans every dirty nook—the felon's jail, and hangman's mem'ry, for detraction's tale, Souffs up pollution with a pious air, (ollects a rumor here, a slander there, With hatred's ardor gathers Newgate spoils, And trades for gold the garbage of her toils

In sink and sewer thus, with searching eye, Through mud and slime unhappy wretches pry, n fetid puddles dabble with delight, earch every filthy gathering of the night, ish from its depths, and to the spacious bag onvey with care the black, polluted rag, Vith reeking waifs secure the nightly bed, and turn their noisome stores to daily bread.

These use the Negro, a convenient tool, That yields substantial gain or party rule, Gives what without it they could never know, To Chase distinction, courtly friends to Stowe, To Parker, themes for muracles of rant. And Beecher, blesses with new gifts of cant The master's task has been the black to train. To form his mind, his passions to restrain, With anxious care and patience to impart The knowledge that subdues the savage heart, To give the Gospel lessons that control The rudest breast, and renovate the soul-Who does, or gives as much, of all who raise Their sland'rous cry for foreign pence or praise, Of all the knaves who clamor and declaim For party power or philanthropic fame, Or use the Negro's fancied wrongs and woes As pretty themes for maudlin verse or prose?

Taught by the master's efforts, by his care Fed, clothed, protected many a patient year, From trivial numbers now to millions grown, With all the white man's useful arts their own. Industrious, docile, skilled in wood and field, To guide the plow, the sturdy axe to wield. The Negroes schooled by slavery embrace The highest portion of the Negro race, And none the savage native will compare, Of barbarous Guinea, with its offspring here

If bound to daily labor while he lives, His is the daily bread that labor gives, Guarded from want, from beggary secure, He never feels what hireling crowds endure, Nor knows, like them, in hopeless want to crave, For wife and child, the comforts of the slave, Or the sad thought that, when about to die, He leaves them to the cold world's charity,

Still Europe's saints, that mark the motes alone In other's eyes, yet never see their own, Grieve that the slave is never taught to write, And reads no better than the hireling white, Do their own plowmen no instruction lack, Have whiter clowns more knowledge than the black?710 Has the French peasant, or the German boor, Of learning's treasure any larger store, Have Ireland's millions, flying from the rule Of those who censure, ever known a school? A thousand years and Europe's wealth impart No means to mend the hireling's head or heart, They build no schools to teach the pauper white, Their toiling millions neither read nor write, Whence, then, the idle clamor when they rave Of schools and teachers for the distant slave? 720

And why the soft regret, the coarse attack, If Justice punish the offending black? Are whites not punished. When Utopian times Shall drive from earth all miseries and crimes. And teach the world the art to do without The cat, the gauntlet, and the brutal knout, Banish the halter, galley, jails, and chains, And strip the law of penalties and pains, Here, too, offense and wrong they may prevent, And slaves, with hirelings, need no punishment Till then, what lash of slavery will compare With the dread scourge that British soldiers bear? What gentle rule, in Britain's Isle, prevails, How rare her use of gibbets, stocks, and jails! How much humaner than a master's whip, Her penal colony and convict ship! Whose code of law can darker pages show, Where blood for smaller misdemeanors flow? The trifling theft or trespass, that demands For slaves light penance from a master's hands, Where Europe's milder punishments are known, Incurs the penalty of death alone

And yet the master's lighter rule insures
More order than the sternest code secures,
No mobs of factious workmen gather here.
No strikes we dread, no lawless riots fear.
Nuns, from their convent driven, at midnight fly,

Churches, in flames, ask vengeance from the sky,
Seditious schemes in bloody tumults end,
Parsons incite, and senators defend,
But not where slaves their easy labors ply,
Safe from the snare, beneath a master's eye,
In useful tasks engaged, employed their time,
Untempted by the demagogue to crime,
Secure they toil, uncursed their peaceful life,
With labor's hungry broils and wasteful strife.
No want to goad, no faction to deplore,
The slave escapes the perils of the poor

And yet the life, so unassailed by care, 50 blessed with moderate work, with ample fare, With all the good the starving pauper needs, The happier slave on each plantation leads, Sife from harassing doubts and annual fears, He dreads no famine in unfruitful years, It harvests fail from inauspicious skies, The master's providence his food supplies; No paupers perish here for want of bread, Or lingering live, by foreign bounty fed; No exiled trains of homeless peasants go, In distant climes, to tell their tales of woe: Fir other fortune, free from care and strife, For work, or bread, attends the Negro's life, And Christian slaves may challenge as their own, The blessings claimed in fabled states alone-The cabin home not comfortless, though rude, Light daily labor, and abundant food, The sturdy health that temperate habits yield, The cheerful song that rings in every field, The long, loud laugh, that freemen seldom share, Heaven's boon to bosoms unapproached by care, And boisterous iest and humor unrefined, That leave, though rough, no painful sting behind, While, nestling near, to bless their humble lot, Warm social joys surround the Negro's cot, The evening dance its merriment imparts, Love, with his rapture, fills their youthful hearts, And placed age, the task of labor done, Enjoys the summer shade, the winter sun, And, as through life no pauper want he knows, laments no poor-house penance at its close

Safe in Ambition's trumpet call to strife, No conscript fears harass his quiet life,

While the crushed peasant bleeds—a worthless thing, The broken toy of emperor or king, Calm in his peaceful home, the slave prepares His garden-spot, and plies his rustic cares, The comb and honey that his bees afford, The eggs in ample gourd compactly stored, The pig, the poultry, with a chapman's art, He sells or barters at the village mart, Or, at the master's mansion, never fails An ampler price to find and readier sales

There, when December's welcome frosts recall The friends and inmates of the crowded hall, 830 To each glad nursling of the master's race He brings his present, with a cheerful face And offered hand-of warm, unfeigning heart, In all his master's joys he claims a part, And, true as clansman to the Highland chief, Mourns every loss, and grieves in all his grief, When Christmas now, with its abundant cheer And thornless pleasure, speeds the parting year, He shares the common joy-the early morn Wakes hunter, clamorous hound, and echoing horn, 840 Quick steps are heard, the merry season named, The losterers caught, the wonted forfest claimed, In feasts maturing busy hands appear, And jest and laugh assail the ready ear; Whose voice, than his, more gayly greets the dawn,

Whose foot so lightly treads the frosty lawn. Whose heart as merrily, where mirth prevails, On every side the joyous season hails? Around the slaughtered ox-a Christmas prize, The slaves assembling stand with eager eyes, 850 Rouse, with their dogs, the porker's piercing cry, Or drag its squealing tenant from the sty, With smile and bow receive their winter dues, The strong, warm clothing and substantial shoes, Blankets adorned with stripes of border red, And caps of wool that warm the woollier head, Then clear the barn, the ample area fill, In the gay jig display their vigorous skill, No dainty sices, no mincing measures here--Ellsler's trained graces-seem to float in air, 2/0 But hearts of joy and nerves of living steel, On floors that spring beneath the bounding reel, Proud on his chair, with magisterial glance And stamping foot, the fiddler rules the dance, Draws, if he nods, the still unwearied bow, And gives a joy no bearded bands bestow, The triple holiday, on angel wings, With every fleeting hour a pleasure brings, No ennui clouds, no coming cares annoy, Nor wants nor sorrows check the Negro's joy

Their limbs o'er mouldering mansions of the dead, Moss-cinctured oaks and solemn pines between, Of modest wood, the house of God is seen, By shaded springs, that from the sloping land Bubble and sparkle through the silver sand, Where high o'er arching laurel blossoms blow, Where fragrant bays breathe kindred sweets below, And elm and ash their blended arms entwine With the bright foliage of the mantling vine In quiet chat, before the hour of player, Masters and slaves in scattered groups appear Loosed from the carriage, in the shades around Impatient horses neigh and paw the ground, 'No city discords break the silence here. No sounds unmeet offend the listener's ear. But rural melodies of flocks and birds. The lowing, far and faint, of distant herds, The mocking-bird with minstrel pride elate, The partridge whistling for its absent mate, The thrush's solitary notes prolong, Bold, merry blackbirds swell the general song, The crested cardinal, of scarlet hue, The Jay, with restless wing of softer blue. The cawing crow-upon the loftiest pine Cautious and safe-their various voices join

When now the pastor lifts his earnest eyes And hands outstretched, a suppliant to the skies No rights of pomp or pride beguile the soul, No organs peal, no clouds of incense roll, But, line by line, untutored voices raise, I ike the wild birds, their simple notes of praise, And hearts of love, with true devotion, bring Incense more pure to Heaven's eternal King, On glorious themes their humble thoughts employ, And rise transported with no earthly joy, The blessing said, the service o'er, again Their swelling voices raise the sacred strain, Lingering they love to sing of Jordan's shore, Where sorrows cease, and will is known no more

1828 · 1867

No writer of equal stature in this country," Professor W Parks justly observes, "has received so little attenon as Henry Timrod the "Laureate of the Confedtat"

Timrod attended the Coates School in Charleston, both Carolina—his birthplace—and studied for a year ad a half at the University of Georgia. After trying the win the office of James Louis Petigru in Charleson he turned to tutoring in planters' families. Later he is a contributor to Russell's Magazine (1857-1860), a surnal of literary promise published in Charleston and lited by his friend Paul Hamilton Hayne. Upon the arbreak of the Civil War, Timrod enlisted in the Conscience arms, but because of ill health was able to the less than a year. Undertaking, after a partial recuestation, the work of a war correspondent, he observed at close range the battle of Shiloh. In 1864 he edited a newspaper in Columbia, South Carolina, this position ended abrupdy when Columbia was taken by Sherman's army. The three remaining years of his life were a losing struggle against poverty and disease. His poems were collected, with a memori, by Paul Hamilton Hayne in 18-3.

Timrod's early verses were imitative of Wordsworth The war called forth his latent originality and inspired his best poems. These poems, though romantic in their aidoi, are remarkable for certain classical qualities, indeed, it is the fusion of romantic and classical elements that gives to Timrod's poetry a special distinction. To quote Professor Parks again "Although sincerity and throbbing emotion beat through his words in passionate undertones, the passion never carries the verse into formlessness of thought or reference. Instead an almost classic coolness and restraint appears, from first to last, in his He saw a poem as a whole, yet as composed of lines, and his best poems combine a clear disunction of line with a sense of rounded completeness" Other noteworthy merits of Timrod's verse are the mastery of the sustained, or epic, simile (see, particularly, the simile of the Cornwall mine in "The Cotton Boll"), and the classic purity of his diction

Ethnogenesis

Written During the Meeting of the First Southern Congress, at Montgomery, February, 1861

The following poem was first printed, with the title "Ode, on the Meeting of the Southern Congress," in the Charleston Mercury, September 26, 1861. The title "Ethnogenesis," which was substituted when the poem was reprinted in the Charleston Courier, January 31, 1862, is a Greek coinage meaning "the birth of a nation. At once ardent and resirained, the poem expresses the patriotic spirit of the newly formed Confederate States of America.

Hath not the morning dawned with added light?

And shall not evening call another star

Out of the infinite regions of the night.

To mark this day in Heaven? At last, we are

A nation among nations, and the world

Shall soon behold in many a distant port

Another flag unfurled!

Now, come what may, whose favor need we court?

And, under God, whose thunder need we tear?

Thank him who placed us here
Beneath so kind a sky—the very sun
Takes part with us, and on our crands run
All breezes of the ocean, dew and rain
Do noiseless battle for us, and the Year,
And all the gentle daughters in her train,
March in our ranks, and in our service wield
Long spears of golden grain!
A yellow blossom as her fairy shield,
June flings her azure banner to the wind,

While in the order of their birth Her sisters pass, and many an ample field Grows white beneath their steps, till now, behold,

Its endless sheets unfold THE SNOW OF SOUTHERN SUMMERS! Let the earth Rejoice! beneath those fleeces soft and warm

Our happy land shall sleep In a repose as deep As if we lay intrenched behind Whole leagues of Russian ice and Arctic storm! And what if, mad with wrongs themselves have wrought. In their own treachery caught, By their own fears made bold, And leagued with him of old, Who long since in the limits of the North Set up his evil throne, and warred with God-What if, both mad and blinded in their rage, Our foes should fling us down their mortal gage, And with a hostile step profane our sod! We shall not shrink, my brothers, but go forth To meet them, marshaled by the Lord of Hosts, And overshadowed by the mighty ghosts Of Moultrie and Eutaw-who shall foil Auxiliars such as these. Nor these alone, But every stock and stone Shall help us, but the very soil, And all the generous wealth it gives to toil, And all for which we love our noble land, Shall fight beside, and through us, sea and strand, The heart of woman, and her hand, Tree, fruit, and flower, and every influence, Gentle, or grave, or grand, The winds in our defence

Nor would we shun the battle-ground Though weak as we are strong, Call up the clashing elements around, And test the right and wrong!

Shall seem to blow, to us the hills shall lend

Their firinness and their calm, And in our stiffened sinews we shall blend

The strength of pine and palm!

The Cotton Boll

First printed in the Charleston Mercury, September 3. 1801, 'The Cotton Boll' is Timrod's most successful poem It is remarkable, among other things, for its fluency and precision, its eloquence and restraint, and its mastery of the expanded or epic simile and a varied, flexible meter

While I recline At ease beneath This immemorial pine, Small sphere! (By dusky fingers brought this morning here And shown with boastful smiles), I turn thy cloven sheath, Through which the soft white fibres peer, That, with their gossamer bands, Unite, like love, the sea-divided lands, And slowly, thread by thread, Draw forth the folded strands, Than which the trembling line, By whose frail help yon startled spider fled Down the tall spear-grass from his swinging bed,

Is scarce more fine,
And as the tangled skein
Unravels in my hands,
Betwixt me and the noonday light,
A veil seems lifted, and for miles and miles
The landscape broadens on my sight,
As, in the little boll, there lurked a spell
Like that which, in the occan shell,
With mystic sound,
Breaks down the narrow walls that hem us round,
And turns some city lane
Into the restless main,
With all his capes and isles!

Yonder bad, Which floats, as if at rest In those blue tracts above the thunder, where No vapors cloud the stainless air, And never sound is heard. Unless at such rare time When, from the City of the Blest, Rings down some golden chime. Sees not from his high place So vast a circuic of summer space As widens found me in one mighty field. Which, rimmed by seas and sands, Doth hail its eathest daylight in the beams Of gray Atlantic dawns, And, broad as realms made up of many lands Is lost afar Behind the crimson hills and purple lawns Of sunset, among plains which roll their streams Against the Evening Star! And lot To the remotest point of sight, Although I gaze upon no waste of snow, The endless field is white And the whole landscape glows, For many a shining league away, With such accumulated light As Polar lands would flash beneath a tropic day! Nor lack there (for the vision grows, And the small charm within my hands-More potent even than the fabled one. Which oped whatever golden mystery Lay hid in fairy wood or magic vale,

The curious ointment of the Arabian tale-Beyond all mortal sense Doth stretch my sight's horizon, and I see, Beneath its simple influence. As if with Uriel's crown. I stood in some great temple of the Sun, And looked, as Uriel, down!) Nor lack there pastures rich and fields all green With all the common gifts of God, For temperate airs and torrid sheen Weave Edens of the sod. Through lands which look one sea of billowy gold Broad rivers wind their devious ways, A hundred isles in their embraces fold A hundred luminous bays, And through yon purple haze Vast mountains lift their plumed peaks cloud-crowned And, save where up their sides the ploughman creeps, An unhewn forest girds them grandly round, In whose dark shades a future navy sleeps! Ye Stars, which, though unseen, yet with me gaze Upon this loveliest fragment of the earth! Thou Sun, that kindlest all thy gentlest rays Above it, as to light a favorite hearth! Ye Clouds, that in your temples in the West See nothing brighter than its humblest flowers! And you, ye Winds, that on the ocean's breast Are kissed to coolness ere ve reach its bowers' Bear witness with me in my song of graise, And tell the world that, since the world began No fairer land hath fired a poet's lays, Or given a home to man!

But these are charms already widely blown! His be the meed whose pencil's trace. Hath touched our very swamps with grace. And round whose tuneful way. All Southern laurels bloom.

Of many gathering armies Still, In that we sometimes hear, Upon the Northern winds, the voice of woe Not wholly drowned in triumph, though I know The end must crown us, and a few brief years Dry all our tears, 160 I may not sing too gladly. To Thy will Resigned O Lord! we cannot all forget That there is much even Victory must regret And therefore, not too long From the great burthen of our country's wrong Delay our just release! Charleston

Charleston" was first printed in the Charleston Mercury. December 13, 1862

Calm as that second summer which precedes The first fall of the snow, In the broad sunlight of heroic deeds The City bides the foe

As yet, behind their ramparts stern and proud, Her bolted thunders sleep-Dark Sumter, like a battlemented cloud, Looms o'er the solemn deep

No Calpe frowns from lofty cliff or scar To guard the holy strand, But Moultrie holds in leash her dogs of war Above the level sand.

And down the dunes a thousand guns lie couched Unseen beside the floodlike tigers in some Orient jungle crouched That wait and watch for blood

Meanwhile, through streets still echoing with trade, Walk grave and thoughtful men Whose hands may one day wield the patriot's blade As lightly as the pen

And maidens with such eyes as would grow dim Over a bleeding hound

Seem each one to have caught the strength of him Whose sword she sadly bound

Thus girt without and garrisoned at home, Day patient following day, Old Charleston looks from roof and spite and dome Across her tranquil bay

Ships, through a hundred foes, from Saxon lands And spicy Indian ports Bring Saxon steel and iron to her hands

And Summer to her courts But still, along you dim Atlantic line,

The only hostile smoke Creeps like a harmless mist above the brine From some frail, floating oak

Shall the Spring dawn, and she, still clad in smiles And with an unscathed brow. Rest in the strong arms of her palm-crowned isles As fair and free as now,

We know not, in the temple of the Fates God has inscribed her doom. And, all untroubled in her faith, she waits The triumph or the tomb

Spring

"Spring" was first printed in the Charleston Southern Illustrated News, April 4, 1863

Spring, with that nameless pathos in the air Which dwells with all things fair, Spring, with her golden suns and silver rain, Is with us once again

Out in the lonely woods the jasmine burns Its fragrant lamps, and turns Into a royal court with green festoons The banks of dark lagoons

In the deep heart of every forest tree.
The blood is all aglee,
And there's a look about the leafless bowers.
As if they dreamed of flowers.

Yet still on every side we trace the hand Of Winter in the land, Sive where the maple reddens on the lawn, Hushed by the season's dawn,

Or where, like those strange semblances we find That age to childhood bind. The elm puts on, as if in Nature's scorn, The brown of Autumn corn

As yet the turf is dark, although you know That, not a span below, A thousand germs are groping through the gloom, And soon will burst their tomb

Already, here and there, on frailest stems Appear some azure gems, Small as might deck, upon a gala day, The forehead of a fay

In gardens you may note amid the dearth The crocus breaking earth,

And near the snowdrop's tender white and green. The violet in its screen

But many gleams and shadows need must pass Along the budding grass, And weeks go by, before the enamored South Shall kiss the rose's mouth

Still there's a sense of blossoms yet unborn. In the sweet airs of morn,
One almost looks to see the very street.
Grow purple at his feet.

At times a fragrant breeze comes floating by, And brings you know not why, A feeling as when eager crowds await Before a palace gate

Some wondrous pageant, and you scarce would start, If from a beech's heart. A blue-eved Dryad, stepping forth, should say, "Behold me' I am May!"

Ah! who would couple thoughts of war and crime With such a blessed time!
Who in the west winds aromatic breath
Could hear the call of Death!

Yet not more surely shall the Spring awake. The voice of wood and brake. Then she shall rouse, for all her tranquil charms, A million men to aims.

There shall be deeper hues upon her plains Than all her sunlit rains, And every gladdening influence around, Can summon from the ground

Oh' standing on this desecrated mould, Methinks that I behold.
Lifting her bloody daisies up to God.
Spring kneeling on the sod,

And calling with the voice of all her rills, Upon the ancient hills To fall and crush the tyrants and the slaves Who turn her meads to graves

Ode

Mr Parks says of the poem "Timrod's 'Ode' has the supreme artistic merit of throbbing with vibrant emotion in its effect upon the reader, yet of possessing a classic coolness of phrase which might have been carved from stone. The poet indulges in no histrionic exhibitionism, but this controlled and inevitable verse leaves nothing to be said." The poem has been often compared with William Collins' 'How Sleep the Brave."

The "Ode" was first printed in the Charleston Courier as Ode Sung on the Occasion of Decorating the Graves of the Confederate Dead, at Magnolia Cemetery, Charleston, S.C."

Sleep sweetly in your humble graves, Sleep, martyrs of a fallen cause, Though yet no marble column craves The pilgrim here to pause In seeds of laurel in the earth,

The blossom of your fame is blown,
And somewhere, waiting for its birth,

The shaft is in the stone!

Meanwhile, behalf the tardy years
Which keep in trust your storied tombs,
Behold' your sisters bring their tears,
And these memorial blooms

Small tributes! but your shades will smile More proudly on these wreaths today. Than when some cannon-moulded pile Shall overlook this Bay Stoop, angels, hither from the skies!

There is no holier spot of ground
Than where defeated valor lies.
By mourning beauty crowned!

Civil War Singers

Compared with Revolutionary War songs, those chanted by soldiers and civilians during the Civil War had somewhat less courtliness, less of the British manner bout them The colloquial language, however which had begun to influence much popular literature, was an element in remarkably few words and phrases were still likely to be oratorical. The meters of many were determined by the older tunes for which they were written—"The Star-Spangled Banner," "The Campbells Are Coming," "Hearts of Oak, and so on Although there were exceptions—'The Battle Hymn of the Republic" and 'Maryland," for instance—those best remembered were distinguished less for their sentiment and phrasing than for their rhythms and their tunes Quite a large number continued to be popular down into modern times

Dixie

Daniel Decatur Emmett 1815 • 1904

On Broadway, in 1859, "Dixie," the most stirring tune associated with the war, had its first public performance The author and composer of the first of many versions was Daniel Decatur Emmett, who was born, the son of an Irish blacksmith of Southern origin, in Mt Vernon, Ohio, in 1815. Emmett had the most elementary sort of education before at seventeen he entered the United States army He served for three years as a fifer Discharged, he traveled with circus bands and in time became a composer and singer in minstrel troupes. It was for Bryant's Minstrels that he composed his famous song, a 'walkaround,' rendered by the whole company. The composition was introduced to the South by a chorus in John Brougham's New Orleans production of Pocahonias shortly before the war began. The Confederate regiments of Louisiana marched to a military version of the sona, and soon its use in Southern armies was widespread. The nonsense words as well as the lively tune evidently had great appeal

I wish I was in de land ob cotton,

Old times dar am not forgotten

Look away! Look away! Look away! Dixic Land! In Dixie Land whar I was born in, Early on one frosty mornin',

Look away! Look away! Dixie Land!

Chorus

Den I wish I was in Dixie! Hooray! Hooray! In Dixie's Land we'll take our stand to lib an' die in Dixie

Away! away! away down South in Dixie

Away! away! away down South in Dixie

But when he put his arm around her,
He smiled as fierce as a forty-pounder
Look away, look away, look away, Dixie Land

His face was sharp as a butcher's cleaber, But dat did not seem to greab her,

Look away, look away, look away, Dixie Land!
Ole missus acted de foolish part,
And died for a man dat broke her heart.

Look away, look away, look away Dixie Land

Now here's a health to de next ole missus, An' all the gals dat want to kiss us,

Look away, look away, look away, Dixie Land' But if you want to drive 'way sorrow', Come hear dis song tomorrow,

Albert Pike 1809 • 1891

The best-known "literary" version of "Dixie" was writter by Albert Pike, born and educated in Massachusetts but transplanted to the South as a young man Pike was enewspaper editor and a lawyer who had a commission in the Confederate army. His words for the song wer popular during the war, but in time they dropped from general memory in favor of Emmett's humbler version written to the same tune.

Southrons, hear your country call you!

Up! lest worse than death befall you!

To arms! to arms! to arms! in Dixie!

to all beacon fires are lighted, Let our hearts be now united! To arms! to arms! to arms! in Dixie!

Chorus

Advance the flag of Dixie!

Hurrah! Hurrah!

For Dixie's land we'll take our stand.

To live or die for Dixie!

To arms! To arms!

And conquer peace for Dixie!

To arms! To arms!

And conquer peace for Dixie!

Hear the Northern thunders mutter!
Northern flags in South winds flutter!
To arms! to arms! to arms! in Dixie!
Send them back your fierce defiance!
Stamp upon the cursed alliance!
To arms! to arms! to arms! in Dixie!

Fear no danger! shun no labor!

Infr up rifle, pike and sabre!

To arms! to arms! to arms! in Dixie!

Shoulder pressing close to shoulder,

Let the odds make each heart bolder!

To arms! to arms! to arms! in Dixie!

How the South's great heart rejoices, At your cannon's ringing voices. To arms! to arms! to arms! in Dixie! For faith betrayed and pledges broken, Wrongs inflicted, insults spoken! To arms! to arms! in Dixie!

Ntong as lions, swift as eagles,
Back to their kennels hunt these beagles'
To arms' to arms' to arms' in Dixie!
Our the unequal bonds asunder!
Let them hence each other plunder!
To arms! to arms! to arms! in Dixie!

Swear upon your country's altar, Never to give up or falter, To arms' to arms' to arms' in Dixie! Till the spoilers are defeated, Till the Lord's work is completed

To arms! to arms! in Dixie!

Halt not till our Federation,
Secures among earth's Powers its station!
To arms! to arms! to arms! in Dixie!
Then at peace and crowned with glory.
Hear your children tell the story!
To arms! to arms! to arms! in Dixie!

If the loved ones weep in sadness,
Victory soon shall bring them gladness
To arms' to arms' to arms' in Dixie!
Exultant pride soon banish sorrow,
Smiles chase tears away tomorrow
To arms' to arms' in Dixie!

My Maryland

James Ryder Randall 1839 • 1908

Upon hearing of the attack by the Massachusetts troops on his native city, Baltimore, James Ryder Randall wrote "My Maryland". At the time he composed the poem, Randall was a teacher in Louisiana, unacceptable for military duty because of poor health. He turned from teaching to journalism, and was in newspaper work until his death in 1908.

"My Maryland' appeared first in the New Orleans Delta, but shortly it was reprinted in newspapers throughout the South The tune for which the verses were designed was the German song "Tannenbaum, O Tannenbaum"

Maryland'
His torch is at thy temple door,
Maryland'
Avenge the patriotic gore
That flecked the streets of Baltimore,
And be the battle-queen of yore,
Maryland' My Maryland'

The despots heel is on thy shore,

Hark, to an exiled son's appeal,
Maryland'
My Mother-State, to thee I kneel,
Maryland'
For life and death, for woe and weal,
Thy peerless chivalry reveal,
And gird thy beautious limbs with steel'
Maryland' My Maryland'

Thou wilt not cower in the dust,
Maryland!
Thy beaming sword shall never rust,
Maryland!
Remember Carroll's sacred trust,
Remember Howard's warlike thrust,
And all thy slumberers with the just,
Maryland! My Maryland!

Come' 'its the red dawn of the day, Maryland' Come' with thy panoplied array, Maryland' With Ringgold's spirit for the fray With Watson's blood at Monterey, With fearless Lowe and dashing May, Maryland' My Maryland'

Dear Mother! burst the tyrant's chain, Maryland!
Virginia should not call in vain, Maryland!
She meets her sisters on the pluin—"Stevemper." tis the proud refrain That bailles minions back amain, Maryland!
Arise, in mijesty again, Maryland! My Maryland!

Come' for thy shield is bright and strong,
Maryland'
Come' for thy dalliance does thee wrong,
Maryland'
Come' to thine own heroic throng,
That stalks with Liberty along,
And ring thy dauntless Slogan-song,
Maryland' My Maryland'

I see the blush upon thy cheek,
Maryland!
For thou wast ever bravely meek,
Maryland'
But lo' there surges forth a shriek
From hill to hill, from creek to creek—
Potomac calls to Chesapeake,
Maryland' My Maryland'

Maryland'
Thou wilt not crook to his control,
Maryland'
Better the fire upon thee roll,
Better the shot, the blade, the bowl,
Than crucifixion of the soul,

Thou wilt not yield the Vandal toll.

I hear the distant thunder-hum,
Maryland'
The Old Line's bugle, fife, and drum,
Maryland'
She is not dead nor deaf nor dumb—
Huzza' she spurns the Northern scum'
She breathes—she burns' she'll come' she'il come'

The opening lines of the song were:

John Brown's body lies a-mold'ring in the grave, John Brown's body lies a-mold'ring in the grave, John Brown's body lies a-mold'ring in the grave, His soul is marching on!

Chorus

Glory! Glory Hallelujah! Glory! Glory Hallelujah! Glory! Glory Hallelujah! His soul is marching on

Mrs Howe, a Bostonian and descendant of a distincuished colonial family, had won distinction before the war as a supporter of women's suffrage and other reforms, including abolition. She wrote her poem one night after the had been stirred by a visit to an army camp near Washington, D. C. Unlike Pike's "improvement" on the words of "Dixie," her words replaced the initial ones in popular memory. "The Battle Hymn of the Republic" first was published in the Atlantic Monthly, February 1862.

Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord He is trampling out the vintage where the grapes of wrath are stored.

He hath loosed the fateful lightning of his terrible swift sword

His truth is marching on

Chorus

Glory' glory' Hallclujah' Glory' glory' Hallclujah' Glory' glory' Hallclujah' His truth is marching on'

I have seen him in the watch-fires of a hundred circling camps,

They have builded him an altar in the evening dews and damps 10

I can read his righteous sentence by the dim and flaring lamps

His day is marching on.

I have read a fiery gospel, writ in burmshed rows of steel

"As ye deal with my contemners, so with you my grace shall deal,

Let the Hero, born of woman, crush the serpent with his heel.

Since God is marching on"

He has sounded forth the trumpet that shall never call retreat,

He is sifting out the hearts of men before his judgmentseat.

Oh, be swift, my soul, to answer him! be jubilant, my feet!

Our God is marching on

Three Hundred Thousand More

James Sloan Gibbons 1810 · 1892

On July 16, 1862, shortly after Lincoln had issued a call for three hundred thousand additional volunteers, this poem was published anonymously in the New York Evening Post. William Cullen Bryant was credited with its authorship, but eventually it was attributed to Gibbons, a Quaker editor and abolitionist. Stephen Collins Foster wrote a musical setting, the most successful of his war songs

We are coming, Father Abraham, three hundred thousand more.

From Mississippi's winding stream and from New England's shore,

We leave our plows and workshops, our wives and children dear,

With hearts too full for utterance, with but a silent tear, We dare not look behind us, but steadfastly before

We are coming, Father Abraham, three hundred thousand more!

If you look across the hill-tops that meet the northern

Long moving lines of rising dust your vision may descry,

And now the wind, an instant, tears the cloudy veil aside,

And floats aloft our spangled flag in glory and in pride,

And bayonets in the sunlight gleam, and bands brave music pour

We are coming Father Abraham, three hundred thou sand more!

If you look all up our valleys where the growing harves shine

You may see our sturdy farmer boys fast forming in-

And children from their mother's knees are pulling . the weeds,

And learning how to reap and sow against the country's needs;

And a farewell group stands weeping at every cottag door

We are coming. Father Abraham, three hundred thou sand morel You have called us, and we're coming, by Richmond's bloody tide

To lay us down, for Freedom's sake, our brothers' bones beside, from foul treason's savage grasp to wrench the murderous blade,

And in the face of foreign foes its fragments to parade Six hundred thousand loyal men and true have gone before

We are coming, Father Abraham, three hundred thousand more!

Abraham Lincoln

autobiography which Lincoln wrote in 1859 tells main details of his early life in his characteristic le It reads, in part

I was born February 12, 1809, in Hardin County, ntucky My parents were both born in Virginia, of My mother, who died in distinguished families tenth year, was of a family of the name of Hanks My father, at the death of his father, was but six us of age, and he grew up literally without educan He removed from Kentucky to what is now encer County, Indiana in my eighth year It was a ld region, with many bears and other wild animals ll in the woods There I grew up There were some 100ls, so called, but no qualification was ever required a teacher beyond 'readin', writin', and cipherin',' to There was absolutely nothing to : rule of three cite ambition for education Of course, when I came age, I did not know much Still somehow, I could id, write, and cipher to the rule of three, but that was

I have not been to school since The little advance low have upon this store of education, I have picked from time to time under the pressure of necessity

"I was raised to farm work which I continued till I was twenty-two At twenty-one I came to Illinois, Macon County Then I got to New Salem I remained a year as a sort of clerk in a store. Then came The Black Hawk War, and I was elected a captain of volunteers, a success which gave me more pleasure than any I have had since. I went the campaign, was elected, ran for the legislature the same year (1832), and was beaten-the only time I ever have been beaten by the people. The next and three succeeding biennial elections I was elected to the legislature. I was not a candidate afterward. During this legislative period I had studied law, and removed to Springfield to practice it. In 1846 I was once elected to the lower House of Congress Was not a candidate for reelection From 1849 to 1854, both inclusive, practised law more assiduously than ever before I was losing interest in politics when the repeal of the Missouri Compromise aroused me again What I have done since then is pretty well known

"If any personal description of me is thought desirable, it may be said I am, in height, six feet four inches, nearly; lean in flesh, weighing on an average one hundred and eighty pounds; dark complexion, with coarse black hair and gray eyes. No other marks or brands recollected."

Lincoln's account breaks off at the time of the repeal of the Missouri Compromise (1854), a political move which caused him to return to public life when the Republican party was founded. In 1858 the Lincoln-Douglas debates, on the subject of popular sovereignty, attracted nation-wide attention and led to Lincoln's becoming a dark-horse candidate for the Presidential nomination. He was nominated in 1860, subsequently elected, and began to serve in 1861, as the Civil War was starting. His wartime leadership was rewarded by his reelection in 1864. He was shot to death by John Wilkes Booth, in a Washington theater, about a month after his second inaugural.

One reason for his countrymen's idolizing Lincoln as they have is suggested in his claim, in his autobiography, that he had little book learning. Americans loved to think of him as a typical practical citizen. Joe Gillespie, an old friend, praised him in these words. He had passed through all the grades of society when he reached the Presidency, and he had found common sense a sure reliance and he put it into practice. He acted all through his career upon just such principles as every man of good sense would approve. Lincoln was a great common man." His ways of thinking were indeed, much like those of ordinary Americans wh distrust abstractions and rely upon experience ansound logic to help solve problems

Yet Lincoln and many of his friends and worshiper probably underestimated the extent of his education From boyhood, he was passionately fond of reading He read the Bible, Pilgrim's Progress, and such fin writers as Milton, Gibbon, Voltaire, Paine, Hawthorn and others with great appreciation. He knew much c Shakespeare and could recite long passages from th great plays Finally, he had the urge to write well A a young man, he wrote quite a number of poems C one poem which he read in 1846, he said, "I would give all I am worth and go in debt to be able to writ ." He took great pains with his wri so fine a piece ing Mentor Graham, his teacher, said, "I have know to study for hours the best way of three to e: press an idea" Such care is evident in his most famou utterances-most of them masterpieces of America oratory

Farewell Address at Springfield, Illinois

Lincoln had been elected President in November 1860 The following month, South Carolina had seceded By February 8, 1861, five additional states had seceded, and the Confederate government had been formed Because it had been rumored that Lincoln would never be allowed to reach Washington alive, precautions had been taken t ensure his safety on the journey

Such was the situation when, on February 11, the Presidential party went to the railroad station in Springfield depart for Washington. There were dense clouds overheally and a chilly drizzle of rain fell through the gray min From the platform of a car on the train, Lincoln spoke the thousand townspeople who stood in the rain.

My Friends No one, not in my situation, can a preciate my feeling of sadness at this parting. To the place, and the kindness of these people, I owe ever thing. Here I have lived a quarter of a century, at have passed from a young to an old man. Here is children have been born, and one is buried. I no leave, not knowing when or whether ever I may return, with a task before me greater than that which rested upon Washington Without the assistance of that Divine Being who ever attended him, I cannot succeed With that assistance, I cannot fail. Trusting in Him who can go with me, and remain with you, and be everywhere for good, let us confidently hope that all will yet be well. To His care commending you, as I hope in your prayers you will commend me, I bid you an affectionate farewell

First Inaugural Address

The 4th of March has come and gone," wrote a Washmeton clerk, "and we have a live, Republican President. And, what is perhaps more singular, during the whole day we saw no one who appeared to manifest the least aislike to his living." The account reflects the general fear in Washington on the day of the inauguration in 1861. During the parade and during the address, riflement on rooftops along the Avenue and in windows of the Capitol Building watched the crowd for signs of violence. In addition to the fear for Lincoln's life, there was the trose feeling of a notion on the verge of war.

The speech, like most inaugurals, was addressed not only to the audience at Washington but also to a wider one. For the North, which half feared that he might be a waver-stilke his predecessor, Lincoln clearly stated his belief that the Union could not be dissolved and firmly defined the duty of the government in the face of a threat of passolution. For the South, he made his account of the controversy dispassionate and offered in the closing lines the appeal for a continuance of peace. The address was revised in accordance with suggestions made by his advisers Browning and Seward, who chiefly urged more temperance of tone. The most notable indication of Lincoln's artistry is his rephrasing of the final paragraph from the form originally written out by Secretary of State Seward. (See footnote, p. 144.)

Fellow Citizens of the United States. In compliance with a custom as old as the government itself, I appear before you to address you briefly, and to take in your presence the oath prescribed by the Constitution of the United States to be taken by the President "before he enters on the execution of his office"

I do not consider it necessary at present for me to discuss those matters of administration about which there is no special anxiety or excitement

Apprehension seems to exist among the people of the 10 Southern states that by the accession of a Republican administration their property and their peace and personal security are to be endangered. There has never been any reasonable cause for such apprehension Indeed, the most ample evidence to the contrary has all the while existed and been open to their inspection. It is found in nearly all the published speeches of him who now addresses you I do but quote from one of those speeches when I declare that "I have no purpose, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of 20 slavery in the states where it exists. I believe I have no lawful right to do so, and I have no inclination to do so" Those who nominated and elected me did so with full knowledge that I had made this and many similar declarations, and had never recanted them. And, more than this, they placed in the platform for my acceptance, and as a law to themselves and to me, the clear and emphatic resolution which I now read

"Resolved, That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the states, and especially the right of each state to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depend, and we denounce the lawless invasion by armed force of the soil of any state or territory, no matter under what pretext, as among the gravest of crimes."

I now reiterate these sentiments, and, in doing so I only press upon the public attention the most conclusive evidence of which the case is susceptible, that the property, peace, and security of no section are to be in any wise endangered by the now incoming administration. I add, too, that all the protection which, consistently with the Constitution and the laws, can be given, will be cheerfully given to all the states when lawfully demanded, for whatever cause—as cheerfully to one section as to another.

There is much controversy about the delivering up of fugitives from service or labor. The clause I now read is as plainly written in the Constitution as any other 20 of its provisions.

"No person held to service or labor in one state, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall in consequence of any law or regulation therein be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

It is scarcely questioned that this provision was intended by those who made it for the reclaiming of what we call fugitive slaves, and the intention of the law all members of Congress swear their support to the whole Constitution—to this provision as much as to any other. To the proposition, then, that slaves whose cases come within the terms of this clause "shall be delivered up," their oaths are unanimous. Now, if they would make the effort in good temper, could they not with nearly equal unanimity frame and pass a law by means of which to keep good that unanimous oath?

There is some difference of opinion whether this clause should be enforced by national or by state authority, but surely that difference is not a very material one. If the slave is to be surrendered it can be of but little consequence to him or to others by which authority it is done. And should anyone in any case be content that his oath shall go unkept on a merely unsubstantial controversy as to how it shall be kept?

Again, in any law upon this subject ought not all the safeguards of liberty known in civilized and humand jurisprudence to be introduced, so that a free man be not, in any case, surrendered as a slave? And might 1 not be well at the same time to provide by law for the enforcement of that clause in the Constitution which guarantees that "the citizen of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states"?

I take the official oath today with no mental reservations and with no purpose to construe the Constitution or laws by any hypercritical rules. And while I do not choose now to specify particular acts of Congress aproper to be enforced, I do suggest that it will be much safer for all, both in official and private stations to conform to and abide by all those acts which stand unrepealed, than to violate any of them, trusing to find impunity in having them held to be unconstitutional.

It is seventy-two years since the first inauguration of president under our national Constitution. During the period fifteen different and greatly distinguished citizens have, in succession, administered the execution branch of the government. They have conducted through many perils, and generally with great succeiver, with all this scope of precedent, I now enter upon the same task for the brief constitutional term of for years under great and peculiar difficulty. A disruption of the federal Union, heretofore only menaced, is not formidably attempted.

I hold that, in contemplation of universal law a of the Constitution, the union of these states is perpetu. Perpetuity is implied, if not expressed, in the function mental law of all national governments. It is safe assert that no government proper ever had a provisi in its organic law for its own termination. Continue execute all the express provisions of our national. Constitution, and the Union will endure forever—it bei impossible to destroy it except by some action not provided for in the instrument itself

Again, if the United States be not a government proper, but an association of states in the nature of confract merely can it, as a contract, be peaceably unmade by less than all the parties who made it? One party to a contract may violate it—break it, so to speak, but does it not require all to lawfully rescind it?

Descending from these general principles, we find the proposition that, in legal contemplation the Union is perpetual confirmed by the history of the Union itself. The Union is much older than the Constitution It was formed, in fact, by the Articles of Association in 1774. It was matured and continued by the Declaration of Independence in 1776. It was further matured, and the faith of all the their thirteen states expressly plighted und engaged that it should be perpetual, by the Articles of Confederation in 1778. And, finally, in 1787 one of the declared objects for ordaining and establishing the Constitution was "to form a more perfect Union"

But if the destruction of the Union by one or by a part only of the states be lawfully possible, the Union is less perfect than before the Constitution, having lost the vital element of perpetuity

It follows from these views that no state upon its own mere motion can lawfully get out of the Union that resolves and ordinances to that effect are legally void, and that acts of violence, within any state or states, against the authority of the United States, are insurrectionary or revolutionary, according to circumstances

I therefore consider that, in view of the Constitution and the laws, the Union is unbroken and to the extent of my ability I shall take care, as the Constitution itself expressly enjoins upon me, that the laws of the Union be faithfully executed in all the states. Doing this I deem to be only a simple duty on my part, and I shall perform it so far as practicable, unless my rightful masters, the American people, shall withhold the requisite means, or in some authoritative manner direct the contrary. I trust this will not be regarded as a menace, but only as the declared purpose of the Union that it will constitutionally defend and maintain itself.

In doing this there needs to be no bloodshed or violence, and there shall be none, unless it be forced upon the national authority. The power confided to me will be used to hold, occupy, and possess the property and places belonging to the government, and to collect the duties and imposts, but beyond what may be necessary for these objects, there will be no invasion, no using of force against or among the people anywhere. Where so hostility to the United States, in any interior locality, shall be so great and universal as to prevent competent resident citizens from holding the federal offices, there will be no attempt to force obnoxious strangers among the people for that object. While the strict legal right may exist in the government to enforce the exercise of these offices, the attempt to do so would be so irritating, and so nearly impracticable withal, that I deem it better to forego for the time the uses of such offices.

The mails, unless repelled, will continue to be furnished in all parts of the Union. So far as possible, the people everywhere shall have that sense of perfect security which is most favorable to calm thought and reflection. The course here indicated will be followed unless current events and experience shall show a modification or change to be proper, and in every case and exigency my best discretion will be exercised according to circumstances actually existing, and with a view and a hope of a peaceful solution of the national troubles and the restoration of fraternal sympathies and affections.

That there are persons in one section or another who seek to destroy the Union at all events, and are glad of any pretext to do it, I will neither affirm nor deny, but if there be such, I need address no word to them. To those, however, who really love the Union may I not speak?

Before entering upon so grave a matter as the destruction of our national fabric, with all its benefits, its memories, and its hopes, would it not be wise to ascertain precisely why we do it? Will you hazard so desperate a step while there is any possibility that any portion of the ills you fly from have no real existence? Will you, while the certain ills you fly to are greater than all the real ones you fly trom—will you risk the commission of so fearful a mistake.

All profess to be content in the Union if all constitutional rights can be maintained Is it true, then, that any right, plainly written in the Constitution, has been denied. I think not Happily the human mind is so constituted that no party can reach to the audacity of doing this Think, if you can, of a single instance in which a 10 plainly written provision of the Constitution has ever been denied. If by the mere force of numbers a majority should deprive a minority of any clearly written constitutional right, it might, in a moral point of view, justify revolution—certainly would if such a right were a vital one But such is not our case. All the vital rights of minorities and of individuals are so plainly assured to them by affirmations and negations guarantees and prohibitions, in the Constitution, that controversies never arise concerning them. But no organic law can ever be 20 framed with a provision specifically applicable to every question which may occur in practical administration No foresight can anticipate, nor any document of reasonable length contain, express provisions for all possible questions. Shall fugitives from labor be surrendered by national or by state authority? The Constitution does not expressly say. May Congress prohibit slavery in the territories? The Constitution does not expressly say. Most Congress protect slavery in the territories? The Constitution does not expressly say

From questions of this class spring all our constitutional controversics, and we divide upon them into majorities and minorities. If the minority will not acquiesce the majority must, or the government must cease. There is no other alternative for continuing the government is acquiescence on one side or the other.

If a minority in such case will secede rather than acquiesce, they make a precedent which in turn will divide and ruin them, for a minority of their own will secede from them whenever a majority refuses to be controlled by such minority. For instance, why may not any portion of a new confederacy a year or two hence arbitrarily secede again, precisely as portions of the present Union now claim to secede from it? All who cherish disunion sentiments are now being educated to the exact temper of doing this.

Is there such perfect identity of interests among the states to compose a new Union, as to produce harmor only, and prevent renewed secession?

Plainly, the central idea of secession is the essence anarchy. A majority held in restraint by constitution checks and limitations, and always changing easily will deliberate changes of popular opinions and sentiment is the only true sovereign of a free people. Whoeverejects it does, of necessity, fly to anarchy or to despotisi Unanimity is impossible, the rule of a minority, as permanent arrangement, is wholly inadmissible, so the rejecting the majority principle, anarchy or despotism some form is all that is left.

I do not forget the position, assumed by some, th constitutional questions are to be decided by the S preme Court, nor do I deny that such decisions must l binding, in any case, upon the parties to a suit, as the object of that suit, while they are also entitled to ve high respect and consideration in all parallel cases by other departments of the government. And while it obviously possible that such decisions may be erroneous in any given case, still the evil effect following it, beir limited to that particular case, with the chance that may be overruled and never become a precedent for oth cases, can better be borne than could the evils of a diffe ent practice. At the same time, the candid citizen mu confess that if the policy of the government, upon vit questions affecting the whole people, is to be irrevocab fixed by decisions of the Supreme Court, the instant the tre made, in ordinary litigation between parties in pe sonal actions, the people will have ceased to be their ow rulers, having to that extent practically resigned the government into the hands of that eminent tribunal. No is there in this view any assault upon the court or th judges. It is a duty from which they may not shrink i decide cases properly brought before them, and it is r fault of theirs if others seek to turn their decisions i political purposes

One section of our country believes slavery is right and ought to be extended, while the other believes it wrong, and ought not be extended. This is the only sulstantial dispute. The fugitive-slave clause of the Constitution, and the law for the suppression of the foreig slave-trade, are each as well enforced, perhaps, as an law can ever be in a community where the moral sens of the people imperfectly supports the law itself. The great body of the people abide by the dry legal obligation.

in both cases, and a few break over in each. This, I think. cannot be perfectly cured; and it would be worse in both cases after the separation of the sections than before. The foreign slave-trade, now imperfectly suppressed, would be ultimately revived, without restriction, in one section, while fugitive slaves, now only partially surrendered, would not be surrendered at all by the other.

Physically speaking, we cannot separate We cannot remove our respective sections from each other, nor build o impassable wall between them A husband and wife may be divorced, and go out of the presence and beyond the reach of each other, but the different parts of our country cannot do this. They cannot but remain face to face and intercourse, either amicable or hostile, must continue between them. Is it possible, then, to make that intercourse more advantageous or more satisfactory ifter separation than before? Can aliens make treaties easier than friends can make laws? Can treaties be more faithfully enforced between aliens than laws can among triends? Suppose you go to war, you cannot fight always, and when, after much loss on both sides, and no gain on other, you cease fighting, the identical old questions as to erms of intercourse are again upon you

This country, with its institutions, belongs to the peoale who inhabit it. Whenever they shall grow weary of he existing government, they can exercise their constiutional right of amending it, or their revolutionary right to dismember or overthrow it I cannot be ignorant of the fact that many worthy and patriotic citizens are desirous of having the national Constitution amended While I make no recommendation of amendments, I fully recognize the rightful authority of the people over the whole subject, to be exercised in either of the modes prescribed in the instrument itself, and I should, under existing circumstances favor rather than oppose a fair opportunity being afforded the people to act upon it I will venture to add that to me the convention mode seems preferable, in that it allows amendments to originate with the people themselves, instead of only permitting them to take or reject propositions originated by others not especially chosen for the purpose, and which might not be precisely such as they would wish to either accept or refuse I understand a proposed amendment to the Constitution-which amendment however, I have not seenhas passed Congress, to the effect that the federal government shall never interfere with the domestic institutions of the states, including that of persons held to service. To avoid misconstruction of what I have said, I depart from my purpose not to speak of particular amendments so far as to say that, holding such a provision to now 50 be implied constitutional law, I have no objections to its being made express and irrevocable

The chief magistrate derives all his authority from the people, and they have conferred none upon him to fix terms for the separation of the states The people themselves can do this also if they choose, but the executive, as such, has nothing to do with it. His duty is to administer the present government, as it came to his hands, and to transmit it, unimpaired by him, to his successor

Why should there not be a patient confidence in the 60 ultimate justice of the people? Is there any better or equal hope in the world? In our present differences is either party without faith of being in the right? If the Almighty Ruler of Nations, with His eternal truth and justice, be on your side of the North, or on yours of the South, that truth and that justice will surely prevail by the judgment of this great tribunal of the American people

By the frame of the government under which we live, this same people have wisely given their public servants 70 but little power for mischief, and have, with equal wisdom, provided for the return of that little to their own hands at very short intervals. While the people retain their virtue and vigilance, no administration, by any extreme of wickedness or folly, can very scriously injure the government in the short space of four years

My countrymen, one and all, think calmly and well upon this whole subject. Nothing valuable can be lost by taking time. If there be an object to hurry any of you in hot haste to a step which you would never take & deliberately, that object will be frustrated by taking time, but no good object can be frustrated by it. Such of you as are now dissatisfied, still have the old Constitution unimpaired, and, on the sensitive point, the laws of your own framing under it, while the new administration will have no immediate power, if it would, to change either. If it were admitted that you who are dissatisfied hold the right side in the dispute, there still is no single good reason for precipitate action. Intelligence, patriotism, Christianity, and a firm reliance on Him who has never yet forsaken this favored land are still competent to adjust in the best way all our present difficulty.

In your hands, my dissatisfied fellow-countrymen, and not in mine, is the momentous issue of civil war. The government will not assail you. You can have no conflict without being yourselves the aggressors. You have no oath registered in heaven to destroy the government, while I shall have the most solemn one to "preserve, protect, and defend it."

I am loath to close We are not enemies, but friends We must not be enemies. Though passion may have strained, it must not break our bonds of affection. The mystic chords of memory, stretching from every battle field and patriot grave to every living heart and hearth stone all over this broad land, will yet swell the chorus of the Union when again touched, as surely they will be, by the better langels of our nature.

21 I am loath This, at Seward's suggestion, replaced a moraggressive conclusion. You can forbear the assault upon it [th Government], I cannot shrink from the defense of it. With you, an not with me, is the solemn question of shall it be peace, or sword?' Seward, wanting some words of affection, some of call and cheerful confidence, suggested. I close. We are not we munot be aliens or enemies but fellow countrymen and brethren. Althoug passion has strained our bonds of affection too hardly they must no I am sure they will not be broken. The mystic chards which proceeding from so many battle fields and so many patriot graves pass throug all the hearts and all the hearths in this broad continent of ours we yet again harmonize in their ancient music when breathed upon to the quardian angel of the nation.

Open Letter to Horace Greeley

Horace Greeley, famous and influential editor of the New York Tribune, in the issue of August 19, 1862, published an editorial—"The Prayer of 20,000,000 People". It urged complete emancipation of the slaves and indicated doubt concerning Lincoln's policies. Actually, the "Emancipation Proclamation" had already been written, and Lincoln was only waiting for a Union victory which would make politic its publication. The letter which Lincoln wrote in answer to Greeley's attack contains a clear and eloquent statement of the President's policy.

Hon Horace Greeley

Dear Sir. I have just read yours of the 19th, addresse to myself through the New York Tribune. If there be it any statements or assumptions of fact which I maknow to be erroneous, I do not, now and here, controve them. If there be in it any inferences which I may blieve to be talsely drawn, I do not, now and here, arguagainst them. If there be perceptible in it an impatier and dictatorial tone, I waive it in deference to an of triend whose heart I have always supposed to be right.

As to the policy I "seem to be pursuing," as you say, have not meant to leave any one in doubt

I would save the Union I would save it the shorte way under the Constitution. The sooner the nation authority can be restored, the nearer the Union will I "the Union as it was." If there be those who would nearer the Union unless they could at the same time say slavery. I do not agree with them. If there be those who would not save the Union unless they could at the same time.

time destroy slavery. I do not agree with them. My paramount object in this straggle is to save the Union, and is not either to save or to destroy slavery. If I could save the Union without freeing any slave, I would do it, and if I could save it by freeing all the slaves, I would do it, and if I could save it by freeing some and leaving others ilone, I would also do that. What I do about slavery and the coloured race, I do because I believe it helps to save the Union and what I forbear, I forbear because I do not believe it would help to save the Union. I shall do less whenever I shall believe what I am doing hurts the cause, and I shall do more whenever I shall believe doing more will help the cause 1 shall try to correct errors when shown to be errors, and I shall adopt new views so fast as they shall appear to be true views.

I have here stated my purpose according to my view of official duty, and I intend no modification of my oftexpressed personal wish that all men everywhere could be free in September 1863, the dedication of the Gettysburg National Cemetery was planned for the following October 23, but when Edward Everett, a renowned orator of the pay, wrote that he could not prepare his oration in so whort a time, the date was moved along to November 19. The request that Lincoln speak was an afterthought: the committee asked him, "as Chief Executive," to set apart the grounds "by a few appropriate remarks."

Busy with military and civil duties, the President found it to time for composing his brief speech and actually did same work on it the night before its delivery. Lincoln, Tany of his friends, and most newsmen at the ceremonies Tayeth it was not much of an address, but Everett wrote on November 20. "I should be glad if I could flatter myself that I came as near to the central idea of the occasion in two hours as you did in two minutes." Later, Americans were to come to regard the address as one of the noblest afterances in American history.

The simplicity of the diction, the impressive rhythm, and he majesty of the thought of the address account for puch of its appeal. Important, too, is an ordering of the naterial more complex than at first evident. The treatment of the past, then the present, and, finally, the future is strengthened throughout by a subtle analogy of birth, death, and rebirth. In mentioning the continent, then the nation, then the battlefield, then a portion of the battlefield, Lincoln parallels in a sense the movement which begins with the great accomplishment of the founding fathers, then narrows down to the futile ceremonies at Gettysburg. He thus prepares for a triumphant conclusion which from another view enlarges the true significance of the occosion by noting the vast accomplishment of the heroic dead for the nation and for all the earth.

Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought torth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal

Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting-place for those who here this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. Yet, if God wills that it continue until all the wealth piled by the bondman's two hundred and fifty years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, as was said three thousand years ago, so still it must be said. "The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether."

With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right let us strive on to finish the work we are in, to bind up the nation's wounds, to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and his orphan—to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lastin, peace among ourselves, and with all nations

WHITMAN

1819 · 1892

Eighteen fifty-five was a year of epoch-making importance in the history of American literature for in that year appeared the first edition of Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass. Emerson read the book, and wrote enthusiastically to its author "I greet you at the beginning of a great career, which yet must have had a long foreground somewhere for such a start" Whitman was thirty-six when the Leaves first appeared; there had been a long foreground of preparation the best record of which is found in his autobiographical prose wor Specimen Days.

The son of a carpenter, Whitman was born on Lor Island (which he preferred to call by its Indian nam

Panel (1 to r) Brooklyn and the ferry in the 1850's • Walt Whitmi at 36 • Jamaica Village, Long Island, where Whitman taught scho

Paumanok), and spent his early life on Long Island and in Brooklyn and New York "All along the island and irs shores," he tells us in Specimen Days, "I spent intervals many years, all seasons, sometimes riding, sometimes boating, but generally afoot, absorbing fields, shores. marine incidents, characters, the bay-men, farmers. " He went frequently to Coney Island, "at that time, a long, bare, unfrequented shore, which I had all to myself, and where I loved, after bathing, to race up and down the hard sand, and declaim Homer or Shakespeare to the surf and sea-gulls by the hour" He attended the public schools of Brooklyn, read omnivorously, listened to Elias Hicks, a Quaker preacher (the Quaker influence is important in Whitman, his mother's family were Onakers) Other early experiences included participating in a debating society, working in printing offices, and teaching country schools on Long Island and "boarding round" "This latter," he said, 'I consider one of my best experiences and deepest lessons in human nature behind the scenes" He enjoyed the ferry boats and their pilots, the Broadway omnibuses and their drivers He had an enormous enthusiasm, moreover for the theater, he lists in Specimen Days the names of plays and actors, of operas and singers, familiar to him in those formative years. In the 1840's he was connected with various newspapers, including the Brooklyn Daily Eagle, which he edited in 1846-1847. His knowledge of American life was further enlarged in 1848 by a leisurely journey down the Ohio and Mississippi to New Oileans, a stay of two or three months in that city, and the return journey by way of Chicago and the Great Lakes (Some biographers have believed—the evidence is not convincing-that while in New Orleans, Whitman had a passionate and transforming love affair.) Upon his teturn to Brooklyn, he resumed journalistic work and assisted his father in the building of houses. All of these experiences, and many more, in Whitman's expressive phrase, "entered into the gestation of Leaves of Grass" What the decisive influence was which made of Whitman the poet of the Leaves-if, indeed, any such influence can ever be posited—no one knows, though it seems reasonable to believe that his reading of Emerson (the essay "The Poet," for example) must have had a quickening effect

Whitman was not a soldier in the Civil War, but he was none the less one of the war's real heroes. He served indefatigably as a volunteer nurse in the Washington hospitals, distributing knickknacks among the soldiers, writing letters home, radiating cheerfulness and the will to live He records typical cases in Specimen Days. "IG lies in bed 52, Ward I, is of Company B, 7th Pennsylvania I gave him a small sum of money, some tobacco and envelopes . Bed 3, Ward E, Armory, has a great hankering for pickles, something pungent. After consulting the doctor, I gave him a small bottle of horse-radish, also some apples, also a book . . . Marcus Small, Company K, 7th Maine, sick with dysentery and I write a letter for him home to East typhoid fever Livermore, Maine 'He was supplied with funds, he tells us, "by good women and men in Boston, Salem, Providence. Brooklyn, and New York ' He also visited the camp hospitals of the Army of the Potomac in Virginia Some of his best poems (Drum-Taps, 1865) came out of these war experiences. His hitherto magnificent health, however, suffered under the strain and exposure. In the summer of 1864 he was ill with "hospital malaria," from the effects of which he never fully recovered In 1873 he had a paralytic stroke, and he continued a partial invalid during the remaining nineteen years of his life

Some ten editions of Leaves of Grass were published during Whitman's lifetime. In each succeeding edition, new poems were added and the old poems were considerably revised. His poems were strenuously objected to because of their "formlessness," and still more because of their frank treatment of sex Emerson tried to persuade Whitman, before the publication of the third edition of the Leates in 1860, to omit the more offensive passages, but Whitman was too well grounded in the Emersonian doctrine of "self-reliance" to heed Emerson's advice In 1865 Whitman was dismissed by Secretary Harlan from a clerkship in the Department of the Interior on the charge that he was the author of an "indecent book," and W D O'Connor wrote his famous defense. The Good Gray Poet. The objections to Whitman's "formlessness" and "sensuality" have, no doubt, a measure of validity even today. It is to be noted, however, that his later work is less open to these objections A study of Whitman's poetic development reveals an increasing mastery of form Moreover, the later verses are less physical "I am the poet of the Body and I am the poet of the Soul," he proclaimed in the "Song of Myself' (1855), and he was always both But the emphasis in the earlier work is upon the flesh, "the jolly bodily phase," and in the later, upon the spirit In "When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd" (1865), this lover of the body wrote a lyrical hymn to Death, "the strong deliveress" In "Passage to India" (1871), the soul is mystically released from the prison house of the flesh

Whitman was the poet of America and American democracy. He attempted to embrace the whole of America—an impossible task for a poet. But Whitman succeeded as well in that direction, perhaps, as it is poetically possible to do. He celebrated the westward course of empire. He found his subjects among all sorts and conditions his catalogues symbolize the equalizing processo of democracy. He asserted "the majesty and reality of the American people en masse." He envisaged, in "Thou Mother with Thy Equal Brood" (1872), an artistic and moral growth

Thee in thy own musicians, singers, artists, unborn yet, but certain,

Thee in thy moral wealth and civilization (until which thy proudest material civilization must remain in vain)

I prophesy

Above all, he saw America as a nation of free individuals Newton Arvin's view that Whitman desired a "socialist" state is difficult to accept. Despite his fondness for the phrase en matie, his poetry everywhere exalts the individual. To Whitman as to Emerson, the individual was supreme

All forces have been steadily employed to complete and delight me,

Now on this spot I stand with my robust soul

Whitman's poetry was original and revolutionary and indisputably American. He broke with the conventions and traditions of English verse. Of the composition of his poems he said, "I had great trouble in leaving our the stock 'poetical' touches, but succeeded at last" He employed free rhythms, which are comparable with those of the Old Testament There have been, and are still sharp differences of opinion as to the absolute merit of his work as poetry. Intellectual critics object to his emotionalism and vagueness, formal critics, to his lack of close structure, academic critics, to his apotheosis of the uncultivated But there can be no question of his power and influence (His influence has been particularly noticeable in the work of poets like Lindsay and Sandburg) Even if one reads his poems with certain critical reservations, one responds, as did Thoreau, to Whitman's "alarum or trumpet-note ringing through the American camp" and feels the peculiar magnetic force of

Preface to 1855 Edition of "Leaves of Grass"

The following Preface epitomizes better than any other single selection Whitman's philosophy and his aims in literature. Parts of the Preface were later incorporated, with only minor changes, in the poem "By Blue Ontario's Shore"

America does not repel the past or what it has produced under its forms or amid other politics or the idea of castes or the old religions—accepts the lesson with calmines—is not so impatient as has been supposed that the slough still sticks to opinions and manners and literature while the life which served its requirements has passed into the new life of the new forms—per ceives that the corpse is slowly borne from the eating and sleeping rooms of the house—perceives that it

arts a little while in the door . that it was fittest for $s\ days$ that its action has descended to the stalwart ad wellshaped heir who approaches . and that he will be fittest for his days

The Americans of all nations at any time upon the orth have probably the fullest poetical nature. The mted States themselves are essentially the greatest em. In the history of the earth hitherto the largest and ost stirring appear tame and orderly to their ampler remess and stir. Here at list is something in the doings man that corresponds with the broadcast doings of e day and night. Here is not merely a nation but a eming nation of nations. Here is action untied from rings necessarily blind to particulars and details magncently moving in vast masses. Here is the hospitality hich forever indicates heroes Here are the roughs id beards and space and ruggedness and nonchalance is the soul loves. Here the performance disdaining the and unapproached in the tremendous audacity of its and groupings and the push of its perspective reads with crampless and flowing breadth and showers · prolific and splendid extravagance. One sees it must deed own the riches of the summer and winter, and ed never be bankrupt while corn grows from the ound or the orchards drop apples or the bays contain h or men beget children upon women

Other states indicate themselves in their deputies t the genius of the United States is not best or most its executives or legislatures, nor in its ambassadors authors or colleges or churches or parlors, nor even in newspapers or inventors but always most in the mmon people Their manners speech dress friendships the freshness and candor of their physiognomy—the turesque looseness of their carriage their deathattachment to freedom—their aversion to anything acorous or soft or mean—the practical acknowledgent of the citizens of one state by the citizens of all 101 states—the fierceness of their roused resentment ir curiosity and welcome of novelty—their self-esteem wonderful sympathy—their susceptibility to a slight the air they have of persons who never knew how it t to stand in the presence of superiors—the fluency of 15 speech-their delight in music, the sure symptom minly tenderness and native elegance of soul temper and open-handedness—the terrible signifiwe of their elections—the President's taking off his hat to them not they to him—these too are unrhymed poetry. It awaits the gigantic and generous treatment worthy of it.

The largeness of nature or the nation were monstrous 50 without a corresponding largeness and generosity of the spirit of the citizen. Not nature nor swarming states nor screets and steamships nor prosperous business nor farms nor capital nor learning may suffice for the ideal of man nor suffice the poet. No reminiscences may suffice either. A live nation can always cut a deep mark and can have the best authority the cheapest from its own soul. This is the sum of the profitable uses of individuals or states and of present action and grandeur and of the subjects of poets -As if it were necessary to 60 trot back generation after generation to the eastern records! As if the beauty and sacredness of the demonstrable must fall behind that of the mythical! As if men do not make their mark out of any times! As if the opening of the western continent by discovery and what has transpired since in North and South America were less than the small theatre of the antique or the aimless sleepwalking of the middle ages! The pride of the United States leaves the wealth and finesse of the cities and all returns of commerce and agriculture and all the magni- 70 tude of geography or shows of exterior victory to enjoy the breed of full sized men or one full sized man unconquerable and simple

The American poets are to enclose old and new for America is the race of races. Of them a bard is to be commensurate with a people. To him the other continents arrive as contributions he gives them reception for their sake and his own sake. His spirit responds to his country's spirit he incarnates its geography and natural life and rivers and lakes Mississippi with annual 80 freshets and changing chutes, Missouri and Columbia and Ohio and Saint Lawrence with the falls and beautiful masculine Hudson, do not embouchure where they spend themselves more than they embouchure into him. The blue breadth over the inland sea of Virginia and Maryland and the sea off Massachusetts and Maine and over Manhattan bay and over Champlain and Erie and over Ontario and Huron and Michigan and Superior, and over and over the seas off California and Oregon, is not tallied by the blue breadth of the waters below more than the breadth of above and below is tallied by him. When the long Atlantic coast stretches longer and the Pacific coast stretches longer he easily stretches with them north or south He spans between them also from east to west and reflects what is between them. On him rise solid growths that offset the growths of pine and cedar and 10 hemlock and liveoak and locust and chestnut and cypress and hickory and limetree and cottonwood and tuliptree and cactus and wildvine and tamarind and persimmon . and tangles as tangled as any canebreak or swamp and forests coated with transparent ice and icicles hanging from the boughs and crackling in the wind sides and peaks of mountains and pasturage sweet and free as savannah or upland or prairie with flights and songs and screams that answer those of the wildpigeon and highhold and orchard-oriole and coot and 20 surf-duck and redshouldered-hawk and fish-hawk and white-ibis and indianhen and cat-owl and water-pheasant and qua-bird and pied-sheldrake and blackbird and mockingbird and buzzard and condor and night-heron and eagle. To him the hereditary countenance descends both mother's and father's To him enter the essences of the real things and past and present events—of the enormous diversity of temperature and agriculture and mines-the tribes of red aborigines-the weather-beaten vessels entering new ports or making landings on rocky coasts-30 the first settlements north or south—the rapid stature and muscle-the haughty defiance of '76, and the war and peace and formation of the constitution union always surrounded by blatherers and always calm and impregnable—the perpetual coming of immigrants -the wharf-hem'd cities and superior marine-the unsurveyed interior—the loghouses and clearings and wild animals and hunters and trappers the free commerce -the fisheries and whaling and gold-digging-the endless gestation of new states—the convening of Congress 40 every December, the members duly coming up from all climates and the uttermost parts the noble character of the young mechanics and of all free American workmen and workwomen the general ardor and friendliness and enterprise—the perfect equality of the female with the male . the large amativeness-the fluid movement of the population-the factories and mercan-

⁸³ embouchure, used here as a verb meaning to pour or empty The word is properly a noun meaning mouth

the New-York firemen and the target excursion-th southern plantation life—the character of the northeas and of the northwest and southwest-slavery and th tremulous spreading of hands to protect it, and the steri opposition to it which shall never cease till it ceases o the speaking of tongues and the moving of lips cease For such the expression of the American poet is to b transcendant and new. It is to be indirect and not direct or descriptive or epic. Its quality goes through these t much more Let the age and wars of other nations b chanted and their eras and characters be illustrated and that finish the verse. Not so the great psalms of th republic. Here the theme is creative and has vista. Her comes one among the well-beloved stonecutters and plans with decision and science and sees the solid and beautiful forms of the future where there are now no solid forms

Of all nations the United States with veins full o poetical stuff most need poets and will doubtless have th greatest and use them the greatest. Their Presidents shal not be their common referee so much as their poets shall Of all mankind the great poet is the equable man No in him but off from him things are grotesque or eccen tric or fail of their sanity. Nothing out of its place i good and nothing in its place is bad. He bestows of every object or quality its fit proportions neither mor nor less. He is the arbiter of the diverse and he is th key He is the equalizer of his age and land plies what wants supplying and checks what wants check ing If peace is the routine out of him speaks the spiri of peace, large, rich, thrifty, building vast and populou cities, encouraging agriculture and the arts and commerce-lighting the study of man, the soul, immortal ity-federal, state or municipal government, marriage health, free trade, inter-travel by land and sea too close, nothing too far off the stars not too far off In war he is the most deadly force of the war. artillery the best that engineer ever knew. If the time becomes slothful and heavy he knows how to arouse it he can make every word he speaks draw blood. Whatever stagnates in the flat of custom or obedience or legislation he never stagnates. Obedience does not master him, he masters it High up out of reach he stands mirning a concentrated light . he turns the pivot with nis finger. he baffles the swiftest runners as he stands and easily overtakes and envelops them. The time straving toward infidelity and confections and persiflage he withholds by his steady faith he spreads out his he offers the sweet firmfibred meat that grows lishes men and women. His brain is the ultimate brain. He is he is judgment. He judges not as the judge judges but as the sun falling around a helpless thing As he sees the farthest he has the most faith His thoughts are the hymns of the praise of things. In the talk on the soul and eternity and God off of his equal plane he is silent. He sees eternity less like a play with rologue and denouement he sees eternity in men he does not see men and women as and women dreams or dots Faith is the antiseptic of the soul pervades the common people and preserves them they never give up believing and expecting and trusting There is that indescribable freshness and unconsciousness about an illiterate person that humbles and mocks the power of the noblest expressive genius. The poet sees for a certainty how one not a great artist may be just as sacred as the greatest artist The power to destroy or remould is freely used by him but never the power of attack. What is past is past. If he does not expose superior models and prove himself by every step he takes he is not what is wanted. The presence of the greatest poet conquers not parleying or struggling or any prepared attempts. Now he has passed that way see after him! there is not left any vestige of despair or misanthropy or cunning or exclusiveness or the ignominy of a nativity or color or delusion of hell or the necessity and no man thenceforward shall be degraded for ignorance or weakness or sin

The greatest poet hardly knows pettiness or triviality It he breathes into any thing that was before thought small it dilates with the grandeur and life of the universe. He is a seer he is individual he is complete in himself the others are as good as he, only he sees it and they do not. He is not one of the chorus. he does not stop for any regulations. he is the president of regulation. What the eyesight does to the rest he does to the rest. Who knows the curious mystery of the eyesight? The other senses corroborate themselves, but this so is removed from any proof but its own and foreruns the identities of the spiritual world. A single glance of it mocks all the investigations of man and all the instruments and books of the earth and all reasoning. What is marvelous? What is unlikely? What is impossible or baseless or vague? after you have once just opened the space of a peachpit and given audience to far and near and to the sunset and had all things enter with electric swiftness softly and duly without confusion or jostling or jam.

The land and sea, the animals fishes and birds, the sky of heaven and the orbs, the forests mountains and rivers, are not small themes but folks expect of the poet to indicate more than the beauty and dignity which always attach to dumb real objects. they expect him to indicate the path between reality and their souls Men and women perceive the beauty well enough probably as well as he The passionate tenacity of hunters, woodmen, early risers, cultivators of gardens and orchards and fields, the love of healthy women for the 70 manly form, seafaring persons, drivers of horses, the passion for light and the open air, all is an old varied sign of the unfailing perception of beauty and of a residence of the poetic in outdoor people. They can never be assisted by poets to perceive some may but they never can The poetic quality is not marshalled in rhyme or uniformity or abstract addresses to things nor in melancholy complaints or good precepts, but is the life of these and much else and is in the soul. The profit of rhyme is that it drops seeds of a sweeter and more 80 luxuriant rhyme, and of uniformity that it conveys itself into its own roots in the ground out of sight. The rhyme and uniformity of perfect poems show the free growth of metrical laws and bud from them as unerringly and loosely as lilacs or roses on a bush, and take shapes as compact as the shapes of chestnuts and oranges and melons and pears, and shed the perfume impalpable to form The fluency and ornaments of the finest poems or music or orations or recitations are not independent but dependent All beauty comes from beautiful blood and a 90 beautiful brain If the greatnesses are in conjunction in a man or woman it is enough the fact will prevail through the universe ... but the gaggery and gilt of a million years will not prevail. Who troubles himself about his ornaments or fluency is lost. This is what you shall do Love the earth and sun and the animals, despise riches, give alms to every one that asks, stand up for the stupid and crazy, devote your income and labor to others, hate tyrants, argue not concerning God, have patience and indulgence toward the people, take off your hat to nothing known or unknown or to any man or 10 number of men, go freely with powerful uneducated persons and with the young and with the mothers of families, read these leaves in the open air every season of every year of your life, re-examine all you have been told at school or church or in any book, dismiss whatever insults your own soul, and your very flesh shall be a great poem and have the richest fluency not only in its words but in the silent lines of its lips and face and between the lashes of your eyes and in every motion and joint of your body The poet shall not spend his 20 time in unneeded work. He shall know that the ground is always ready plowed and manured not know it but he shall. He shall go directly to the creation. His trust shall master the trust of everything he touches and shall master all attachment

The known universe has one complete lover and that is the greatest poet. He consumes an eternal passion and is indifferent which chance happens and which possible contingency of fortune or misfortune and persuades daily and hourly his delicious pay What balks or 30 breaks others is fuel for his burning progress to contact and amorous joy Other proportions of the reception of pleasure dwindle to nothing to his proportions. All expected from heaven or from the highest he is rapport with in the sight of the daybreak or a scene of the winterwoods or the presence of children playing or with his arm round the neck of a man or woman. His love above all love has lessure and expanse he leaves room ahead of himself. He is no irresolute or susspicious lover he is sure . he scorns intervals 40 His experience and the showers and thrills are not for nothing Nothing can jar him suffering and darkness cannot—death and fear cannot. To him complaint and jealousy and envy are corpses buried and rotten in the earth he saw them buried The sea is not surer of the shore or the shore of the sea than he is of the fruition of his love and of all perfection and beauty

The fruition of beauty is no chance of hit or mis ... it is inevitable as life ... it is exact and plumb a gravitation. From the eyesight proceeds another eyesigh and from the hearing proceeds another hearing and from the voice proceeds another voice eternally curious of the harmony of things with man. To these respond perfections not only in the committees that were supposed to stand for the rest but in the rest themselves just the same These understand the law of perfection in masses and that its finish is to each for itself and onward floods from itself that it is profuse and impartial there is not a minute of the light or dark nor an acre of the earth or sea without it-nor any direction of the ski nor any trade or employment nor any turn of events This is the reason that about the proper expression of beauty there is precision and balance one part does not need to be thrust above another. The best singer is not the one who has the most lithe and powerful organ the pleasure of poems is not in them that take the handsomest measure and similes and sound

Without effort and without exposing in the least how it is done the greatest poet brings the spirit of any or all events and passions and scenes and persons some more and some less to bear on your individual character as you hear or read To do this well is to compete with the laws that pursue and follow time What is the purpose must surely be there and the clue of it must be there the faintest indication is the indication of the best and then becomes the clearest indication. Past and present and future are not disjoined but joined. The greatest poet forms the consistence of what is to be from what has been and is He drags the dead out of their coffins and stands them again on their feet he says to the past, Rise and walk before me that I may realize you He learns the lesson he places himself where the future becomes present. The greatest poet does not only dazzle his rays over character and scenes and passions . . he finally ascends and finishes all he exhibits the pinnacles that no man can tell what they are for or what is beyond. he glows a moment on the extremest verge He is most wonderful in his last half-hidden smile or by that flash of the moment of parting the one that sees it shall be encouraged or terrified afterwards for many years. The greatest poet does not moralize or make applications of morals . . . he knows the soul. The soul has that measureless pride which consists in never acknowledging any lessons but its own. But it has sympathy as measureless as its pride and the one balances the other and neither can stretch too far while it stretches in company with the other. The inmost screets of art sleep with the twain. The greatest poet has lain close betwixt both and they are vital in his style and thoughts.

The art of art, the glory of expression and the sunshine of the light of letters is simplicity. Nothing is better than simplicity nothing can make up for excess or for the lack of definiteness. To carry on the heave of impulse and pierce intellectual depths and give all subjects their articulations are powers neither common nor very uncommon But to speak in literature with the perfect recurude and insouciance of the movements of animals and the unimpeachableness of the sentiment of trees in the woods and grass by the roadside is the flawless mumph of art If you have looked on him who has chieved it you have looked on one of the masters of the artists of all nations and times You shall not contemplate the flight of the graygull over the bay or the mettlesome action of the blood horse or the tall leaning of sunflowers on their stalk or the appearance of the sun journeying through heaven or the appearance of the moon afterward with any more satisfaction than you shall contemplate him. The greatest poet has less a marked style and is more the channel of thoughts and hings without increase or diminution, and is the free channel of himself He swears to his art, I will not be meddlesome, I will not have in my writing any elegance or effect or originality to hang in the way between me and the rest like curtains. I will have nothing hang in ne way, not the richest curtains. What I tell I tell for precisely what it is Let who may exalt or startle or 'ascinate or soothe I will have purposes as health or heat snow has and be as regardless of observation. What I experience or portray shall go from my composition with out a shred of my composition. You shall stand by ni side and look in the mirror with me

In the need of poems philosophy politics mechanism science behaviour, the 50 craft of art, an appropriate native grand-opera, shipcraft, or any craft, he is greatest forever and forever who contributes the greatest original practical example. The cleanest expression is that which finds no sphere worthy of itself and makes one

The messages of great poets to each man and woman are, Come to us on equal terms, Only then can you understand us. We are no better than you, What we enclose you enclose, What we enjoy you may enjoy Did you suppose there could be only one Supreme? We affirm 60 there can be unnumbered Supremes, and that one does not countervail another any more than one eyesight countervails another and that men can be good or grand only of the consciousness of their supremacy within them What do you think is the grandeur of storms and dismemberments and the deadliest battles and wrecks and the wildest fury of the elements and the power of the sea and the motion of nature and of the throes of human desires and dignity and hate and love? It is that something in the soul which says, Rage 70 on, Whirl on, I tread master here and everywhere. Master of the spasms of the sky and of the shatter of the sea, Master of nature and passion and death, And of all terror and all pain

The American bards shall be marked for generosity and affection and for encouraging competitors shall be kosmos without monopoly or secrecy glad to pass any thing to any one hungry for equals night and day. They shall not be careful of riches and privilege they shall be riches and privilege shall perceive who the most affluent man is. The most affluent man is he that confronts all the shows he sees by equivalents out of the stronger wealth of himself. The American bard shall delineate no class of persons nor one or two out of the strata of interests nor love most nor truth most nor the soul most nor the body most . . . and not be for the eastern states more than the western or the northern states more than the southern

Exact science and its practical movements are no checks on the greatest poet but always his encourage- ment and support. The outset and remembrance are there are the arms that lifted him first and brace him best . . . there he returns after all his goings and comings The sailor and traveler , the atomist chemist astronomer geologist phrenologist spiritualist mathematician historian and lexicographer are not poets, but they are the lawgivers of poets and their construction underlies the structure of every perfect poem. No matter what rises or is uttered they sent the seed of the conception of it. . of them and by them stand the visible proofs of souls always of their father-10 stuff must be begotten the sinewy races of bards If there shall be love and content between the father and the son and if the greatness of the son is the exuding of the greatness of the father there shall be love between the poet and the man of demonstrable science. In the beauty of poems are the tuft and final applause of science

Great is the faith of the flush of knowledge and of the investigation of the depths of qualities and things Cleaving and circling here swells the soul of the poet yet is president of itself always. The depths are fath-20 omless and therefore calm. The innocence and nakedness are resumed they are neither modest not immodest. The whole theory of the special and supernatural and all that was twined with it or educed out of it departs as a dream. What has ever happened what happens and whatever may or shall happen, the vital laws enclose all they are sufficient for any case and for all cases none to be hurried or retarded any miracle of affairs or persons inadmissible in the vast clear scheme where every motion and every spear 30 of grass and the frames and spirits of men and women and all that concerns them are unspeakably perfect miracles all referring to all and each distinct and in its place. It is also not consistent with the reality of the soul to admit that there is anything in the known universe more divine than men and women

Men and women and the earth and all upon it are simply to be taken as they are, and the investigation of their past and present and future shall be unintermitted and shall be done with perfect candor. Upon this basis philosophy speculates ever looking toward the poet, ever regarding the eternal tendencies of all toward happiness never inconsistent with what is clear to the senses and to the soul. For the eternal tendencies of all toward happiness make the only point of sane philosophy. Whatever comprehends less than that whatever is less than the laws of light and of astronomical motion.

... or less than the laws that follow the thief the liar the glutton and the drunkard through this life and doubtiess or less than vast stretches of time or the afterward slow formation of density or the patient upheaving of strata-is of no account Whatever would put God in a poem or system of philosophy as contending against some being or influence, is also of no account Sanity and ensemble characterise the great master one principle all is spoilt. The great master has nothing to do with miracles. He sees health for himself in being one of the mass he sees the hiatus in singular em inence. To the perfect shape comes common ground. To be under the general law is great for that is to correspond with it. The master knows that he is unspeakably great and that all are unspeakably great that nothing for instance is greater than to conceive children and bring them that to be is just as great as to perceive or tell

In the make of the great masters the idea of political liberty is indispensable. Liberty takes the adherence of heroes wherever men and women exist. but never takes any adherence or welcome from the rest more than from poets They are the voice and exposition of liberty They out of ages are worthy the grand idea to them it is confided and they must sustain it. Nothing has precedence of it and nothing can warp or degrade it The attitude of great poets is to cheer up slaves and horrify despots. The turn of their necks, the sound of their feet, the motions of their wrists, are full of hazard to the one and hope to the other. Come nigh them awhile and though they neither speak or advise you shall learn the faithful American lesson. Liberty is poorly served by men whose good intent is quelled from one failure or two failures or any number of failures or from the casual indifference or ingratitude of the people, or from the sharp show of the tushes of power or the bringing to bear soldiers and cannon or any penal statutes Liberty relies upon itself, invites no one promises nothing, sits in calmness and light, is positive and composed, and knows no discouragement. The battle rages with many a loud alarm and frequent advance and retreat the enemy triumphs the prison, the handcuffs, the iron necklace and anklet, the scaffold garrote and leadballs do their work the cause is asleep the strong throats are choked with their own blood the young men drop their eyelashes toward the ground when they pass each other . and is liberty gone out of that place? No never. As the attributes of the poets of the kosmos concentre in the real body and soul and in the pleasure of things they possess the superiority of genuineness over all fiction and romance. As they emit themselves facts are showered over with light. The daylight is lit with more volatile light. The also the deep between the setting and rising sun goes deeper many fold. Each precise object or condition or combination or process exhibits.

a beauty . . . the multiplication table its-old age itsthe carpenter's trade its-the grand-opera its . . . the hugehulled cleanshaped New-York clipper at sea under steam or full sail gleams with unmatched beauty. the American circles and large harmonies of government gleam with theirs . and the commonest definite intentions and actions with theirs. The poets of the kosmos advance through all interpositions and coverings and turmoils and stratagems to first principles they dissolve poverty from its need They are of use and riches from its conceit. You large proprietor they say shall not realize or perceive more than any one else The owner of the library is not he who holds a legal title to it having bought and paid for it. These American states strong and healthy and accomplished shall receive no pleasure from violations of natural models and must not permit them. In paintings or mouldings or carvings in mineral or wood, or in the illustrations of books or newspapers, or in any comic or 70 tragic prints, or in the patterns of woven stuffs or anything to beautify rooms or furniture or costumes, or to put upon cornices or monuments or on the prows or sterns of ships, or to put anywhere before the human eve indoors or out, that which distorts honest shapes or which creates unearthly beings or places or contingencies is a nuisance and revolt. Of the human form especially it is so great it must never be made ridiculous. Of ornaments to a work nothing outre can be allowed . . . but those ornaments can be allowed that conform to the perfect 80 facts of the open air and that flow out of the nature of the work and come irrepressibly from it and are necessary to the completion of the work Most works are most beautiful without ornament, . Exaggerations will be revenged in human physiology. Clean and vigorous children are jetted and conceived only in those communities where the models of natural forms are public every day. . . .

Great genius and the people of these states must never be demeaned to romances As soon as histories are properly told there is no more need of romances.

The great poets are also to be known by the absence in them of tricks and by the justification of perfect personal candor Then folks echo a new cheap joy and a divine voice leaping from their brains. How beautiful is candor! All faults may be forgiven of him who has perfect candor Henceforth let no man of us lie, for we 10 have seen that openness wins the inner and outer world and that there is no single exception, and that never since our earth gathered itself in a mass have deceit or subterfuge or prevarication attracted its smallest particle or the faintest tinge of a shade—and that through the enveloping wealth and rank of a state or the whole republic of states a sneak or sly person shall be discovered and that the soul has never been once and despised and thrift without fooled and never can be fooled the loving nod of the soul is only a fœtid puff 20 there never grew up in any of the continents of the globe nor upon any planet or satellite or star, nor upon the asteroids, nor in any part of ethereal space, nor in the midst of density, nor under the fluid wet of the sea, nor in the condition which precedes the birth of babes, nor at any time during the changes of life, nor in that condition that follows what we term death, nor in any stretch of abeyance or action afterward of vitality, nor in any process of formation or reformation anywhere, a being whose instinct hated the truth

Extreme caution or prudence, the soundest organic health, large hope and comparison and fondness for women and children, large alimentiveness and destructiveness and causality, with a perfect sense of the oneness of nature and the propriety of the same spirit applied to human affairs these are called up of the float of the brain of the world to be parts of the greatest poet from his birth out of his mother's womb and from her birth out of her mother's Caution seldom goes far enough. It has been thought that the prudent citizen 40 was the citizen who applied himself to solid gains and did well for himself and his family and completed a lawful life without debt or crime. The greatest poet sees and admits these economies as he sees the economies of food and sleep, but has higher notions of prudence than to think he gives much when he gives a few slight attentions at the latch of the gate. The premises of the prudence of life are not the hospitality of it or the ripeness and harvest of it Beyond the independence of a little sum laid aside for burial-money, and of a few clap-boards around and shingles overhead on a lot of American soil owned, and the easy dollars that supply the year's plain clothing and meals, the melancholi prudence of the abandonment of such a great being as a man is to the toss and pallor of years of moneymaking with all their scorching days and icy nights and all their stifling deceits and underhanded dodgings, or infinites simals of parlors, or shameless stuffing while otherand all the loss of the bloom and odor of the earth and of the flowers and atmosphere and of the sea and of the true taste of the women and men you pass o: have to do with in youth or middle age, and the issuink sickness and desperate revolt at the close of a life with out elevation or naivete, and the ghastly chatter of . death without serenity or majesty, is the great frauc upon modern civilization and forethought, blotching the surface and system which civilization undeniably drafts and moistening with tears the immense features is spreads and spreads with such velocity before the reached kisses of the soul Still the right explanation remains to be made about prudence The prudence o the mere wealth and respectability of the most esteemed life appears too faint for the eye to observe at all wher little and large alike drop quietly aside at the though of the prudence suitable for immortality. What is wis dom that fills the thinness of a year or seventy o eighty years to wisdom spaced out by ages and coming back at a certain time with strong reinforcements and rich presents and the clear faces of wedding-guests a far as you can look in every direction running gaily to ward you? Only the soul is of itself reference to what ensues All that a person does of thinks is of consequence. Not a move can a man or woman make that affects him or her in a day or a month or any part of the direct lifetime or the hour of dead but the same affects him or her onward afterward

Did you guess any of them lived only its moment? The world does not so exist no parts palpable or impalpable so exist ... no result exists now without being from its long antecedent result, and that from its antecedent, and so backward without the farthest mentionable spot coming a bit nearer to the beginning than any other spot Whatever satisfies the soul is truth. The prudence of the greatest poet answers 70 at last the craving and glut of the soul, is not contemptuous of less ways of prudence if they conform to its ways, puts off nothing, permits no let-up for its own case or any case, has no particular sabbath or judgment-day, divides not the living from the dead or the righteous from the unrighteous, is satisfied with the present, matches every thought or act by its correlative, knows no possible forgiveness or deputed atoneknows that the young man who composedly periled his life and lost it has done exceeding well for 80 himself, while the man who has not periled his life and retains it to old age in riches and ease has perhaps achieved nothing for himself worth mentioning . . . and that only that person has no great prudence to learn who has learnt to prefer real longlived things, and favors body and soul the same, and perceives the indirect assuredly following the direct, and what evil or good he does leaping onward and waiting to meet him again-and who in his spirit in any emergency whatever neither hurries or avoids deat'

The direct trial of him who would be the greatest poet is to-day. If he does not flood himself with the immediate age as with vast oceanic tides and if he does not attract his own loud body and soul to himself and hang on its neck with incomparable love and plunge his semitic muscle into its merits and demerits and and if if he be not himself the age transfigured to him is not opened the eternity which gives similitude to all periods and locations and processes and animate and manimate forms, and which is the bond of time, and rises up from its inconceivable vagueness and infiniteness 10 in the swimming shape of to-day, and is held by the ductile anchors of life, and makes the present spot the passage from what was to what shall be, and commits itself to the representation of this wave of an hour and this one of the sixty beautiful children of the wave-let him merge in the general run and wait his developement.

Still the final test of poems or any character or work remains. The prescient poet projects himself centuries ahead and judges performer or performance after the changes of time. Does it live through them? Does it still hold on untired? Will the same style and the direction of genius to similar points be satisfactory now? Has no new discovery in science or arrival at superior planes of thought and judgment and behaviour fixed him or his so that either can be looked down upon? Have the marches of tens and hundreds and thousands of years made willing detours to the right hand and the left hand for his sake? Is he beloved long and long after he is buried? Does the young man think often of him? and the young woman think often of him? and do the middle-aged and the old think of him?

A great poem is for ages and ages in common and for all degrees and complexions and all departments and sects and for a woman as much as a man and a man as much as a woman A great poem is no finish to a man or woman but rather a beginning. Has anyone fancied he could sit at last under some due authority and rest satisfied with explanations and realize and be content and full? To no such terminus does the greatest poet he brings neither cessation or sheltered bring 40 farness and ease. The touch of him tells in action Whom he takes he takes with firm sure grasp into live regions previously unattained thenceforward they see the space and ineffable sheen that turn the old spots and lights into dead vacuums The companion of him beholds the birth and progress of stars and learns one of the meanings. Now there shall be a man cohered out of tumult and chaos . . . the elder encourages the younger and shows him how they two shall launch off fearlessly together till the new world fits an orbit for itself and looks unabashed on the lesser orbits of the stars and sweeps through the ceaseless rings and shall never be quiet again

There will soon be no more priests. Their work is done They may wait awhile perhaps a generation dropping off by degrees A superior breez or two the gangs of kosmos anshall take their place prophets en masse shall take their place A new order shall arise and they shall be the priests of man, and every man shall be his own priest. The churches built under their umbrage shall be the churches of men and women Through the divinity of themselves shall the kosmos and the new breed of poets be interpreters of men and women and of all events and things. They shall find their inspiration in real objects to-day, symp toms of the past and future They shall not deign to defend immortality or God or the perfection of things or liberty or the exquisite beauty and realin of the soul. They shall arise in America and be responded to from the remainder of the earth

The English language befriends the grand American it is brawny enough and limber and expression full enough. On the tough stock of a race who through all change of circumstances was never without the idea of political liberty, which is the animus of all liberty it has attracted the terms of daintier and gayer and subtler and more elegant tongues. It is the powerful it is the dialect of common language of resistance sense It is the speech of the proud and melancholi races and of all who aspire. It is the chosen tongue to express growth faith self-esteem freedom justice equality friendliness amplitude prudence decision and courage It is the medium that shall well nigh express the inex pressible

I know that what answers for me an American must answer for any individall or nation that serves for a part of my materials. Does this answer? or is it without reference to universal needs? or sprung of the needs of the less developed society of special ranks, or old needs of pleasure overlaid by modern science and forms? Does this acknowledge bury with audible and absolute acknowledgement. and set slavery at naught for life and death? Will it the breed one goodshaped and wellhung man, and a woman to be his perfect and independent mate? Does ir improve manners? Is it for the nursing of the young of the republic? The poems distilled from other poems will probably pass away The coward will surely pass away The expectation of the vital and great can only be satisfied by the demeanor of the vital and great. The swarms of the polished deprecating and reflectors and the polite float off and leave no remembrance. America prepares with composure and goodwill for the visitors that have sent word. It is not intellect that is to be their warrant and welcome. The talented, the artist, the ingenious, the editor, the statesman, the erudite they are not 40 they fall in their place and do their unappreciated work. The soul of the nation also does its work. No disguise can pass on it no disguise can conceal from it. It rejects none, it permits all. Only toward as good as itself and toward the like of itself will it advance half-way. An individual is as superb as a nation when he has the qualities which make a superb nation. The soul of the largest and wealthiest and proudest nation may well go half-way to meet that of its poets. The signs are effectual. There is no fear of mistake. If the 50 one is true the other is true. The proof of a poet is that his country absorbs him as affectionately as he has absorbed it

One's-Self I Sing

One s-Self I Sing" is the first poem in the standard edition of Leaves of Grass issued in 1902 by Whitman's "terary executors, Richard Maurice Bucke, Thomas B riarned, and Horace L Traubol, and the sequence of Doems in the following selections follows the sequence of that edition. The first date appended to this and other poems by Whitman is that of earliest publication. The second date is that of the poem's first appearance in final form. It should be noted that Whitman constantly revised his work, that most of his poems exist in several intermediary stages, and that the versions presented here show the poems as they were finally revised by the poet

"One's-Self I Sing' strikes at once the keynote of much of Whitman's poetry his democratic society is composed of "simple separate persons"

One's-Self I sing, a simple separate person, Yet utter the word Democratic, the word En-Masse.

Of physiology from top to toe I sing, Not physiognomy alone nor brain alone is worthy for the Muse,

I say the Form complete is worthier far, The Female equally with the Male I sing

Of Life immense in passion, pulse, and power, Cheerful, for freest action form'd under the laws divine, The Modern Man I sing

Song of Myself

Strictly speaking, Whitman is not writing about himself Many, perhaps most, of the experiences recorded in the poem are purely imaginary. His aim is to embrace the whole of human experience by means of imaginative sympathy This power of imaginative sympathy, which Whitman possessed to an extraordinary degree, enables him to identify himself with all sorts and conditions of men 'Of every hue and caste am I, of every rank and religion," he declared, he becomes "the hounded slave." "the mashed fireman," and the scores of others described in the poem. He fraternizes with ail, their interests are his ("Whatever interests the rest interests me"). All men and women, moreover, are potentially equal in the sight of Whitman-"size is only development" "Song of Myself' is perhaps the most thoroughly democratic poem in the literature of the world

Structurally, it is the loosest of compositions, held together chiefly by the all-pervading personality of the

The present form of 'Song of Myself' is the result of many revisions, deletions, and additions made between 1855, the date of its first appearance, and 1881. The student can trace these changes by consulting the "Variorum Readings" in Emory Holloway's "Inclusive Edition" of Legyes of Grass.

I celebrate myself, and sing myself,

And what I assume you shall assume,

For every atom belonging to me as good belongs to you

I loafe and invite my soul,

I lean and loafe at my ease observing a spear of summer grass

My tongue, every atom of my blood, form d from this soil, this air,

Born here of parents born here from parents the same, and then parents the same,

I, now thirty-seven years old in perfect health begin, Hoping to cease not till death Creeds and schools in abeyance,

Retiring back a while sufficed at what they are, b never forgotten,

I harbor for good or bad, I permit to speak at eve hazard.

I breathe the fragrance myself and know it and like The distillation would intoxicate me also, but I shall n let it.

The atmosphere is not a perfume, it has no taste of t distillation, it is odorless,

It is for my mouth forever, I am in love with it,

I will go to the bank by the wood and become und guised and naked,

I am mad for it to be in contact with me

The smoke of my own breath,

Echoes, ripples, buzz'd whispers, love-root, silk-thre crotch and vine,

My respiration and inspiration, the beating of my her the passing of blood and air through my lungs.

The sniff of green leaves and dry leaves, and of the sh and dark-color'd sea-rocks, and of hay in the ba

The sound of the belch'd words of my voice loos d

You shall possess the good of the earth and sun, (there are millions of suns left,)

You shall no longer take things at second or third hand, nor look through the eyes of the dead, nor feed on the spectres in books,

You shall not look through my eyes either, nor take things from me,

You shall listen to all sides and filter them from your self have heard what the talkers were talking, the talk of the beginning and the end,

But I do not talk of the beginning or the end

There was never any more inception than there is now,

Not an inch nor a particle of an inch is vile, and none shall be less familiar than the rest

I am satisfied—I see, dance, laugh, sing,

As the hugging and loving bed-fellow sleeps at my side through the night, and withdraws at the peep of the day with stealthy tread,

Leaving me baskets cover'd with white towels swelling the house with their plenty,

Shall I postpone my acceptation and realization and scream at my eyes,

That they turn from gazing after and down the road,

And forthwith cipher and show me to a cent,

Exactly the value of one and exactly the value of two, and which is ahead?

Not words, not music or rhyme I want, not custom or lecture, not even the best,

Only the lull I like, the hum of your valved voice.

I mind how once we lay such a transparent summer morning,

How you settled your head athwart my hips and gently turn d over upon me,

And parted the shirt from my bosom-bone, and plunged your tongue to my bare-stript heart,

And reach'd till you felt my beard, and reach'd till you held my feet

Swiftly arose and spread around me the peace and knowledge that pass all the argument of the earth,

And I know that the hand of God is the promise of my own.

And I know that the spirit of God is the brother of my

And that all the men ever born are also my brothers, and the women my sisters and lovers,

And that a kelson of the creation is love,

And limitless are leaves stiff or drooping in the fields,

And brown ants in the little wells beneath them,

And mossy scabs of the worm fence, heap'd stones, elder, mullein and poke-weed

A child said W hat is the grass? fetching it to me with full hands.

How could I answer the child? I do not know what it is any more than he I guess it must be the flag of my disposition, out of hopeful green stuff woven.

Or I guess it is the handkerchief of the Lord,
A scented gift and remembrancer designedly dropt, Bearing the owner's name someway in the corners, that we may see and remark, and say Whose?

Or I guess the grass is itself a child, the produced babe of the vegetation

Or I guess it is a uniform hieroglyphic,

And it means, Sprouting alike in broad zones, and narrow zones.

Tenderly will I use you curling grass,

It may be you transpire from the breasts of young men.

It may be if I had known them I would have loved

It may be you are from old people, or from offspring taken soon out of their mothers' laps,

And here you are the mothers' laps

This grass is very dark to be from the white heads of old

Darker than the colorless beards of old men,

Dark to come from under the faint red roofs of mouths O I perceive after all so many uttering tongues,

And I perceive they do not come from the roofs o

What groans of over-fed or half-starv'd who fall sunstruck or in fits,

What exclamations of women taken suddenly who hurry home and give birth to babes,

What living and buried speech is always vibrating here, what howls restrain'd by decorum,

Arrests of criminals, slights, adulterous offers made, acceptances, rejections with convex lips,

I mind them or the show or resonance of them-I come and I depart.

Alone far in the wilds and mountains I hunt,

I saw the marriage of the trapper in the open air in the far west, the bride was a red girl,

Her father and his friends sat near cross-legged and dumbly smoking, they had moccasins to their feet and large thick blankets hanging from their shoulders,

On a bank lounged the trapper, he was drest mostly in skins, his luxuriant beard and curls protected his neck, he held his bride by the hand,

She had long eyelashes, her coarse straight locks descended upon her voluptuous limbs and reach'd to her feet The runaway slave came to my house and stopt outside, I heard his motions crackling the twigs of the heard his motions cracking the twigs of the woodpile,

Through the swung half-door of the kitchen I saw him limpsy and weak,

And went where he sat on a log and led him in and assured him,

And brought water and fill'd a tub for his sweated body and bruis'd feet,

And gave him a room that enter'd from my own, and gave him some coarse clean clothes,

And remember perfectly well his revolving eyes and his awkwardness.

And remember putting plasters on the galls of his neck and ankles;

He staid with me a week before he was recuperated and pass'd north,

I had him sit next me at table, my fire-lock lean'd in the corner

Twenty-eight young men bathe by the shore, Twenty-eight young men and all so friendly; 200 Twenty-eight years of womanly life and all so lonesome

She owns the fine house by the rise of the bank, She hides handsome and richly drest aft the blinds of the window.

Which of the young men does she like the best? Ah the homeliest of them is beautiful to her.

Where are you off to, lady? for I see you, You splash in the water there, yet stay stock still in your room

Dancing and laughing along the beach came the twentyninth bather,

The rest did not see her, but she saw them and loved them

The beards of the young men glisten'd with wet, it ran from their long hair,

Little streams pass'd all over their bodies

¹⁹¹ limpsy, limp

An unseen hand also pass'd over their bodies, It descended tremblingly from their temples and ribs.

The young men float on their backs, their white belies bulge to the sun, they do not ask who seizes fast to them,

They do not know who puffs and declines with pendant and bending arch,

They do not think whom they souse with spray

I loster enjoying his repartee and his shuffle and breakdown.

Blacksmiths with grimed and hairy chests environ the anvil.

Each has his main-sledge, they are all out, there is a great heat in the fire 220

From the cinder-strew'd threshold I follow their movements,

The lithe sheer of their waists plays even with their massive arms,

Overhand the hammers swing, overhand so slow, overhand so sure,

They do not hasten, each man hits in his place.

The Negro holds firmly the reins of his four horses, the block swags underneath on its tied-over chain,

The Negro that drives the long dray of the stone-yard, steady and tall he stands pois'd on one leg on the string-piece,

His blue shirt exposes his ample neck and breast and loosens over his hip-band,

His glance is calm and commanding, he tosses the slouch of his hat away from his forehead,

The sun falls on his crispy hair and mustache, falls on the black of his polish'd and perfect limbs

Is this then a touch? quivering me to a new identity,

Flames and ether making a rush for my veins,

Treacherous tip of me reaching and crowding to help them,

My flesh and blood playing out lightning to strike what is hardly different from myself,

On all sides prurient provokers stiffening my limbs,

Straining the udder of my heart for its withheld drip,

Behaving licentious toward me, taking no denial,

Depriving me of my best as for a purpose,

Unbuttoning my clothes, holding me by the bare waist, Deluding my confusion with the calm of the sunlight and pasture-fields,

Immodestly sliding the fellow-senses away,

They bribed to swap off with touch and go and graze at the edges of me,

No consideration, no regard for my draining strength or my anger,

Fetching the rest of the herd around to enjoy them a while,

Then all uniting to stand on a headland and worry me.

The sentries desert every other part of me,

They have left me helpless to a red marauder,

They all come to the headland to witness and assist against me

I am given up by traitors,

I talk wildly, I have lost my wits, I and nobody else am the greatest traitor,

I went myself first to the headland, my own hands carried me there

How the silent old-faced infants and the lifted sick, and the sharp-lipp'd unshaven men, 830

All this I swallow, it tastes good, I like it well, it becomes

I am the man, I suffer'd, I was there.

The disdain and calmness of martyrs,

The mother of old, condemn'd for a witch, burnt with dry wood, her children gazing on,

The hounded slave that flags in the race, leans by the fence, blowing, cover'd with sweat,

The twinges that sting like needles his legs and neck, the murderous buckshot and the bullets,

All these I feel or am.

I am the hounded slave, I wince at the bite of the dogs. Hell and despair are upon me, crack and again crack the marksmen,

I clutch the rails of the fence, my gore dribs, thinn'd with the ooze of my skin, I fall on the weeds and stones,

The riders spur their unwilling horses, haul close,

Taunt my dizzy ears and beat me violently over the heat with whip-stocks.

Agonies are one of my changes of garments

I do not ask the wounded person how he feels, I myse become the wounded person,

My hurts turn livid upon me as I lean on a cane an

I am an old artillerist, I tell of my fort's bombardment I am there again.

Again the long roll of the drummers,

Again the attacking cannon, mortars,

Again to my listening ears the cannon responsive.

I take part, I see and hear the whole,

The cries, curses, roar, the plaudits for well-air shots,

The ambulanza slowly passing trailing its red drip,

Workmen searching after damages, making indispensa repairs,

The fall of grenades through the rent roof, the f shaped explosion,

The whizz of limbs, heads, stone, wood, iron, high in air.

Now I tell what I knew in Texas in my early youth, I tell not the fall of Alamo.

Not one escaped to tell the fall of Alamo.

The hundred and fifty are dumb yet at Alamo,)

Tis the tale of the murder in cold blood of four hundred and twelve young men

Retreating they had form'd in a hollow square with their baggage for breastworks,

Nine hundred lives out of the surrounding enemy's, nine times their number, was the price they took in advance.

Their colonel was wounded and their ammunition gone, They treated for an honorable capitulation, receiv'd writing and seal, gave up their arms and march'd back prisoners of war

They were the glory of the race of rangers, Matchless with horse, rifle, song, supper, courtship,

Large, turbulent, generous, handsome, proud, and affectionate.

Bearded, sunburnt, drest in the free costume of hunters, Not a single one over thirty years of age

The second First-day morning they were brought out in squads and massacred, it was beautiful early summer,

The work commenced about five o'clock and was over by eight.

None obey'd the command to kneel,

Some made a mad and helpless rush, some stood stark and

A few fell at once, shot in the temple or heart, the living and dead lay together,

The maim'd and mangled dug in the dirt, the new-comers saw them there,

Some half-kill'd attempted to crawl away,

These were despatch'd with bayonets or batter'd with the blunts of muskets

A youth not seventeen years old seiz'd his assassin till two more came to release him,

The three were all torn and cover'd with the boy's blood

At eleven o'clock began the burning of the bodies, That is the tale of the murder of the four hundred and twelve young men

Would you hear of an old-time sea-fight?

Would you learn who won by the light of the moon and stars2

List to the yarn, as my grandmother's father the sailor told it to me

Our foe was no skulk in his ship I tell you, (said he,) 900 His was the surly English pluck, and there is no tougher or truer, and never was, and never will be,

Along the lower'd eve he came horribly raking us.

We closed with him, the yards entangled, the cannon touch d.

My captain lash'd fast with his own hands

We had receiv'd some eighteen pound shots under the

On our lower-gun-deck two large pieces had burst at the first fire, killing all around and blowing up overhead

Fighting at sun-down, fighting at dark,

Ten o'clock at night, the full moon well up, our leaks on the gain, and five feet of water reported,

The master-at-arms loosing the prisoners confined in the after-hold to give them a chance for themselves youth Whitman was never in Texas Many of the experiences described in the poem are imaginary • 872 Alamo On March 6, 1836, a Mexican army under Santa Anna attacked the Alamo, a fortified mission at San Antonio, Texas, and killed the entire garrison. Texas won her independence from Mexico a month later, when an army of Texans, shouting Remember the Alamo," defeated the Mexicans at the battle of San Jacinto • 875 tale murder, the battle of Coleto and the massacre of Goliad during the Texas Revolution of 1836 • 897 old-time sea-fight. While many details are supplied by the author's imagination, Whitman had in mind the historic battle between the Banhoms e Richard, commanded by John Paul Jones, and the English warship Serapis in 1778 Jones' famous words. We have just begun to fight, are quoted with a slight alteration in I 916

The transit to and from the magazine is now stopt by the sentinels,

They see so many strange faces they do not know whom

Our frigate takes fire,

The other asks if we demand quarter?

If our colors are struck and the fighting done?

Now I laugh content, for I hear the voice of my little captain,

We have not struck, he composedly cries, we have just begun our part of the fighting

Only three guns are in use,

One is directed by the captain himself against the enemy's main-mast,

Two well serv'd with grape and canister silence his musketry and clear his decks

The tops alone second the fire of this little battery, especially the main-top,

They hold out bravely during the whole of the action

Not a moment's cease,

The leaks gain fast on the pumps, the fire eats toward the powder-magazine

One of the pumps has been shot away, it is generally thought we are sinking

Serene stands the little captain,

He is not hurried, his voice is neither high nor low, His eyes give more light to us than our battle-lanterns

Toward twelve there in the beams of the moon they surrender to us

36

Stretch'd and still lies the midnight,

Two great hulls motionless on the breast of the dark-

Our vessel riddled and slowly sinking, preparations to pass to the one we have conquer'd,

The captain on the quarter-deck coldly giving his orders through a countenance white as a sheet,

Near by the corpse of the child that serv d in the cabin,

The dead face of an old salt with long white hair and carefully curl'd whiskers,

The flames spite of all that can be done flickering aloft and below,

The husky voices of the two or three officers yet fit for duty.

Formless stacks of bodies and bodies by themselves, dabs of flesh upon the masts and spars,

Cut of cordage, dangle of rigging, slight shock of the soothe of waves,

Black and impassive guns, litter of powder-parcels, strong scent.

A few large stars overhead, silent and mournful shining,

Delicate sniffs of sea-breeze, smells of sedgy grass and fields by the shore, death-messages given in charge to survivors.

The hiss of the surgeon's knife, the gnawing teeth of his saw.

Wheeze, cluck, swash of falling blood, short wild scream and long, dull, tapering groan,

These so, these irretrievable

37

You laggards there on guard' look to your arms'
In at the conquer'd doors they crowd' I am possess'd!
Embody all presences outlaw'd or suffering,
See myself in prison shaped like another man,
And feel the dull unintermitted pain,

For me the keepers of convicts shoulder their carbin and keep watch,

It is I let out in the morning and barr'd at night

Not a mutineer walks handcuff'd to jail but I am han cuff'd to him and walk by his side,

(I am less the jolly one there, and more the silent o with sweat on my twitching lips)

Not a youngster is taken for larceny but I go up too, a am tried and sentenced

Not a cholera patient lies at the last gasp but I also at the last gasp,

My face is ash-color'd, my sinews gnarl, away from people retreat.

A call in the midst of the crowd, My own voice, orotund sweeping and final

Come my children,

Come my boys and girls, my women, household and intimates,

Now the performer launches his nerve, he has pass'd his prelude on the reeds within

Music rolls, but not from the organ,

Folks are around me, but they are no household of mine

Ever the hard unsunk ground,

Ever the eaters and drinkers, ever the upward and downward sun, ever the air and the ceaseless tides,

Ever myself and my neighbors, refreshing, wicked, real, Ever the old inexplicable query, ever that thorn'd thumb, that breath of itches and thirsts,

Ever the vexer's hoot! hoot! till we find where the sly one hides and bring him forth,

Ever love, ever the sobbing liquid of life,

Ever the bandage under the chin, ever the trestles of death.

Here and there with dimes on the eyes walking, 1070 To feed the greed of the belly the brains liberally spooning,

Tickets buying, taking, selling, but in to the feast never once going,

Many sweating, ploughing, thrashing, and then the chaff for payment receiving,

A few idly owning, and they the wheat continually claiming.

This is the city and I am one of the citizens,

Whatever interests the rest interests me, politics, wars, markets, newspapers, schools,

The mayor and councils, banks, tariffs, steamships, factories, stocks, stores, real estate and personal estate.

The little plentiful manikins skipping around in collars and tail'd coats,

I am aware who they are. (they are positively not worms or fleas,)

I acknowledge the duplicates of myself, the weakest and shallowest is deathless with me,

What I do and say the same waits for them,

Every thought that flounders in me the same flounders in them

I know perfectly well my own egotism,

Know my omnivorous lines and must not write any less, And would fetch you whoever you are flush with myself

Not words of routine this song of mine,

The well-taken photographs—but your wife or friend close and solid in your arms?

The black ship mail'd with iron, her mighty guns in her turrets—but the pluck of the captain and engineers?

In the houses the dishes and fare and furniture—but the host and hostess, and the look out of their eyes?

The sky up there—yet here or next door, or across the way?

The saints and sages in history—but you yourself?

Sermons, creeds, theology—but the fathomless human brain.

And what is reason, and what is love, and what is life?

Once I Pass'd Through a Populous City

It has been often supposed that the following poem refers to a love affair in New Orleans in 1848 Whitman's poems, however, can never be safely taken as literal autobiography, and the evidence in support of such a romance is far from conclusive For the best account of the subject, see Emory Holloway's Whitman, pp 39-71

Once I pass'd through a populous city imprinting my brain for future use with its shows, architecture, customs, traditions,

Yet now of all that city I remember only a woman I casually met there who detain'd me for love of me,

Day by day and night by night we were togetherall else has long been forgotten by me,

I remember I say only that woman who passionately clung to me,

Again she holds me by the hand, I must not go,

I see her close beside me with silent lips sad and tremulous

Better than any other single phrase, perhaps, "the love of comrades" expresses Whitman's concept of the true basis of a democratic society

Come, I will make the continent indissoluble,

I will make the most splendid race the sun ever shone upon,

I will make divine magnetic lands,

With the love of comrades,

With the life-long love of comrades

- I will plant companionship thick as trees along all the rivers of America, and along the shores of the great lakes, and all over the prairies,
- I will make inseparable cities with their arms about each other's necks,

By the love of comrades,

By the manly love of comrades,

For you, for you I am trilling these songs

Song of the Open Road

Later poets were to take up Whitman's call to the open road Among these, Richard Hovey and Bliss Carman, in Songs from Vagabondia (1900), and Vachel Lindsay, in "The Santa-Fé Trail" (1912), are interesting examples

1

Afoot and light-hearted I take to the open road,

Healthy, free, the world before me,

The long brown path before me leading wherever I choose

Henceforth I ask not good-fortune, I myself am good-fortune,

Henceforth I whimper no more, postpone no more, need nothing,

Done with indoor complaints, libraries, querulous criti-

Strong and content I travel the open road

The earth, that is sufficient,

I do not want the constellations any nearer,

I know they are very well where they are,

I know they suffice for those who belong to them.

(Still here I carry my old delicious burdens,

I carry them, men and women, I carry them with $m_{\rm f}$ wherever I go,

I swear it is impossible for me to get rid of them, I am fill'd with them, and I will fill them in return.)

You road I enter upon and look around, I believe you are not all that is here,

I believe that much unseen is also here

Here the profound lesson of reception, nor preference nor denial,

The black with his woolly head, the felon, the diseas' the illiterate person, are not denied,

The birth, the hasting after the physician, the begga tramp, the drunkard's stagger, the laughing par of mechanics,

The escaped youth, the rich person's carriage, the for the eloping couple,

The early market-man, the hearse, the moving furniture into the town, the return back from t town,

They pass, I also pass, any thing passes, none can interdicted,

None but are accepted, none but shall be dear to r

You flagg'd walks of the cities' you strong cu at the edges'

You ferries' you planks and posts of wharves' timberlined sides' you distant ships'

You rows of houses' you window-pierc'd facac you roofs' om the living and the dead you have peopled your impassive surfaces, and the spirits thereof would be evident and amicable with me.

ne earth expanding right hand and left hand,

0 highway I travel, do you say to me Do not leave

Do you say Venture not—if you leave me you are lost?

Do you say I am already prepared, I am well-beaten and undenied, adhere to me?

O public road, I say back I am not afraid to leave you, yet I love you,

You express me better than I can express myself,

You shall be more to me than my poem

I think heroic deeds were all conceiv'd in the open air, and all free poems also,

I think I could stop here myself and do miracles, 50
I think whatever I shall meet on the road I shall like,

and whoever beholds me shall like me,

I think whoever I see must be happy.

5

From this hour I ordain myself loos'd of limits and imaginary lines,

Going where I list, my own master total and absolute, Listening to others, considering well what they say,

Pausing, searching, receiving, contemplating,

Gently, but with undeniable will, divesting myself of the holds that would hold me.

I inhale great draughts of space,

The east and the west are mine, and the north and the south are mine.

I am larger, better than I thought,
I did not know I held so much goodness.

All seems beautiful to me,

I can repeat over to men and women You have done such good to me I would do the same to you,

I will recruit for myself and you as I go,

I will scatter myself among men and women as I go,

I will toss a new gladness and roughness among them, Whoever denies me it shall not trouble me,

Whoever accepts me he or she shall be blessed and shall bless me.

6

Now if a thousand perfect men were to appear it would not amaze me,

Now if a thousand beautiful forms of women appear'd it would not astonish me

Now I see the secret of the making of the best persons.

It is to grow in the open air and to eat and sleep with

Here a great personal deed has room,

(Such a deed seizes upon the hearts of the whole race of men.

Its effusion of strength and will overwhelms law and mocks all authority and all argument against it)

Here is the test of wisdom,

Wisdom is not finally tested in schools,

Wisdom cannot be pass'd from one having it to another not having it,

Wisdom is of the soul, is not susceptible of proof, is its own proof,

Applies to all stages and objects and qualities and is content.

Is the certainty of the reality and immortality of things, and the excellence of things,

Something there is in the float of the sight of things that provokes it out of the soul

Now I re-examine philosophies and religions,

They may prove well in lecture-rooms, yet not prove at all under the spacious clouds and along the landscape and flowing currents

Here is realization,

Here is a man tallied—he realizes here what he has in him, The past, the future, majesty, love—if they are vacant of you, you are vacant of them

Only the kernel of every object nourishes,

Where is he who tears off the husks for you and me?

Where is he that undoes stratagems and envelopes for you and me?

Here is adhesiveness, it is not previously fashion'd, it is

Do you know what it is as you pass to be loved by strangers?

Do you know the talk of those turning eye-balls?

Here is the offlux of the soul,

The efflux of the soul comes from within through embower'd gates, ever provoking questions,

These yearnings why are they? these thoughts in the darkness why are they?

Why are there men and women that while they are nigh me the sunlight expands my blood?

Why when they leave me do my pennants of joy sink flat and lank?

Why are there trees I never walk under but large and melodious thoughts descend upon me?

(I think they hang there winter and summer on those trees and always drop fruit as I pass,)

What is it I interchange so suddenly with strangers?
What with some driver as I ride on the seat by his side?
What with some fisherman drawing his seine by the shore as I walk by and pause?

What gives me to be free to a woman's and man's good-will? what gives them to be free to mine?

8

The efflux of the soul is happiness, here is happiness, I think it pervades the open air, waiting at all times, Now it flows unto us, we are rightly charged. Here rises the fluid and attaching character,

The fluid and attaching character is the freshness and sweetness of man and woman,

(The herbs of the morning sprout no fresher and sweeter every day out of the roots of themselves than it sprouts fresh and sweet continually out of itself)

Toward the fluid and attaching character exudes the sweat of the love of young and old,

From it falls distill d the charm that mocks beauty and Toward it heaves the shuddering longing ache of contact.

You shall not heap up what is call'd riches,

You shall scatter with lavish hand all that you earn or achieve,

You but arrive at the city to which you are destin'd, you hardly settle yourself to satisfaction before you are call'd by an irresistible call to depart,

You shall be treated to the ironical smiles and mockings of those who remain behind you,

What beckonings of love you receive you shall only answer with passionate kisses of parting,

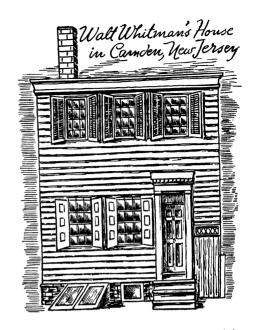

Vou shall not allow the hold of those who spread their reach'd hands toward you.

12

Allons' after the great Companions, and to belong to them'

They too are on the road—they are the swift and majestic men—they are the greatest women,

Enjoyers of calms of seas and storms of seas,
Solors of many a ship, walkers of many a mile of land,

Habitués of many distant countries, habitués of fardistant dwellings,

Trusters of men and women, observers of cities, solitary toilers,

Pausers and contemplators of tufts, blossoms, shells of the shore,

Dancers at wedding-dances, kissers of brides, tender helpers of children, bearers of children,

Soldiers of revolts, standers by gaping graves, lowerersdown of coffins,

Journeyers over consecutive seasons, over the years, the curious years each emerging from that which preceded it,

Journeyers as with companions, namely their own diverse phases,

Forth-steppers from the latent unrealized baby-days,

Journeyers gayly with their own youth, journeyers with their bearded and well-grain'd manhood, 160

Journeyers with their womanhood, ample, unsurpass'd, content,

Journeyers with their own sublime old age of manhood or womanhood,

Old age, calm, expanded, broad with the haughty breadth of the universe,

Old age, flowing free with the delicious near-by freedom of death

Allons! to that which is endless as it was beginningless, To undergo much, tramps of days, rests of nights,

To merge all in the travel they tend to, and the days and nights they tend to,

Again to merge them in the start of superior journeys, To see nothing anywhere but what you may reach it and pass it.

To conceive no time, however distant, but what you may reach it and pass it,

To look up or down no road but it stretches and waits for you, however long but it stretches and waits for you,

To see no being, not God's or any, but you also go thither.

To see no possession but you may possess it, enjoying all without labor or purchase, abstracting the feast yet not abstracting one particle of it,

To take the best of the farmer's farm and the rich man's elegant villa, and the chaste blessings of the well-married couple, and the fruits of orchards and flowers of gardens,

To take to your use out of the compact cities as you pass through.

To carry buildings and streets with you afterward wherever you go,

To gather the minds of men out of their brains as you encounter them, to gather the love out of their hearts.

To take your lovers on the road with your for all these road.

To take your lovers on the road with you, for all that you leave them behind you

To know the universe itself as a road, as many roads, as roads for traveling souls

All parts away for the progress of souls,

All religion, all solid things, arts, governments—all that was or is apparent upon this globe or any globe, falls into niches and corners before the procession of souls along the grand roads of the universe

Of the progress of the souls of men and women along the grand roads of the universe, all other progress is the needed emblem and sustenance. Forever alive, forever forward,

Stately, solemn, sad, withdrawn, baffled, mad, turbulent, feeble, dissatisfied,

Desperate, proud, fond, sick, accepted by men, rejected by men,

They go! they go! I know that they go, but I know not where they go,

But I know that they go toward the best—toward some thing great

Whoever you are, come forth! or man or woman come forth!

You must not stay sleeping and dallying there in the house, though you built it, or though it has been built for you

Out of the dark confinement! out from behind the screen'

It is useless to protest, I know all and expose it.

Behold through you as bad as the rest,

Through the laughter, dancing, dining, supping, of people,

Inside of dresses and ornaments, inside of those wash'd and trimm'd faces,

Behold a secret silent loathing and despair

No husband, no wife, no friend, trusted to hear the confession,

Another self, a duplicate of every one, skulking and hid ing it goes,

Formless and wordless through the streets of the cities polite and bland in the parlors,

In the cars of railroads, in steamboats, in the public assembly,

Home to the houses of men and women, at the table, in the bedroom, everywhere,

Smartly attired, countenance smiling, form upright death under the breast-bones, hell under the skull bones,

Under the broadcloth and gloves, under the ribbons and artificial flowers,

Keeping fair with the customs, speaking not a syllable of itself,

Speaking of any thing else but never of itself.

Allons! through struggles and wars!

The goal that was named cannot be countermanded.

Have the past struggles succeeded?

W'hat has succeeded? yourself? your nation? Nature?
Now understand me well—it is provided in the essence of things that from any fruition of success, no matter what, shall come forth something to make a greater struggle necessary

M₁ call is the call of battle, I nourish active rebellion, 210 He going with me must go well arm'd,

He going with me goes often with spare diet, poverty, angry enemies, desertions.

Allons! the road is before us!

k is safe—I have tried it—my own feet have tried it well—be not detain'd!

Let the paper remain on the desk unwritten, and the book on the shelf unopen'd!

Let the tools remain in the workshop! let the money re-

Let the school stand' mind not the cry of the teacher'
Let the preacher preach in his pulpit' let the lawyer plead in the court, and the judge expound the law

Camerado, I give you my hand!

I give you my love more precious than money,
I give you myself before preaching or law,

Will you give me yourself? will you come travel with me? Shall we stick by each other as long as we live?

Crossing Brooklyn Ferry

Whitman wrote in Specimen Days: "Living in Brooklyn or New York city my life. was curiously identified with Fulton ferry, already becoming the greatest of its sort in the world for general importance, volume, variety, rapidity, and picturesqueness. Almost daily ('50 to '60) I cross'd on the boats, often up in the pilot-houses where I could get a full sweep, absorbing shows, accompaniments, surroundings. What oceanic currents, eddies, underneaththe great tides of humanity also, with ever-shifting movements! Indeed, I have always had a passion for ferries: to me they afford inimitable, streaming, never-failing, living poems. The river and bay scenery, all about New York island, any time of a fine day—the hurrying, splashing sea-tides—the changing panorama of steamers, all sizes, often a string of big ones outward bound to distant ports —the myriads of white sail'd schooners, sloops, skiffs, and the marvellously beautiful yachts—the majestic Sound boats as they rounded the Battery and came along towards · 5, afternoon, eastward bound—the prospect off toward Staten Island, or down the Narrows, or the other way up the Hudson—what refreshment of spirit such sights and experiences gave me years ago (and many a time since)! My old pilot friends, the Balsirs, Johnny Cole, Ira Smith, William White, and my young ferry friend, Tom Gerehow well I remember them all!"

Flood-tide below me' I see you face to face!

Clouds of the west—sun there half an hour high—I see you also face to face

Crowds of men and women attired in the usual costumes, how curious you are to me!

On the ferry-boats the hundreds and hundreds that cross, returning home, are more curious to me rhan you suppose,

And you that shall cross from shore to shore years hence are more to me, and more in my meditations, than you might suppose

The impalpable sustenance of me from all things at all hours of the day,

The simple, compact, well-join'd scheme, myself disintegrated, every one disintegrated yet part of the scheme,

The similitudes of the past and those of the future,

The glories strung like beads on my smallest sights and hearings, on the walk in the street and the passage over the river,

The current rushing so swiftly and swimming with me far away,

The others that are to follow me, the ties between me and them.

The certainty of others, the life, love, sight, hearing of others

Others will enter the gates of the ferry and cross from shore to shore.

Others will watch the run of the flood-tide,

Others will see the shipping of Manhattan north and west, and the heights of Brooklyn to the south and east, Others will see the islands large and small,

Fifty years hence, others will see them as they cross, the sun half an hour high,

A hundred years hence, or ever so many hundred years hence, others will see them,

Will enjoy the sunset, the pouring-in of the flood-tide, the falling-back to the sea of the ebb-tide

It avails not, time nor place—distance avails not, 20 I am with you, you men and women of a generation, or ever so many generations hence,

Just as you feel when you look on the river and sky, so I felt,

Just as any of you is one of a living crowd, I was one of

Just as you are refresh'd by the gladness of the river and the bright flow, I was refresh'd,

Just as you stand and lean on the rail, yet hurry with the swift current, I stood yet was hurried,

Just as you look on the numberless masts of ships and the thick-stemm'd pipes of steamboats, I look'd

I too many and many a time closs'd the river of old,

Watched the Twelfth-month sea-gulls, saw them high in the air floating with motionless wings, oscillating their bodies.

Saw how the glistening yellow lit up parts of their bodies and left the rest in strong shadow.

Saw the slow-wheeling circles and the gradual edging toward the south, 30

Saw the reflection of the summer sky in the water,

Had my eyes dazzled by the shimmering track of beams, Look'd at the fine centrifugal spokes of light round the shape of my head in the sunlit water, Look'd on the haze on the hills southward and southwestward. Look'd on the vapor as it flew in fleeces tinged with violet.

Look'd toward the lower bay to notice the vessels arriv.

Saw their approach, saw aboard those that were near me.

Saw the white sails of schooners and sloops, saw the ships at anchor.

The sailors at work in the rigging or out astride the spars,

The round masts, the swinging motion of the hulls, the slender serpentine pennants,

The large and small steamers in motion, the pilots in their pilot-houses,

The white wake left by the passage, the quick tremulous whirl of the wheels,

The flags of all nations, the falling of them at sunset,

The scallop-edged waves in the twilight, the ladled cups, the frolicsome crests and glistening,

The stretch afar growing dimmer and dimmer, the gray walls of the granite storehouses by the docks,

On the river the shadowy group, the big steam-tug closely flank'd on each side by the barges, the hay-boat, the belated lighter,

On the neighboring shore the fires from the foundry chimneys burning high and glaringly into the night,

Casting their flicker of black contrasted with wild red and yellow light over the tops of houses, and down into the clefts of streets

These and all else were to me the same as they are to you,

I loved well those cities, loved well the stately and rapid river,

The men and women I saw were all near to me,

Others the same—others who look back on me because I look'd forward to them.

(The time will come, though I stop here to-day and to-night)

28 Twelfth-month. In the 1856 edition, Whitman wrote 'December he substituted Twelfth-month' in the edition of 1860 and retained in subsequent editions. His preference for so naming the months subudily attributed to the Quaker influence. * 46 hay-boat, boot fo transporting hoy (see Dictionary of American English)

What is it then between us?

What is the count of the scores or hundreds of years between us?

Whatever it is, it avails not—distance avails not, and place avails not,

I too lived, Brooklyn of ample hills was mine,

I too walk'd the streets of Manhattan Island, and bathed in the waters around it,

I too felt the curious abrupt questionings stir within me In the day among crowds of people sometimes they came upon me, 60

In my walks home late at night or as I lay in my bed they came upon me,

I too had been struck from the float forever held in solution,

I too had receiv'd identity by my body,

That I was I knew was of my body, and what I should be I knew I should be of my body

6

It is not upon you alone the dark patches fall,

The dark threw its patches down upon me also,

The best I had done seem d to me blank and suspicious,

My great thoughts as I supposed them, were they not in reality meagre?

Nor is it you alone who know what it is to be evil,

I am he who knew what it was to be evil,

I too knitted the old knot of contrariety,

Blabb'd, blush'd, resented, hed stole, grudg'd,

Had guile, anger, lust, hot wishes I dared not speak,

Was wayward, vain, greedy, shallow, sly, cowardly, malignant,

The wolf, the snake, the hog, not wanting in me,

The cheating look, the frivolous word, the adulterous wish, not wanting,

Retusals, hates, postponements, meanness, laziness, none of these wanting.

Was one with the rest, the days and haps of the rest,

Was call'd by my nighest name by clear loud voices of young men as they saw me approaching or passing,

Felt their arms on my neck as I stood, or the negligent leaning of their flesh against me as I sat

Saw many I loved in the street or ferry-boat or public assembly, yet never told them a word,

Lived the same life with the rest, the same old laughing, gnawing, sleeping,

Play'd the part that still looks back on the actor or actress, The same old role, the role that is what we make it, as great as we like,

Or as small as we like, or both great and small 7

Closer yet I approach you,

What thought you have of me now, I had as much of you

—I laid in my stores in advance,

I consider d long and seriously of you before you were boin

Who was to know what should come home to me?

Who knows but I am enjoying this?

Who knows, for all the distance, but I am as good as looking at you now, for all you cannot see me?

Ah, what can ever be more stately and admirable to me than mast-hemm'd Manhattan?

River and sunset and scallop-edg'd waves of flood-tide?

The sea-gulls oscillating their bodies, the hay-boat in the twilight, and the belated lighter?

What gods can exceed these that clasp me by the hand, and with voices I love call me promptly and loudly by my nighest name as I approach?

What is more subtle than this which ties me to the woman or man that looks in my face'

Which fuses me into you now, and pours my meaning into you?

We understand then do we not?

What I promis'd without mentioning it, have you not accepted?

What the study could not teach—what the preaching could not accomplish is accomplish'd, is it not? 100

9

Flow on, river! flow with the flood-tide, and ebb with the ebb-tide!

Frolic on, crested and scallop-edg'd waves!

⁷⁹ nighest, shortest

Gorgeous clouds of the sunset! drench with your splendor me, or the men and women generations after me!

Cross from shore to shore, countless crowds of passengers!
Stand up, tall masts of Mannahatta! stand up, beautiful hills of Brooklyn!

Throb, baffled and curious brain! throw out questions and answers!

Suspend here and everywhere, eternal float of solution!

Gaze, loving and thirsting eyes in the house or street or public assembly!

Sound out, voices of young men! loudly and musically call me by my nighest name!

Live, old life' play the part that looks back on the actor or actress'

Play the old role, the role that is great or small according as one makes it!

Consider, you who peruse me, whether I may not in unknown ways be looking upon you,

Be firm, rail over the river, to support those who lean idly, yet haste with the hasting current,

Fly on, sea-birds! fly sideways, or wheel in large circles high in the air,

Receive the summer sky, you water, and faithfully hold it till all downcast eyes have time to take it from you!

Diverge, fine spokes of light, from the shape of my head, or any one's head, in the sunlit water

Come on, ships from the lower bay! pass up or down, white-sail'd schooners, sloops, lighters!

Flaunt away, flags of all nations! be duly lower'd at

Burn high your fires, foundry chimneys! cast black shadows at nightfall! cast red and yellow light over the tops of the houses!

Appearances, now or henceforth, indicate what you are, 120 You necessary film, continue to envelop the soul,

About my body for me, and your body for you, be hung our divinest aromas,

Thrive, cities—bring your freight, bring your shows, ample and sufficient rivers,

Expand, being than which none else is perhaps more spiritual,

Keep your places, objects than which none else is more lasting

You have waited, you always wait, you dumb, beautiful ministers,

We receive you with free sense at last, and are insatiate henceforward,

Not you any more shall be able to foil us, or withhold yourselves from us,

We use you, and do not cast you aside—we plant you permanently within us,

We fathom you not—we love you—there is perfection in you also,

You furnish your parts toward eternity,

Great or small, you furnish your parts toward the soul 1856-188

Pioneers! O Pioneers!

"Pioneers! O Pioneers!" is the chief celebration in American poetry of the Westward movement. From the stand-point of sober fact, the poem romanticizes its subject too much those who remained in the older settlements were not necessarily more "gluttonous" (I 93) than those who moved forward, the pioneers seem now to have felled too many of the "primeval forests" (I 25), and mere "restlessness" (I 37) is not always a virtue. But Whitman's purpose was to celebrate, not criticize, and he caught admirably, in "Pioneers! O Pioneers!" the spirit and momentum of a mass movement which embraced large sections of Europe as well as the entire American continent

The student should read, in conjunction with Whitman's poem, Frederick Jackson Turner's "The Significance of the Frontier in American History" (1893)

Come my tan-faced children,

Follow well in order, get your weapons ready,

Have you your pistols? have you your sharp-edged axes?

Pioneers! O pioneers!

For we cannot tarry here,

We must march my darlings, we must bear the brunt of danger,

We the youthful sinewy races, all the rest on us depend,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

O vou youths, Western youths,

So impatient, full of action, full of manly pride and friendship,

Plain I see you Western youths, see you tramping with the foremost,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

Have the elder races halted?

Do they droop and end their lesson, wearied over there beyond the seas?

We take up the task eternal, and the burden and the lesson, Pioneers! O pioneers!

All the past we leave behind,

We debouch upon a newer mightier world, varied world, Fresh and strong the world we seize, world of labor and the march,

Pioneers! O pioneers! 20

We detachments steady throwing,

Down the edges, through the passes up the mountains steep,

Conquering, holding, daring, venturing as we go the unknown ways,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

We primeval forests felling,

We the rivers stemming, vexing we and piercing deep the mines within,

We the surface broad surveying, we the virgin soil upheaving,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

Colorado men are we,

From the peaks gigantic, from the great sierras and the high plateaus,

From the mine and from the gully, from the hunting trail we come,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

From Nebraska, from Arkansas,

Central inland race are we, from Missouri, with the continental blood intervein'd,

All the hands of comrades clasping, all the Southern, all the Northern,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

O resistless restless race!

O beloved race in all! O my breast aches with tender love for all!

O I mourn and yet exult, I am rapt with love for all,

Pioneers' O pioneers'

Raise the mighty mother mistress,

Waving high the delicate mistress, over all the starry mistress, (bend your heads all,)

Raise the fang'd and warlike mistress, stern, impassive, weapon'd mistress,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

See my children, resolute children,

By those swarms upon our rear we must never yield or falter,

Ages back in ghostly millions frowning there behind us urging,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

On and on the compact ranks,

With accessions ever waiting, with the places of the dead quickly fill'd,

Through the battle, through defeat, moving yet and never stopping,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

O to die advancing on!

Are there some of us to droop and die has the hour come?

Then upon the march we fittest die, soon and sure the gap is fill'd,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

All the pulses of the world,

Falling in they beat for us, with the Western movement beat,

Holding single or together, steady moving to the front, all for us,

Pioneers! O pioneers! 60

Life's involv'd and varied pageants,

All the forms and shows, all the workmen at their work,

²⁶ stemming, damming up • 26 vexing, shaking, disturbing

All the seamen and the landsmen, all the masters with their slaves,

Pioncers' O pioneers'

All the hapless silent lovers,

All the prisoners in the prisons, all the righteous and the wicked.

All the joyous, all the sorrowing, all the living, all the dying,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

I too with my soul and body,

We, a curious trio, picking, wandering on our way, 70 Through these shores amid the shadows, with the apparitions pressing,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

Lo, the darting bowling orb!

Lo, the brother orbs around all the clustering suns and planets,

All the dazzling days, all the mystic nights with dreams, Pioneers! O pioneers!

These are of us, they are with us,

All for primal needed work, while the followers there in embryo wait behind,

We to-day's procession heading, we the route for travel clearing,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

O you daughters of the West'

O you young and elder daughters! O you mothers and you wives!

Never must you be divided, in our ranks you move united, Pioneers' O pioneers'

Minstrels latent on the prairies!

(Shrouded bards of other lands, you may rest, you have done your work,)

Soon I hear you coming warbling, soon you rise and tramp amid us,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

Not for delectations sweet,

Not the cushion and the slipper, not the peaceful and the studious.

Not the riches safe and palling, not for us the tame en joyment,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

Do the feasters gluttonous feast?

Do the corpulent sleepers sleep? have they lock'd and bolted doors?

Still be ours the diet hard, and the blanker on the ground Pioneers! O pioneers!

Has the night descended?

Was the road of late so toilsome? did we stop discourage nodding on our way?

Yet a passing hour I yield you in your tracks to pau oblivious,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

Till with sound of trumpet,

Far, far off the daybreak call—hark! how loud and cle I hear it wind,

Swift! to the head of the army!—swift! spring to yo places.

Pioneers' O pioneers'

Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking

"'Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking' is certainly among the half-dozen finest of Whitman's longer poems, and one of the finest lyrics of the nineteenth century. The sea always moved Whitman, and more than any other physical fact lifted him above the world of assertions and opinions into that of imagination and vision." (John Bailey, Whitman, p. 165)

Out of the cradle endlessly rocking,

Out of the mocking-bird's throat, the musical shuttle,

Out of the Ninth-month midnight,

Over the sterile sands and the fields beyond, where the child leaving his bed wander'd alone, bareheaded barefoot.

Down from the shower'd halo,

_p from the mystic play of shadows twining and twisting as if they were alive.

Jut from the patches of briers and blackberries.

From the memories of the bird that chanted to me.

From your memories sad brother, from the fitful risings and fallings I heard.

From under that yellow half-moon late-risen and swollen as if with tears.

From those beginning notes of yearning and love there in the mist.

From the thousand responses of my heart never to

From the myriad thence-arous'd words,

From the word stronger and more delicious than any,

From such as now they start the scene revisiting,

As a flock, twittering, rising, or overhead passing,

Borne hither, ere all eludes me, hurriedly,

4 man, yet by these tears a little boy again,

Trowing myself on the sand, confronting the waves,

thanter of pains and joys, uniter of here and here-

Taking all hints to use them, but swiftly leaping beyond

A reminiscence sing

Once Paumanok.

When the lilac-scent was in the air and Fifth-month grass was growing.

I p this seashore in some briers,

Two feather'd guests from Alabama, two together,

And their nest, and four light-green eggs spotted with brown.

And every day the he-bird to and fro near at hand,

And every day the she-bird crouch'd on her nest, silent, with bright eyes,

And every day I, a curious boy, never too close, never 30 disturbing them,

Cutiously peering, absorbing, translating

Shane! shine! shine! Pour down your warmth, great sun! If hile we bask, we two together.

Tuo together!

Il ands blow south, or winds blow north. Day come white, or night come black, Home, or rivers and mountains from home, Singing all time, minding no time, While we two keep together.

Till of a sudden, May-be kill d, unknown to her mate. One forenoon the she-bird crouch'd not on the nest, Nor return'd that afternoon, nor the next, Nor ever appear'd again

And thenceforward all summer in the sound of the sea, And at night under the full of the moon in calmer weather. Over the hoarse surging of the sea.

Or flitting from brier to brier by day,

I saw, I heard at intervals the remaining one the he-bird, 50 The solitary guest from Alabama

Blow! blow! blow! Blow up sea-winds along Paumanok's shore; I wast and I wast till you blow my mate to me.

Yes, when the stars glisten'd, All night long on the prong of a moss-scallop'd stake, Down almost amid the slapping waves, Sat the lone singer wonderful causing tears He call'd on his mate, He pour'd forth the meanings which I of all men know. 60

Yes my brother I know,

The rest might not, but I have treasur'd every note, For more than once dimly down to the beach gliding, Silent, avoiding the moonbeams, blending myself with the shadows.

Recalling now the obscure shapes, the echoes, the sounds and sights after their sorts,

The white arms out in the breakers tirelessly tossing, I, with bare feet, a child, the wind wafting my hair, Listen'd long and long

Listen'd to keep, to sing, now translating the notes, Following you my brother

Soothe! soothe! soothe! Close on its wave soothes the wave behind.

23 Paumanok Whitman preferred to call Long Island by its Indian name

70

And again another behind embracing and lapping, every one close.

But my love soothes not me, not me.

Low hangs the moon, it rose late, It is lagging—O I think it is heavy with love, with love.

O madly the sea pushes upon the land, With love, with love.

O night! do I not see my love fluttering out among the

What is that little black thing I see there in the white? 80

Loud! loud! loud!

Loud I call to you, my love'
High and clear I shoot my voice over the waves,
Surely you must know who is here, is here,
You must know who I am, my love.

Low-hanging moon'

What is that dusky spot in your brown yellow?
O it is the shape, the shape of my mate!
O moon do not keep her from me any longer.

Land! land! O land!

Whichever way I turn, O I think you could give me my mate back again if you only would,

For I am almost sure I see her dimly whichever way I look.

O rising stars!

Perhaps the one I want so much will rise, will rise with some of you.

O throat! O trembling throat!

Sound clearer through the atmosphere!

Pierce the woods, the earth,

Somewhere listening to catch you must be the one I want

Shake out carols!

Solitary here, the night's carols!

Carols of lonesome love! death's carols!

Carols under that lagging, yellow, waning moon!

O under that moon where she droops almost down into the sea!

O reckless despairing carols.

But soft! sink low!

Soft! let me just murmur,

And do you wast a moment you husky-nois'd sea,

For somewhere I believe I heard my mate responding to me.

So faint, I must be still, be still to listen,

But not altogether still, for then she might not come immediately to me.

Hither my love!

Here I am! here!

With this just-sustain'd note I announce myself to you, This gentle call is for you my love, for you.

Do not be decoy'd elsewhere,

That is the whistle of the wind. it is not my voice, That is the fluttering, the fluttering of the spray, Those are the shadows of leaves.

O darkness! O in vain!

O I am very sick and sorrowful.

O brown halo in the sky near the moon, drooping upon the sea!

O troubled reflection in the sea!

O throat! O throbbing heart!

And I singing uselessly, uselessly all the night.

O past! O happy life! O songs of joy!

In the air, in the woods, over fields,

Loved! loved! loved! loved! loved!

But my mate no more, no more with me!

We two together no more.

The aria sinking,

100

All else continuing, the stars shining.

The winds blowing, the notes of the bird continuous echoing

With angry moans the fierce old mother incessanth moaning,

On the sands of Paumanok's shore gray and rustling.

The yellow half-moon enlarged, sagging down, drooping the face of the sea almost touching,

The boy ecstatic, with his bare feet the waves, with his hair the atmosphere dallying,

The love in the heart long pent, now loose, now at last tumultuously bursting, The aria's meaning, the ears, the soul, swiftly deposit-

The strange tears down the cheeks coursing.

The colloquy there, the trio, each uttering, 140

The undertone, the savage old mother incessantly crv-

To the boy's soul's questions sullenly timing, some drown'd secret hissing.

To the outsetting bard

Demon or bird! (said the boy's soul,) is it indeed toward your mate you sing? or is it really to me?

for I, that was a child, my tongue's use sleeping, now I have heard you.

Now in a moment I know what I am for, I awake, and already a thousand singers, a thousand songs, clearer, louder and more sorrowful than yours,

A thousand warbling echoes have started to life within me, never to die

O vou singer solitary, singing by yourself, projecting

I solitary me listening, never more shall I cease perpetu-

Never more shall I escape, never more the reverbera-

Never more the cries of unsatisfied love be absent from

Never again leave me to be the peaceful child I was before what there in the night,

By the sea under the yellow and sagging moon,

The messenger there arous'd, the fire, the sweet hell within.

The unknown want, the destiny of me.

O give me the clew! (it lurks in the night here some-

0 if I am to have so much, let me have more!

A word then, (for I will conquer it,)

The word final, superior to all,

Subtle, sent up-what is it?-I listen,

Are you whispering it, and have been all the time, you sea waves?

Is that it from your liquid rims and wet sands?

Whereto answering, the sea,

Delaying not, hurrying not,

Whisper'd me through the night, and very plainly before davbreak,

Lisp'd to me the low and delicious word death,

And again death, death, death, death,

Hissing melodious, neither like the bird nor like my arous'd child's heart,

But edging near as privately for me rustling at my feet, Creeping thence steadily up to my ears and laving me softly all over,

Death, death, death, death, death

Which I do not forget,

But fuse the song of my dusky demon and brother,

That he sang to me in the moonlight on Paumanok's gray

With the thousand responsive songs at random,

My own songs awakened from that hour,

And with them the key, the word up from the waves,

The word of the sweetest song and all songs, That strong and delicious word which, creeping to my

(Or like some old crone rocking the cradle, swathed in sweet garments, bending aside,)

The sea whisper'd me

When I Heard the Learn'd Astronomer

When I heard the learn'd astronomer.

When the proofs, the figures, were ranged in columns

When I was shown the charts and diagrams, to add, divide, and measure them,

When I sitting heard the astronomer where he lectured with much applause in the lecture-room,

How soon unaccountable I became tired and sick.

Till rising and gliding out I wander'd off by myself, In the mystical moist night-air, and from time to time,

Look'd up in perfect silence at the stars

First O Songs for a Prelude

This poem and seven poems which follow ("Beat! Beat! Drums!" "Cavalry Crossing a Ford," "Bivouac on a Mountain Side," "By the Bivouac's Fitful Flame," "Come Up from the Fields Father," "The Wound-Dresser," "Give Me the Splendid Silent Sun") were among the poems which first appeared in Drum-Taps in 1865 The poems of Drum-Taps were later incorporated in the inclusive work Leaves of Grass.

First O songs for a prelude,

Lightly strike on the stretch'd tympanum pride and joy in my city,

How she led the rest to arms, how she gave the cue,

How at once with lithe limbs unwaiting a moment she sprang,

(O superb! O Manhattan, my own, my pecrless!

O strongest you in the hour of danger, in crisis! O truer than steel!)

How you sprang—how you threw off the costumes of peace with indifferent hand,

How your soft opera-music changed, and the drum and fife were heard in their stead.

How you led to the war, (that shall serve for our prelude songs of soldiers,)

How Manhattan drum-taps led

Forty years had I in my city seen soldiers parading. Forty years as a pageant, till unawares the lady of this teeming and turbulent city.

Sleepless amid her ships, her houses, her incalculable wealth,

With her million children around her, suddenly, At dead of night, at news from the south, Incens'd struck with clinch'd hand the pavement

A shock electric, the night sustain'd it,

Till with ominous hum our hive at daybreak pour'd out its myriads

From the houses then and the workshops, and through all the doorways,

20

Leapt they tumultuous, and lo! Manhattan arming

To the drum-taps prompt,

The young men falling in and arming,

The mechanics arming, (the trowel, the jack-plane, the blacksmith's hammer, tost aside with precipitation.)

The lawyer leaving his office and arming, the judge leaving the court,

The driver deserting his wagon in the street, jumping down, throwing the reins abruptly down on the horses' backs,

The salesman leaving the store, the boss, book-keeper porter, all leaving,

Squads gather everywhere by common consent and arm The new recruits, even boys, the old men show them how to wear their accourtements, they buckle the straps carefully.

Outdoors arming, indoors arming, the flash of the mus ker-barrels.

The white tents cluster in camps, the arm d sentres around, the sunrise cannon and again at sunset, $$\infty $$

Arm'd regiments arrive every day, pass through the city, and embark from the wharves,

(How good they look as they tramp down to the river, sweaty, with their guns on their shoulders!

How I love them' how I could hug them, with their brown faces and their clothes and knapsacks cover'd with dust')

The blood of the city up—arm'd! arm'd! the cry ever where,

The flags flung out from the steeples of churches and from all the public buildings and stores.

The tearful parting, the mother kisses her son, the son kisses his mother,

(Loth is the mother to part, yet not a word does she speak to detain him.)

The tumultuous escort, the ranks of policemen preceding, clearing the way,

The unpent enthusiasm, the wild cheers of the crowd for their favorites.

The artillery, the silent cannons bright as gold, drawn along, rumble lightly over the stones, (Silent cannons, soon to cease your silence,

Soon unlimber'd to begin the red business;)

All the mutter of preparation, all the determin'd arming.

⁴² unlimber'd, detached from the limber or forepart of a gun car riage, and so made ready for firing

The hospital service, the lint, bandages and medicines, The women volunteering for nurses, the work begun for in earnest, no mere parade now;

War! an arm'd race is advancing! the welcome for battle, no turning away;

War! be it weeks, months, or years, an arm'd race is advancing to welcome it.

Mannahatta a-march—and it's O to sing it well! It's O for a manly life in the camp.

And the sturdy artillery,

The guns bright as gold, the work for giants, to serve well the guns, Unlimber them! (no more as the past forty years for salute or courtesies merely,

Put in something now besides powder and wadding) And you lady of ships, you Mannahatta,

Old matron of this proud, friendly, turbulent city,

Otten in peace and wealth you were pensive or covertly frown'd amid all your children,

But now you smile with joy exulting old Mannahatta 1865-1867

Beat! Beat! Drums!

Beat' beat' drums'-blow! bugles' blow!

Through the windows—through doors—burst like a ruthless force.

Into the solemn church, and scatter the congregation, Into the school where the scholar is studying, leave not the bridegroom quiet—no happiness must he have now with his bride,

Nor the peaceful farmer any peace, ploughing his field or gathering his grain, 50 fierce you whirr and pound you drums—so shrill you bugles blow.

Beat! beat! drums!-blow! bugles! blow!

Over the traffic of cities—over the rumble of wheels in the streets,

Are beds prepared for sleepers at night in the houses? no sleepers must sleep in those beds,

No bargainers' bargains by day—no brokers or speculators—would they continue?

Would the talkers be talking? would the singer attempt to sing?

Would the lawyer rise in the court to state his case before the judge?

Then rattle quicker, heavier drums—you bugles wilder blow

Beat' beat' drums!-blow! bugles! blow!

Make no parley-stop for no expostulation,

Mind not the timid-mind not the weeper or prayer,

Mind not the old man beseeching the young man,

Let not the child's voice be heard, nor the mother's entreaties,

Make even the trestles to shake the dead where they lie awaiting hearses,

So strong you thump O terrible drums—so loud you bugles blow.

Cavalry Crossing a Ford

A line in long array where they wind betwixt green islands.

They take a serpentine course, their arms flash in the sun—hark to the musical clank,

Behold the silvery river, in it the splashing horses loitering stop to drink,

Behold the brown-faced men, each group, each person a picture, the negligent rest on the saddles,

Some emerge on the opposite bank, others are just entering the ford—while,

Scarlet and blue and snowy white,

The guidon flags flutter gayly in the wind

Bivouac on a Mountain Side

I see before me now a traveling army halting, Below a fertile valley spread, with barns and the orchards of summer, Behind, the terraced sides of a mountain, abrupt, in places rising high.

Broken, with rocks, with clinging cedars, with tall shapes dingily seen,

The numerous camp-fires scatter'd near and far, some away up on the mountain,

The shadowy forms of men and horses, looming, largesized, flickering,

And over all the sky—the sky! far, far out of reach, studded, breaking out, the eternal stars

By the Bivouac's Fitful Flame

By the bivouac's fitful flame,

A procession winding around me, solemn and sweet and slow—but first I note,

The tents of the sleeping army, the fields' and woods' dim outline.

The darkness lit by spots of kindled fire, the silence,

Like a phantom far or near an occasional figure moving. The shrubs and trees, (as I lift my eyes they seem to be stealthily watching me.)

While wind in procession thoughts, O tender and wondrous thoughts,

Of life and death, of home and the past and loved, and of those that are far away,

A solemn and slow procession there as I sit on the ground, By the bivouac's fitful flame

Come Up from the Fields Futher

Come up from the fields father, here's a letter from our Pete.

And come to the front door mother, here's a letter from thy dear son

Lo, 'tis autumn

Lo, where the trees, deeper green, yellower and redder,

Cool and sweeten Ohio's villages with leaves fluttering in the moderate wind,

Where apples ripe in the orchards hang and grapes on the trellis'd vines, (Smell you the smell of the grapes on the vines?

Smell you the buckwheat where the bees were lately buzzing?)

Above all, lo, the sky so calm, so transparent after the rain, and with wondrous clouds,

Below too, all calm, all vital and beautiful, and the farm prospers well

Down in the fields all prospers well,

But now from the fields come father, come at the daughter's call,

And come to the entry mother, to the front door come right away

Fast as she can she hurries, something ominous, her steps trembling,

She does not tarry to smooth her hair nor adjust her cap

Open the envelope quickly,

O this is not our son's writing, yet his name is sign'd,

O a strange hand writes for our dear son, O stricken mother's soul!

All swims before her eyes, flashes with black, she catches the main words only,

Sentences broken, gunshot wound in the breast, cavalry skirmish, taken to hospital,

At present low, but will soon be better.

Ah now the single figure to me,

Amid all teeming and wealthy Ohio with all its cities and farms,

Sickly white in the face and dull in the head, very faint,

By the jamb of a door leans

Grieve not so, dear mother, (the just-grown daughter speaks through her sobs,

The little sisters huddle around speechless and dismay'd,)

See, dearest mother, the letter says Pete will soon be better.

Alas poor boy, he will never be better, (nor may-be needs to be better, that brave and simple soul,)

While they stand at home at the door he is dead already,

The only son is dead

But the mother needs to be better,

She with thin form presently drest in black,

By day her meals untouch'd, then at night fitfully sleeping, often waking,

In the midnight waking weeping longing with one deep longing,

O that she might withdraw unnoticed, silent from life escape and withdraw,

To follow, to seek, to be with her dear dead son.

The Wound-Dresser

1

An old man bending I come among new faces,

Years looking backward resuming in answer to children,

Come tell us old man, as from young men and maidens that love me, (Arous'd and angry, I'd thought to beat the alarum and urge relentless war,

But soon my fingers fail'd me, my face droop'd and I resign'd myself,

To sit by the wounded and soothe them, or silently watch the dead,)

Years hence of these scenes, of these furious passions, these chances,

Of unsurpass'd heroes, (was one side so brave' the other was equally brave,)

Now be witness again, paint the mightiest armies of earth,

Ot those armies so rapid so wondrous what saw you to tell us?

What stays with you latest and deepest? of curious panics,

Of hard-fought engagements or sieges tremendous what deepest remains?

2

O maidens and young men I love and that love me,

What you ask of my days those the strangest and sudden your talking recalls,

Soldier alert I arrive after a long march cover'd with sweat and dust,

In the nick of time I come, plunge in the fight, loudly shout in the rush of successful charge,

Enter the captur'd works—yet lo, like a swift-running river they fade,

Pass and are gone they fade—I dwell not on soldiers' perils or soldiers' joys,

(Both I remember well—many of the hardships, few the joys, yet I was content)

But in silence, in dreams' projections,

While the world of gain and appearance and mirth goes on,

So soon what is over forgotten, and waves wash the imprints off the sand,

With hinged knees returning 1 enter the doors, (while for you up there, Whoever you are, follow without noise and be of strong heart)

Bearing the bandages, water and sponge,

Straight and swift to my wounded I go,

Where they lie on the ground after the battle brought in.

Where their priceless blood reddens the grass the ground,

Or to the rows of the hospital tent, or under the roof'd hospital,

To the long rows of cots up and down each side I return,

To each and all one after another I draw near, not one do I miss,

An attendant follows holding a tray, he carries a refuse pail,

Soon to be fill'd with clotted rags and blood, emptied, and fill'd again

I onward go, I stop,

With hinged knees and steady hand to dress wounds, I am firm with each, the pangs are sharp yet unavoidable,

One turns to me his appealing eyes—poor boy' I never knew you,

Yet I think I could not refuse this moment to die for you, if that would save you

3

On, on I go, (open doors of time! open hospital doors!)

The crush'd head I dress, (poor crazed hand tear not the bandage away.)

The neck of the cavalry-man with the bullet through and through I examine,

Hard the breathing rattles, quite glazed already the eye, yer life struggles hard,

(Come sweet death! be persuaded O beautiful death! In mercy come quickly)

From the stump of the arm, the amputated hand,

I undo the clotted lint, remove the slough, wash off the matter and blood,

Back on his pillow the soldier bends with curv'd neck and side falling head,

His eyes are closed, his face is pale, he dares not look on the bloody stump,

And has not yet look'd on it

I dress a wound in the side, deep, deep,

But a day or two more, for see the frame all wasted and sinking,

And the yellow-blue countenance see

I dress the perforated shoulder, the foot with the bullet-wound,

Cleanse the one with a gnawing and putrid gangrene, so sickening so offensive,

While the attendant stands behind aside me holding the tray and pail

I am faithful, I do not give out,

The fractured thigh, the knee, the wound in the abdomen,

These and more I dress with impassive hand, (yet deep in my breast a fire, a burning flame)

4

Thus in silence in dreams' projections,

Returning, resuming, I thread my way through the hospitals,

The hurt and wounded I pacify with soothing hand,

I sit by the restless all the dark night, some are so young.

Some suffer so much, I recall the experience sweet and sad.

(Many a soldier's loving arms about this neck have cross'd and rested,

Many a soldier's kiss dwells on these bearded lips)

Give Me the Splendid Silent Sun

1

Give me the splendid silent sun with all his beams full-dazzling,

Give me juicy autumnal fruit ripe and ied from the orchard.

Give me a field where the unmow'd grass grows,

Give me an arbor, give me the trellis d grape,

Give me fresh corn and wheat, give me serenemoving animals teaching content,

Give me nights perfectly quiet as on high plateaus west of the Mississippi, and I looking up at the stars,

Give me odorous at sunrise a garden of beautiful flowers where I can walk undisturb'd,

Give me for marriage a sweet-breath'd woman of whom I should never tire.

Give me a perfect child, give me away aside from the noise of the world a rural domestic life

Give me to warble spontaneous songs recluse by myself, for my own ears only.

Give me solitude, give me Nature, give me again O Nature your primal sanities!

These demanding to have them, (tired with ceaseless excitement, and rack'd by the war-strife,)

These to procure incessantly asking, rising in cries from my heart,

While yet incessantly asking still I adhere to my city, Day upon day and year upon year O city, walking your streets,

Where you hold me enchain'd a certain time refusing to give me up,

210 Whatman

- het giving to make me glutted, enrich'd of soul, you give me forever faces:
- () I see what I sought to escape, confronting, reversing

(see my own soul trampling down what it ask'd for.)

Keep your splendid silent sun,

Keep your woods O Nature, and the quiet places by the

Keep your fields of clover and timothy, and your cornfields and orchards.

Keep the blossoming buckwheat fields where the Ninth month bees hum,

Give me faces and streets—give me these phantoms incessant and endless along the trottoirs!

Give me interminable eyes—give me women—give me comrades and lovers by the thousand!

Let me see new ones every day-let me hold new ones by the hand every day!

(ave me such shows-give me the streets of Manhat tan!

Give me Broadway, with the soldiers marching-give me the sound of the trumpets and drums!

The soldiers in companies or regiments—some starting away, flush'd and reckless

Some, their time up, returning with thinn'd ranks, young, yet very old, worn, marching, noticing nothing,) 30 Cove me the shores and wharves heavy-fringed with black ships!

O such for me' O an intense life, tull to repletion and

The life of the theatre, bar-room, huge hotel, for met The saloon of the steamer! the crowded excursion for me! the torchlight procession!

The dense brigade bound for the war, with high piled military wagons following

People, endless, streaming, with strong voices, passions, pageants,

Manhattan streets with their powerful throbs, with beating drums as now

The endless and noisy chorus, the rustle and clink of muskets, (even the sight of the wounded,)

Manhattan crowds, with their turbulent musical chorus' Manhattan faces and eyes forever for me

When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd

Though Lincoln is not mentioned by name in "When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd," his death in April 1865 was the occasion of its composition. It is, by common consent, the greatest of the many poems about Lincoln in American literature, and in the judgment of John Bailey, perhaps the most judicious of Whitman's critics, the lyric within the poem (beginning "Come lovely and soothing death") is "one of the great lyrics of the world." The poem was first printed in Sequel to Drum-Taps in 1865

Whitman and Lincoln never met formally or talked together, though Whitman wrote in Specimen Days for August 12, 1863 "I see the President almost every day, as I happen to live where he passes to and from his . We have got so that we exlodgings out of town change bows, and very cordial ones. And the story is related (in Bucke's Life of Whitman) that Lincoln, seeing Whitman walk by the White House, asked who he was, and upon being told, said 'Well, he looks like a man."

"Of all the days of the war," Whitman recorded in Specimen Days, "there are two especially I can never forget Those were the day following the news, in New York and Brooklyn, of that first Bull Run defeat, and the day of Abraham Lincoln's death. I was home in Brooklyn on both occasions. The day of the murder we heard the news very early in the morning Mother prepared breakfast -and other meals afterward—as usual; but not a mouthful was eaten all day by either of us. We each drank half a cup of coffee, that was all Little was said We got every newspaper morning and evening, and the frequent extras of that period, and pass'd them silently to each other "

When lilacs last in the dooryard bloom'd,

And the great star early droop'd in the western sky in the night,

24 trottoirs, a French word meaning sidewalks one of many amusing examples of Whitman's foridness for foreign words, despite his assertion in the Preface of the grand sufficiency of the English language I mourn'd, and yet shall mourn with ever-returning spring

Ever-returning spring, trinity sure to me you bring, Lilac blooming perennial and drooping star in the west.

And thought of him I love

2

O powerful western fallen star!

O shades of night-O moody, tearful night!

O great star disappear'd—O the black murk that hides the star!

O cruel hands that hold me powerless—O helpless soul of me¹

O harsh surrounding cloud that will not free my soul

3

In the dooryard fronting an old farm-house near the whitewash'd palings,

Stands the lilac-bush tall-growing with heart-shaped leaves of rich green,

With many a pointed blossom rising delicate, with the perfume strong I love,

With every leaf a miracle—and from this bush in the doorward.

With delicate-color d blossoms and heart-shaped leaves of rich green,

A sprig with its flower I break

In the swamp in secluded recesses,

A shy and hidden bird is warbling a song

Solitary the thrush,

The hermit withdrawn to himself, avoiding the settlements.

Sings by himself a song

Song of the bleeding throat,

Death's outlet song of life, (for well dear brother I know, If thou wast not granted to sing thou would'st surely die)

5

Over the breast of the spring, the land, amid cities,

Amid lanes and through old woods, where lately the violets peep'd from the ground, spotting the gray debris, Amid the grass in the fields each side of the lanes passing the endless grass,

Passing the yellow-spear'd wheat, every grain from its shroud in the dark-brown fields uprisen,

Passing the apple-tree blows of white and pink in the orchards.

Carrying a corpse to where it shall rest in the grave, Night and day journeys a coffin

6

Coffin that passes through lanes and streets,

Through day and night with the great cloud darkening the land.

With the pomp of the inloop'd flags with the cities draped in black.

With the show of the States themselves as of crapeveil'd women standing,

With processions long and winding and the flambeaus of the night.

With the countless torches lit, with the silent sea of faces and the unbared heads.

With the waiting depot, the arriving coffin, and the sombre faces.

With dirges through the night, with the thousand voices rising strong and solemn,

With all the mournful voices of the dirges pour'd around the coffin,

The dim-lit churches and the shuddering organs where amid these you journey,

With the tolling tolling bells' perpetual clang,

Here, coffin that slowly passes,

I give you my sprig of lilac

7

(Nor for you, for one alone,

Blossoms and branches green to coffins all I bring, For fresh as the morning, thus would I chant a song for you

O sane and sacred death

All over bouquets of roses,

50

O death, I cover you over with roses and early lilies, But mostly and now the lilac that blooms the first,

Copious I break, I break the sprigs from the bushes,

30 blows, blossoms • 32 journeys a coffin. The funeral train crossed the continent to Springfield, Illinois, where Lincoln was buried

With loaded arms I come, pouring for you, For you and the coffins all of you O death)

8

O western orb sailing the heaven,

Now I know what you must have meant as a month since I walk'd,

As I walk'd in silence the transparent shadowy night,

As I saw you had something to tell as you bent to me night after night,

As you droop d from the sky low down as if to my side, (while the other stars all look'd on.)

As we wander'd together the solemn night, (for something I know not what kept me from sleep,)

As the night advanced, and I saw on the rim of the west how full you were of woe,

As I stood on the rising ground in the breeze in the cool transparent night,

As I watch'd where you pass'd and was lost in the netherward black of the night,

As my soul in its trouble dissatisfied sank, as where you sad orb,

Concluded, dropt in the night, and was gone

9

Sing on there in the swamp,

O singer bashful and tender, I hear your notes, I hear your call,

I hear, I come presently, I understand you,

But a moment I linger, for the lustrous star has detain'd me,

The star my departing comrade holds and detains me

10

O how shall I warble myself for the dead one there I loved?

And how shall I deck my song for the ${\rm larg} \epsilon$ sweet soul that has gone?

And what shall my perfume be for the grave of him I love?

Sea-winds blown from east and west,

Blown from the Eastern sea and blown from the Western sea, till there on the prairies meeting,

These and with these and the breath of my chant, I ll perfume the grave of him I love.

11

O what shall I hang on the chamber walls?

And what shall the pictures be that I hang on the walls,

To adorn the burial-house of him I love?

Pictures of growing spring and farms and homes,

With the Fourth-month eve at sundown, and the gray smoke lucid and bright.

With floods of the yellow gold of the gorgeous, indolent, sinking sun, burning, expanding the air,

With the fresh sweet herbage under foot, and the pale green leaves of the trees prolific,

In the distance the flowing glaze, the breast of the river, with a wind-dapple here and there,

With ranging hills on the banks, with many a line against the sky, and shadows,

And the city at hand with dwellings so dense, and stacks of chimneys,

And all the scenes of life and the workshops, and the workmen homeward returning

12

Lo, body and soul—this land,

90

213

My own Manhattan with spires, and the sparkling and hurrying tides, and the ships,

The varied and ample land, the South and the North in the light, Ohio's shores and flashing Missouri,

And ever the far-spreading prairies cover'd with grass and corn

Lo, the most excellent sun so calm and haughty,

The violet and purple morn with just-felt breezes,

The gentle soft-born measureless light,

The miracle spreading bathing all, the fulfill'd noon,

The coming eve delicious, the welcome night and the stars,

Over my cities shining all, enveloping man and land

13

Sing on, sing on you gray-brown bird,

Sing from the swamps, the recesses, pour your chant from the bushes,

Limitless out of the dusk, out of the cedars and pines.

Sing on dearest brother, warble your reedy song, Loud human song, with voice of uttermost woe O liquid and free and tender!

O wild and loose to my soul-O wondrous singer!

You only I hear—yet the star holds me, (but will soon depart,)

Yet the lilac with mastering odor holds me.

14

Now while I sat in the day and look'd forth,

In the close of the day with its light and the fields of spring, and the farmers preparing their crops, 110

In the large unconscious scenery of my land with its lakes and forests,

In the heavenly aerial beauty, (after the perturb'd winds and the storms,)

Under the arching heavens of the afternoon swift passing, and the voices of children and women,

The many-moving sea-tides, and I saw the ships how they sail'd,

And the summer approaching with richness, and the fields all busy with labor,

And the infinite separate houses, how they all went on, each with its meals and minutia of daily usages,

And the streets how their throbbings throbb'd, and the cities pent—lo, then and there,

Falling upon them all and among them all, enveloping me with the rest.

Appear'd the cloud, appear'd the long black trail,

And I knew death, its thought, and the sacred knowledge of death

Then with the knowledge of death as walking one side

And the thought of death close-walking the other side of me.

And I in the middle as with companions, and as holding the hands of companions,

I fled forth to the hiding receiving night that talks not, Down to the shores of the water, the path by the swamp in the dimness

To the solemn shadowy cedars and ghostly pines so still

And the singer so shy to the rest received me,

The gray-brown bird I know receiv'd us comrades three And he sang the carol of death, and a verse for him I love

From deep secluded recesses,

From the fragrant cedars and the ghostly pines so still, Came the carol of the bird

And the charm of the carol rapt me,

As I held as if by their hands my comrades in the night, And the voice of my spirit tallied the song of the bird

Come lovely and soothing death,

Undulate round the world, serenely arriving, arriving, In the day, in the night, to all, to each,

Sooner or later delicate death

Prais'd be the fathomless universe,

For life and joy, and for objects and knowledge curious, And for love, sweet love—but praise! praise! praise! For the sure-enuinding arms of cool-enfolding death

Dark mother always gliding near with soft feet,

Have none chanted for thee a chant of fullest welcome. Then I chant it for thee, I glorify thee above all.

I bring thee a song that when thou must indeed come, come unfalteringly.

Approach strong deliterers,

When it is so, when thou hast taken them I joyously sine the dead.

150

Lost in the loving floating ocean of thee

From me to thee glad serenades.

Dances for thee I propose saluting thee, adoruments and feastings for thee,

And the sights of the open landscape and the high-spread sky are fitting,

And life and the fields, and the huge and thoughtful night

The night in silence under many a star,

The ocean shore and the busky whispering wave whose voice I know.

And the soul turning to thee O vast and well-veil'd deat!

And the body gratefully nestling close to thee

Over the tree-tops I float thee a song.

Over the rising and sinking waves, over the myriad fields and the prairies wide,

O: er the dense-pack'd esties all and the teeming wharves

I float this carol with joy, with joy to thee O death.

15

To the tally of my soul,

Loud and strong kept up the gray-brown bird, With pure deliberate notes spreading filling the night loud in the pines and cedars dim,

Clear in the freshness moist and the swamp-perfume, And I with my comrades there in the night

While my sight that was bound in my eyes unclosed. 170
As to long panoramas of visions

And I saw askant the armies,

I saw as in noiseless dreams hundreds of battle-flags,

Borne through the smoke of the battles and pierc'd with missiles I saw them

And carried hither and yon through the smoke, and torn and bloody,

And at last but a few shreds left on the staffs. (and all in silence,)

And the staffs all splinter'd and broken

Passing the visions, passing the night,

Passing, unloosing the hold of my comrades' hands,

Passing the song of the hermit bird and the tallying song of my soul,

Victorious song, death's outlet song, yet varying everaltering song.

As low and wailing, yet clear the notes, rising and falling, flooding the night,

Sadly sinking and fainting, as warning and warning, and yet again bursting with joy.

Covering the earth and filling the spread of the heaven, As that powerful psalm in the night I heard from recesses.

Passing I leave thee lilac with heart-shaped leaves,

I leave thee there in the door-yard, blooming, returning with spring

I cease from my song for thee,

From my gaze on thee in the west, fronting the west, communing with thee,

O comtade lustrous with silver face in the night

Yet each to keep and all, retrievements out of the night,

The seng, the wondrous chant of the gray-brown bird,

And the tallying chant, the echo arous'd in my soul,

With the lustrous and drooping star with the countenance full of woe,

With the holders holding my hand nearing the call of the bird,

Comrades mine and I in the midst, and their memory ever to keep, for the dead I loved so well,

For the sweetest, wisest soul of all my days and lands—and this for his dear sake,

Lilac and star and bird twined with the chant of my soul.

There in the fragrant pines and the cedars dusk and dim 1865-1881

There Was a Child Went Forth

There was a child went forth every day,

And the first object he look'd upon, that object he became,

And that object became part of him for the day or a certain part of the day

Or for many years or stretching cycles of years.

The early lilacs became part of this child,

And grass and white and red morning-glories, and white and red clover, and the song of the phœbe-bird,

- And the Third-month lambs and the sows pink-faint litter, and the mare's foal and the cow's calf,
- And the noisy brood of the barnyard or by the mire of the pond-side,
- And the fish suspending themselves so curiously below there, and the beautiful curious liquid,
- And the water-plants with their graceful flat heads, all became part of him
- The field-sprouts of Fourth-month and Fifth-month became part of him,
- Winter-grain sprouts and those of the light-yellow corn, and the esculent roots of the girden,
- And the apple-trees cover'd with blossoms and the fruit afterward, and wood-berries, and the commonest weeds by the road,
- And the old drunkard staggering home from the outhouse of the tavern whence he had lately risen,
- And the schoolmistress that pass d on her way to the school,
- And the friendly boys that pass d, and the quarrelsome boys, And the tidy and fresh-cheek d girls, and the barefoot Negro boy and girl,
- And all the changes of city and country wherever he went
- His own parents, he that had father d him and she that had conceived him in her womb and birth d him,
- They gave this child more of themselves than that,
- They gave him afterward every day, they became part of him
- The mother at home quietly placing the dishes on the supper-table,
- The mother with mild words clean her cap and gown, a wholesome odor falling off her person and clothes as she walks by,
- The father, strong, self-sufficient, manly, mean, anger d, unjust,
- The blow, the quick loud word, the tight bargun, the crafty lure,
- The family usages, the language, the company the furniture, the yearning and swelling heart,
- Affection that will not be gainsay d, the sense of what is real, the thought if after all it should prove unreal
- The doubts of day-time and the doubts of night-time, the curious whether and how,

- Whether that which appears so is so, or is it all flasnes and specks?
- Men and women crowding fast in the streets, if they are not flashes and specks what are they?
- The streets themselves and the façades of houses, and goods in the windows,
- Vehicles, teams, the heavy-plank'd wharves, the huge crossing at the ferries,
- The village on the highland seen from afar at sunset, the river between.
- Shadows, aureola and mist, the light falling on roofs and gables of white or brown two miles off.
- The schooner near by sleepily dropping down the tide the little boat slack-tow'd astern.
- The hurrying tumbling waves, quick-broken crests, slap ping.
- The strata of color'd clouds, the long bar of maroontint away solitary by itself, the spread of purity it lies motionless in.
- The horizon's edge, the flying sea-crow, the fragrance of salt marsh and shore mud
- These became part of that child who went forth every day and who now goes and will always go forth every day

Miracle

"Romanticism is mony-sided, but one of its chief aspects in nincteenth-century poetry was described by Theodore Watts-Dunton, the friend of Swinburne, as "the renascence of wonder." Wordsworth's purpose, according to Coleridge, was to direct the attention to "the loveliness and the wonders of the world before us, an inexhaustible treasure, but for which, in consequence of the film of familiarity and selfish solicitude, we have eyes, yet see not, ears that hear not, and hearts that neither feel nor understand." Similarly, Emerson (in "Woodnotes") characterized the poet as "Wonderer at all he meets." In 'Miracles' and in countless other places in his writings Whitman expresses this distinctively romantic view of the world

Why, who makes much of a miracle?

As to me I know of nothing else but miracles,

Whether I walk the streets of Manhattan,

Or dart my sight over the roofs of houses toward the sky.

Or wade with naked feet along the beach just in the edge of the water,

Or stand under trees in the woods,

Or talk by day with any one I love, or sleep in the bed at night with any one I love,

Or sit at table at dinner with the rest,

Or look at strangers opposite me riding in the car,

 $\ensuremath{\text{O}_{\text{T}}}$ watch honey-bees busy around the hive of a summer forenoon,

Or animals feeding in the fields,

Or birds, or the wonderfulness of insects in the air,

Or the wonderfulness of the sundown, or of stars shining so quiet and bright,

Or the exquisite delicate thin curve of the new moon in spring,

These with the rest, one and all, are to me miracles, The whole referring, yet each distinct and in its place.

To me every hour of the light and dark is a miracle, Every cubic inch of space is a miracle,

Every square yard of the surface of the earth is spread with the same,

Every foot of the interior swarms with the same

To me the sea is a continual miracle,

The fishes that swim—the rocks—the motion of the waves—the ships with men in them,

What stranger miracles are there?

Passage to India

Passage to India" is the most transcendental of Whitman's poems, the most notable expression of mysticism in his writings. He begins by celebrating the physical explorations of man Columbus, in discovering America, was seeking a water-route to India The completion of the American transcontinental railroad, the Atlantic cable, and the Suez Canal had accomplished the "rondure" of the earth and brought India nearer to the Western world. But these physical voyages and explorations are mere symbols, in man's development, of spiritual voyages and explorations. Since Oriental religious thought, preeminently, has been concerned with the problem of spiritual reality, "Passage to India" suggests the soul's confronting of the "aged fierce enigmas". The solution of these enigmas becomes possible only in the mystic union of the soul with God.

. . . the Elder Brother found,

The Younger melts in fondness in his arms
In the end the soul achieves "passage to more than India," perhaps in a double sense to more than a physical India, and to a spiritual realization which transcends even the highest teachings of the Brahmins

The poem recalls Emerson's and Thoreau's interest in the Oriental scriptures

Singing my days,

Singing the great achievements of the present, Singing the strong light works of engineers.

Our modern wonders, (the antique ponderous Seven outvied,)

In the Old World the east the Suez canal,

The New by its mighty railroad spann'd,

The seas inlaid with eloquent gentle wires,

Yet first to sound, and ever sound, the cry with thee O soul,

The Past' the Past' the Past'

The Past—the dark unfathom'd retrospect!
The teeming gulf—the sleepers and the shadows!

Passage O soul to India! Eclaircise the myths Asiatic, the primitive fables

Not you alone proud truths of the world,
Nor you alone ye facts of modern science,
But myths and fables of eld, Asia's, Africa's fables,
The far-darting beams of the spirit, the unloos'd dreams,
The deep diving bibles and legends,
The daring plots of the poets, the elder religions,

O you temples fairer than lilies pour'd over by the rising sun!

O you fables spurning the known, cluding the hold of the known, mounting to heaven!

You lofty and dazzling towers, pinnacled, red as roses, burnish'd with gold!

Towers of fables immortal fashion d from mortal dreams! You too I welcome and fully the same as the rest! You too with joy I sing

Passage to India!

Lo, soul, seest thou not God's purpose from the first? The earth to be spann'd, connected by network. The races, neighbors, to marry and be given in marriage, The oceans to be cross d the distant brought near. The lands to be welded together.

A worship new I sing,
You captains, voyagers, explorers, yours,
You engineers, you architects, machinists, yours
You, not for trade or transportation only,
But in God's name, and for thy sake O soul

Passage to India!

Lo soul for thee of tableaus twain

I see in one the Suez canal initiated, open'd.

I see the procession of steamships, the Empress Eugenie's leading the van,

- I mark from on deck the strange landscape, the pure sky, the level sand in the distance,
- I pass swiftly the picturesque groups, the workmen gather'd,

The gigantic dredging machines

In one again, different, (yet thine, all thine. O soul, the same,)

I see over my own continent the Pacific railroad sur mounting every barrier,

I see continual trains of cars winding along the Platte carrying freight and passengers,

I hear the locomotives rushing and roaring, and the shrill steam-whistle,

I hear the echoes reverberate through the grandess scenery in the world,

I cross the Laramie plains, I note the rocks in grotesque shapes, the buttes,

I see the plentiful larkspur and wild onions, the barren colorless, sage-deserts,

I see in glimpses afar or towering immediately above me the great mountains. I see the Wind river and the Wahsatch mountains.

I see the Monument mountain and the Eagle's Nest, I pass the Promontory, I ascend the Nevadas,

I scan the noble Elk mountain and wind around its base I see the Humboldt range, I thread the valley and cross the river,

I see the clear waters of lake Tahoe, I see forests of majestic pines

Or crossing the great desert, the alkaline plains, I behold enchanting mirages of waters and meadows,

Marking through these and after all, in duplicate slender lines

Bridging the three or four thousand miles of land travel Tving the Fastern to the Western sea,

The road between Europe and Asia

Waitest not haply for us somewhere there the Comrade perfect?)

Thou pulse—thou motive of the stars, suns, systems,

That, circling, move in order, safe, harmonious,

Athwart the shapeless vastnesses of space,

How should I think, how breathe a single breath, how speak, if, out of myself,

I could not launch, to those, superior universes?

Swiftly I shrivel at the thought of God,

At Nature and its wonders, Time and Space and Death, But that I, turning, call to thee O soul, thou actual Me And lo, thou gently masterest the orbs,

Thou matest Time, smilest content at Death,

And fillest, swellest full the vastnesses of Space.

Greater than stars or suns,

Bounding O soul thou journeyest forth;

What love than thine and ours could wider amplify?
What aspirations, wishes, outvie thine and ours O soul?
What decrease of the ideal? what place of parity perfect

What dreams of the ideal? what plans of purity, perfection, strength,

What cheerful willingness for others' sake to give up all? For others' sake to suffer all?

Thou Mother with Thy Equal Brood

This poem was read by Whitman at the commencement of Dartmouth College, June 26, 1872. As read on that occasion, the poem began with what is now Section 2 and was known by the title "As a Strong Bird on Pinions Free" Section 1 was added in the 1881 edition

In a Preface to the poem, Whitman wrote "The Four Years' War is over—and in the peaceful, strong, exciting, fresh occasions of today, and of the future, that strange, sad war is hurrying even now to be forgotten. The camp, the drill, the lines of sentries, the prisons, the hospitals—(ah! the hospitals!)—all have passed away—all seem now like a dream. A new race, a young and lusty generation, already sweeps in with oceanic currents, obliterating the war, and all its scars, its mounded graves, and all its reminiscences of hatred, conflict, death. So let it be obliterated. I say the life of the present and the future makes.

undeniable demands upon us each and all, south, north, east, west. To help put the United States (even if only in imagination) hand in hand, in one unbroken circle in a chant—to rouse them to the unprecedented grandeur of the part they are to play, and are even now playing—to the thought of their great future, and the attitude conform'd to it—especially their great esthetic, moral, scientific future (of which their vulgar material and political present is but as the preparatory tuning of instruments by an orchestra), these, as hitherto, are still, for me, among my hopes, ambitions."

Thou Mother with thy equal brood,

Thou varied chain of different States, yet one identity only,

A special song before I go I'd sing o'er all the rest, For thee, the future

I'd sow a seed for thee of endless Nationality,
I'd fashion thy ensemble including body and soul,
I'd show away ahead thy real Union, and how it may be accomplish'd

The paths to the house I seek to make, But leave to those to come the house itself

Belief I sing, and preparation,

As Life and Nature are not great with reference to the present only,

But greater still from what is yet to come, Out of that formula for thee I sing

Or the Saguenay's black stream, or the wide blue spread of Huron

With presentment of Yellowstone's scenes, or Yosem-

And murmuring under, pervading all, I'd bring the rustling sea-sound.

That endlessly sounds from the two Great Seas of the Brain of the New World, what a task is thine,

To formulate the Modern—out of the peerless grandeur of the modern.

Out of thyself, comprising science, to recast poems, churches, art,

(Recast, maybe discard them, end them-maybe their work is done, who knows?)

By vision hand, conception, on the background of the mighty past, the dead.

To limn with absolute faith the mighty living present

And yet thou living present brain, heir of the dead, the Old World brain,

Thou that lay folded like an unborn babe within its folds

Thou carefully prepared by it so long-haply thou but unfoldest it, only maturest it,

It to eventuate in thee-the essence of the by-gone time contain'd in thee.

Its poems, churches, arts, unwitting to themselves, destined with reference to thee,

Thou but the apples, long long, long a-growing, The fruit of all the Old ripening to-day in thee.

Sail, sail thy best, ship of Democracy,

Of value is thy freight, tis not the Present only,

The Past is also stored in thee,

Thou holdest not the venture of thyself alone, not of the Western continent alone,

Earth's résumé entire floats on thy keel O ship, is steadied by thy spars,

With thee Time voyages in trust, the antecedent nations sink or swim with thee,

With all their ancient struggles, martyrs, heroes, epics, wars, thou bear'st the other continents,

Theirs, theirs as much as thine, the destination-port triumphant,

Steer then with good strong hand and wary eye O helmsman, thou carriest great companions,

Venerable priestly Asia sails this day with thee, And royal feudal Europe sails with thee

World of the soul, born by the world of the real alone, led to identity, body, by it alone,

Yet in beginning only, incalculable masses of composite precious materials,

I feel thy ominous greatness evil as well as good,

I watch thee advancing, absorbing the present, transcending the past,

I see thy light lighting, and thy shadow shadowing, as if the entire globe,

But I do not undertake to define thee, hardly to comprehend thee,

I but thee name, thee prophesy, as now,

I merely thee ejaculate!

Thee in thy future,

Thet in thy only permanent life, career, thy own unloosen'd mind, thy soaring spirit,

Thee as another equally needed sun, radiant, ablaze, swift-moving, fructifying all,

Thee risen in potent cheerfulness and joy, in endless great hilarity,

Scattering for good the cloud that hung so long, that weigh'd so long upon the mind of man,

The doubt, suspicion, dread, of gradual, certain decadence of man.

Thee in thy larger, saner brood of female, male—thee in thy athletes, moral, spiritual, South, North, West, East,

(To thy immortal breasts, Mother of All, thy every daughter, son, endcard alike, forever equal,)

Thee in thy own musicians, singers, artists, unborn yet, but certain,

Thee in thy moral wealth and civilization, (until which thy proudest material civilization must remain in vain,)

Thee in thy all-supplying, all-enclosing worship—thee in no single bible, saviour, merely,

Thy saviours countless, latent within thyself, thy bibles incessant within thyself, equal to any, divine as any,

(Thy soaring course thee formulating, not in thy two great wars, nor in thy century's visible growth, 90

But far more in these leaves and chants, thy chants, great Mother¹)

To a Locomotive in Winter

Whitman's treatment of the locomotive may be profitably contrasted with Emily Dickinson's in "I Like to See It Lap the Miles" and compared with Thomas Wolfe's in many passages in his novels

Thee for my recitative,

Thee in the driving storm even as now, the snow, the winterday declining

Thee in thy panoply, thy measurd dual throbbing and thy beat convulsive,

Thy black cylinder body, golden brass and silvery seed.

Thy ponderous side-bars, parallel and connecting rods, gyrating, shuttling at thy sides,

Thy metrical, now swelling pant and roar, now tapering in the distance,

Thy great protruding head-light fix d in front,

Thy long, pale, floating vapor-pennants, tinged with delicate purple,

The dense and murky clouds out-belching from thy smokestack,

Thy knitted frame, thy springs and valves, the tiemulous twinkle of thy wheels,

Thy train of cars behind, obedient, merrily following,

Through gale or calm, now swift, now slack, yet steadily careering,

Type of the modern—emblem of motion and power—pulse of the continent,

For once come serve the Muse and merge in verse, even as here I see thee,

With storm and buffeting gusts of wind and falling snow,

By day thy warning ranging bell to sound its notes,

By night thy silent signal lamps to swing

Fierce-throated beauty!

Roll through my chant with all thy lawless music, thy swinging lamps at night,

Thy madly-whistled laughter, echoing, rumbling like an carthquake, rousing all,

Law of thyself complete, thine own track firmly holding, (No sweetness debonair of tearful harp or glib piano thine,)

Thy trills of shrieks by rocks and hills return'd, Launch'd o'er the prairies wide, across the lakes,

To the free skies unpent and glad and strong

Democratic Vistas

Unlike the poems, Democratic Vistas is censorious of America Two reasons for the difference may be suggested One reason is doubtless Whitman's conception of the proper functions of poetry and prose. Prose may be critical in tone, while poetry should be affirmative and expansive Accordingly, in Leaves of Grass Whitman consistently celebrates American democracy, in Democratic Vistas, he is free to point out its faults Another reason is to be found in the changing times. The Gilded Age (particularly, the administrations of Grant, 1869-1877) was notorious for its corruption in business and politics. Whitman might well have believed that America had failed to fulfill its earlier promise.

While holding to his faith in democracy, he warned of disaster unless certain radical changes were made. He was disappointed in Americans as individuals. He called for the appearance in America of healthier, more robust, and more spiritual personalities and (repeating Emerson's The American Scholar and his own 1855 Preface) the production of a literature indigenous to America and embodying truly democratic ideals.

I say we had best look our times and lands searchingly in the face, like a physician diagnosing some deep disease. Never was there, perhaps, more hollowness at heart than at present, and here in the United States. Genuine belief seems to have left us. The underlying principles of the States are not honestly believ'd in, (for all this heetic glow, and these melo-dramatic screamings) nor is humanity itself believed in. What penetrating eye does not everywhere see through the mask?

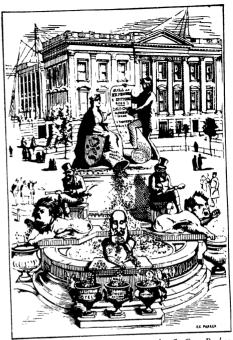

The spectacle is appaling. We live in an atmosphere of hypocrisy throughout. The men believe not in the women, nor the women in the men. A scornful super ciliousness rules in literature. The aim of all the lit terateurs is to find something to make fun of. A lor of churches, sects, &c, the most dismal phantasms I know usurp the name of religion Conversation is a mass of badinage. From deceit in the spirit, the mother of al. false deeds, the offspring is already incalculable An acute and candid person, in the revenue department in Washington, who is led by the course of his employ ment to regularly visit the cities, North, South and West, to investigate frauds, has talk'd much with me about his discoveries. The deprayity of the business classes of our country is not less than has been supposed but infinitely greater. The official services of America national, state, and municipal, in all their branches and departments, except the judiciary are saturated in corruption, bribery, falsehood, mal-administration, and the judiciary is tainted. The great cities reek with respecable as much as non-respectable robbery and scoundrel. ism. In fashionable life, flippancy, tepid amouis weak infidelism, small aims, or no aims at all, only to kill time In business, (this all-devouring modern word, business) the one sole object is, by any means, pecuniary gain The magician's serpent in the fable ate up all the other serpents, and money-making is our magician's serpent remaining to-day sole master of the field. The best class we show, is but a mob of fashionably dress'd speculators and vulgarians. True, indeed, behind this fantastic farce enacted on the visible stage of society solid things and stupendous labors are to be discovered, existing crudely and going on in the background, to advance and tell themselves in time. Yet the truths are none the less ter tible I say that our New World democracy, however great a success in uplifting the masses out of their sloughs, in materialistic development, products, and in a certain highly-deceptive superficial popular intel lectuality, is so far, an almost complete failure in its social aspects, and in really grand religious moral literary, and esthetic results. In vain do we march with unprecedented strides to empire so colossal outvying the antique, beyond Alexanders, beyond the proudest sway of Rome. In vain have we annex d Texas, Califormia Alaska, and reach north for Cinada and south for Cuba. It is as if we were somehow being endow'd with a vast and more and more thoroughly-appointed body, and then left with little or no soul.

Let me illustrate further, as I write, with current observations, localities, &c The subject is important, and will bear repetition. After an absence, I am now again (September, 1870) in New York City and Brooklyn, on a few weeks' vacation. The splendor, picturesqueness, and oceanic amplitude and rush of these great cities, the unsurpass'd situation, rivers and bay, sparkling seatides, costly and lofty new buildings, facades of marble and iron, of original grandeur and elegance of design. with the masses of gay color, the preponderance of white and blue, the flags flying, the endless ships, the tumultuous streets, Broadway, the heavy, low, musical roar, hardly ever intermitted, even at night, the jobbers' houses, the rich shops, the wharves, the great Central Park, and the Brooklyn Park of hills, (as I wander among them this beautiful fall weather, musing, watching, absorbing)—the assemblages of the citizens in their groups, conversations, trades, evening amusements, or along the by-quarters—these, I say, and the like of these, completely satisfy my senses of power, fulness, motion, &c, and give me, through such senses and appetites, and through my esthetic conscience, a continued exaltation and absolute fulfilment. Always and more and more, as I cross the East and North rivers, the ferries, or with the pilots in their pilot-houses, or pass an hour in Wall Street, or the gold exchange, I realize, (if we must admit such partialisms) that not Nature alone is great in her fields of freedom and the open air, in her storms, the shows of night and day, the mountains, forests, seas-but in the artificial, the work of man too is equally great—in this profusion of teeming humanity ---in these ingenuities, streets, goods, houses, ships--these hurrying, feverish, electric crowds of men, their complicated business genius (not least among the geniuses) and all this mighty, many-threaded wealth and industry concentrated here

But sternly discarding, shutting our eyes to the glow and grandeur of the general superficial effect, coming down to what is of the only real importance, Personalities, and examining minutely, we question, we ask Are there, indeed, men here worthy the name? Are there athletes? Are there perfect women, to match the generous material luxuriance? Is there a pervading atmosphere of beautiful manners? Are there crops of fine youths, and majestic old persons? Are there aris worthy freedom and a rich people? Is there a great moral and religious civilization—the only justification of a great material one? Confess that to severe eyes, using the moral microscope upon humanity, a sort of dry and flat Sahara appears, these cities, crowded with petty grotesques, malformations, phantoms, playing meaningless antics Confess that everywhere, in shop, street, church, theatre, bar-room, official chair, are pervading flippancy and vulgarity, low cunning, infidelity-everywhere the youth puny, impudent, foppish, prematurely ripeeverywhere an abnormal libidinousness, unhealthy forms, male, female, painted, padded, dyed, chignon'd, muddy complexions bad blood, the capacity for good motherhood deceasing or deceas'd, shallow notions of beauty, with a range of manners, or rather lack of manners, (considering the advantages enjoy'd), probably the meanest to be seen in the world.

Of all this, and these lamentable conditions, to breathe into them the breath recuperative of sane and heroic life, I say a new founded literature, not merely to copy and reflect existing surfaces, or pander to what is called taste-not only to amuse, pass away time, celebrate the beautiful, the refined, the past, or exhibit technical, o rhythmic, or grammatical dexterity-but a literature underlying life, religious, consistent with science, handling the elements and forces with competent power, teaching and training men-and, as perhaps the most precious of its results, achieving the entire redemption of woman out of these incredible holds and webs of silliness, millinery, and every kind of dyspeptic depletion-and thus insuring to the States a strong and sweet Female Race, a race of perfect Mothers-is what is needed

Assuming Democracy to be at present in its embryo condition, and that the only large and satisfactory justification of it resides in the future, mainly through the copious production of perfect characters among the people, and through the advent of a sane and pervading religiousness, it is with regard to the atmosphere and spaciousness fit for such characters, and of certain nutriment and cartoon-draftings proper for them, and indicating them for New-World purposes, that I continue to present statement—an exploration, as of new ground, wherein, like other primitive surveyors, I must do the best I can, leaving it to those who come after me to do much better. (The service, in fact, if any, must be to break a sort of first path or track, no matter how rude and ungeometrical.)

We have frequently printed the word Democracy Yet I cannot too often repeat that it is a word the real gist of which still sleeps, quite unawaken'd, notwithstanding the resonance and the many angry tempests out of which its syllables have come, from pen or tongue. It is a great word, whose history, I suppose, remains unwritten, because that history has yet to be enacted. It is, in some sort, younger brother of another great and often-used word. Nature, whose history also waits unwritten. As I perceive, the tendencies of our day, in the States, (and I entirely respect them), are toward those vast and sweeping movements, influences, moral and physical, of humanity, now and always current over the planet, on the scale of the impulses of the elements. Then it is also good to reduce the whole matter to the consideration of a single self, a man, a woman, on permanent grounds. Even for the treatment of the universal, in politics metaphysics, or anything, sooner or later we come down to one single, solitary soul

There is, in sanest hours, a consciousness, a thought that rises, independent, lifted out from all else, calm like the stars, shining eternal. This is the thought of identity—yours for you, whoever you are, as mine for me Miracle of miracles, beyond statement, most spiritual and vaguest of earth's dreams, yet hardest basic fact, and only entrance to all facts. In such devout hours in the midst of the significant wonders of heaven and earth (significant only because of the Me in the centre), creeds, conventions, fall away and become of no account before this simple idea. Under the luminousness of real vision, it alone takes possession, takes value. Like the shadowy dwarf in the fable, once liberated and look'd upon, it expands over the whole earth, and spreads to the roof of heaven.

The quality of BEING, in the object's self, according to its own central idea and purpose, and of growing therefrom and thereto-not criticism by other standards, and adjustments thereto-is the lesson of Nature True, the full man wisely gathers, culls, absorbs, but if, engaged disproportionately in that, he slights or overlays the precious idiocrasy and special nativity and intention that he is, the man's self, the main thing, is a failure, however wide his general cultivation. Thus, in our times, refinement and delicatesse are not only attended to sufficiently, but threaten to eat us up, like a cancer Already, the democratic genius watches ill-pleased, et these tendencies Provision for a little healthy rudeness, savage virtue, justification of what one has in one's self, whatever it is, is demanded Negative qualities, even deficiencies, would be a relief. Singleness and normal simplicity and separation, amid this more and more complex, more and more artificialized state of societyhow pensively we yearn for them' how we would welcome their return!

some such direction, then-at any rate enough to ve the balance—we feel called upon to throw weight we can, not for absolute reasons, but curones To prune, gather, trim, conform, and ever and stuff, and be genteel and proper, is the pressure r days While aware that much can be said even shalf of all this, we perceive that we have not to consider the question of what is demanded to a half-starved and barbarous nation, or set of ns, but what is most applicable, most pertinent, tumerous congeries of conventional, over-corpulent ties, already becoming stifled and rotten with ent, infidelistic literature, and polite conformity art. In addition to establish'd sciences, we suggest ence as it were of healthy average personalism, on nul-universal grounds, the object of which should) raise up and supply through the States a copious of superb American men and women, cheerful, gous, ahead of any yet known merica has yet morally and artistically originated ing She seems singularly unaware that the models persons, books, manners, &c, appropriate for former litions and for European lands, are but exiles and tics here No current of her life, as shown on the aces of what is authoritatively called her society, epts or runs into social or esthetic democracy, but all currents set squarely against it Never, in the Old orld, was thoroughly upholster'd exterior appearance I show, mental and other, built entirely on the idea caste, and on the sufficiency of mere outside acquisin-never were glibness, verbal intellect, more the t, the emulation-more loftily elevated as head and nple-than they are on the surface of our republican ites this day. The writers of a time hint the mottoes its gods. The word of the modern, say these voices, the word Culture

We find ourselves abruptly in close quarters with the emy This word Culture, or what it has come to repsent, involves, by contrast, our whole theme, and has en, indeed, the spur, urging us to engagement. Certain lestions arise As now taught, accepted and carried at, are not the processes of culture rapidly creating a ass of supercilious infidels, who believe in nothing? hall a man lose himself in countless masses of adjustnents, and be so shaped with reference to this, that, and he other, that the simply good and healthy and brave parts of him are reduced and clippd away, like the bordering of box in a garden? You can cultivate corn and roses and orchards-but who shall cultivate the mountain peaks, the ocean, and the tumbling gor- 50 geousness of the clouds? Lastly—is the readily-given reply that culture only seeks to help, systematize, and put in attitude, the elements of fertility and power, a conclusive reply?

I do not so much object to the name, or word, but I should certainly insist, for the purposes of these States, on a radical change of category, in the distribution of precedence I should demand a programme of culture, drawn out, not for a single class alone, or for the parlors or lecture-rooms, but with an eye to practical life, the 60 West, the working-men, the facts of farms and jackplanes and engineers, and of the broad range of the women also of the middle and working strata, and with reference to the perfect equality of women, and of a grand and powerful motherhood I should demand of this programme or theory a scope generous enough to include the widest human area. It must have for its spinal meaning the formation of a typical personality of character, eligible to the uses of the high average of men —and not restricted by conditions ineligible to the 70 masses The best culture will always be that of the manly and courageous instincts, and loving perceptions, and of self-respect-aiming to form, over this continent, an idiocrasy of universalism, which, true child of America, will bring joy to its mother, returning to her own spirit, recruiting myriads of offspring, able, natural, perceptive, tolerant, devout believers in her, America, and with some definite instinct why and for what she has arisen, most vast, most formidable of historic births, and is, now and here, with wonderful step, journeying through Time 80

The problem, as it seems to me, presented to the New World, is, under permanent law and order, and after preserving cohesion (ensemble-Individuality), at all hazards, to vitalize man's free play of special Personalism, recognizing in it something that calls ever more to be consider'd, fed, and adopted as the substratum for the best that belongs to us, (government indeed is for it), including the new esthetics of our future

To formulate beyond this present vagueness-to help

⁶¹ jack-planes, carpenter's plane

line and put before us the species, or a specimen of the species, of the democratic ethnology of the future, is a work toward which the genius of our land, with peculiar encouragement, invites her well-wishers. Already certain limnings, more or less grotesque, more or less fading and watery, have appear'd. We too (repressing doubts and qualms), will try our hand

Attempting, then, however crudely, a basic model or portrait of personality for general use for the manliness 10 of the States (and doubtless that is most useful which is most simple and comprehensive for all, and toned low enough), we should prepare the canvas well beforehand Parentage must consider itself in advance (Will the time hasten when fatherhood and motherhood shall become a science—and the noblest science?) To our model, a clear-blooded, strong-fibred physique, is indispensable, the questions of food, drink, air, exercise, assimilation, digestion, can never be intermitted Out of these we descry a well-begotten selfhood-in youth, 20 fresh, ardent, emotional, aspiring, full of adventure, at maturity, brave, perceptive, under control, neither too talkative nor too reticent, neither flippant nor sombre, of the bodily figure, the movements easy, the complexion showing the best blood, somewhat flush'd, breast expanded, an erect attitude, a voice whose sound outvies music, eyes of calm and steady gaze, yet capable also of flashing-and a general presence that holds its own in the company of the highest. (For it is native personality, and that alone, that endows a man to stand 30 before presidents or generals, or in any distinguish d collection, with aplomb-and not culture, or any knowledge or intellect whatever)

With regard to the mental-educational part of our model, enlargement of intellect, stores of cephalic knowledge, &c., the concentration thitherward of all the customs of our age, especially in America, is so overweening, and provides so fully for that part, that, important and necessary as it is, it really needs nothing from us here—except, indeed, a phrase of warning and restraint Manners, costumes, too, though important, we need not dwell upon here. Like beauty, grace of motion, &c., they are results. Causes, original things, being attended to, the right manners unerringly follow. Much is said, among artists, of "the grand style," as if it were a thing by itself. When a man, artist or whoever, has health, pride, acuteness, noble aspirations, he has the motive-elements of the grandest style. The rest is but manipulation (yet that is no small matter).

Leaving still unspecified several sterling parts of any model fit for the future personality of America, I must not fail, again and ever, to pronounce myself on one. probably the least attended to in modern times-a hiatus, indeed, threatening its gloomiest consequences after us I mean the simple, unsophisticated Conscience the primary moral element. If I were asked to specifi in what quarter lie the grounds of darkest dread, respecting the America of our hopes, I should have to point to this particular I should demand the invariable application to individuality, this day and any day, of that old ever-true plumb-rule of persons, eras, nations Our triumphant modern civilizee, with his all-schooling and his wondrous appliances, will still show himself but an amputation while this deficiency remains Beyond (assuming a more hopeful tone), the vertebration of the manly and womanly personalism of our Western world, can only be, and is, indeed, to be (I hope) its all penetrating Religiousness

The ripeness of Religion is doubtless to be looked for in this field of individuality, and is a result that no organization or church can ever achieve. As history is poorly retain'd by what the technists call history, and is not given out from their pages, except the learner has in himself the sense of the well-wrapt, never yet written perhaps impossible to be written, history—so Religion, although casually arrested, and, after a fashion, preserv'd in the churches and creeds, does not depend at all upon them, but is a part of the identified soul, which, when greatest, knows not bibles in the old way, but in new ways—the identified soul, which can really confront Religion when it extricates itself entirely from the achieves, and not before.

Personalism fuses this, and favors it I should say indeed, that only in the perfect uncontamination and solitariness of individuality may the spirituality of religion positively come forth at all. Only here, and on such terms, the meditation, the devout ecstasy, the soaring flight. Only here, communion with the mysteries.

⁶¹ civilizee, one who passes for civilized • 71 technists, specialists

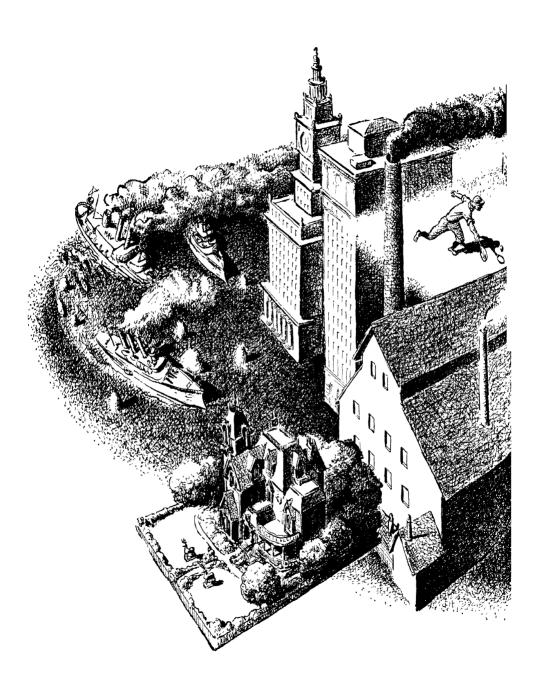

the eternal problems, whence? whither? Alone, and identity, and the mood—and the soul emerges, and all statements, churches, sermons, melt away like vapors Alone, and silent thought and awe, and aspirationand then the interior consciousness, like a hitherto unseen inscription, in magic ink, beams out its wondrous lines to the sense. Bibles may convey, and priests expound, but it is exclusively for the noiseless operation of one's isolated Self, to enter the pure ether of venera-, tion reach the divine levels, and commune with the unutterable

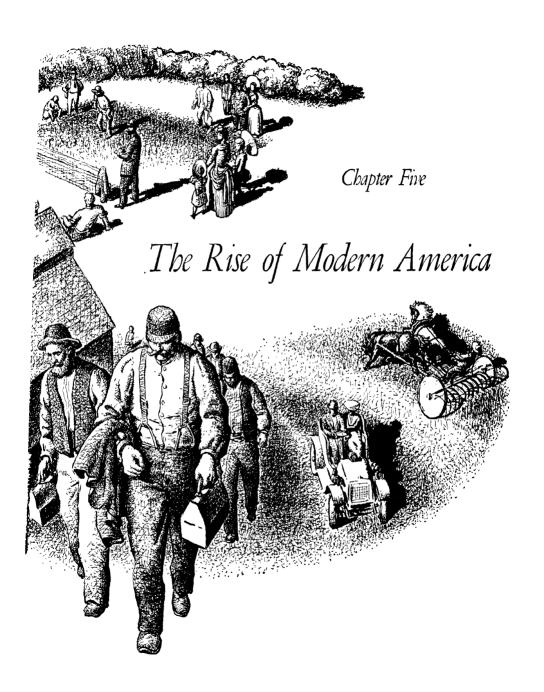

To practically enter into politics is an important part of American personalism. To every young man, North and South, earnestly studying these things, I should here, as an offset to what I have said in former pages, now also say, that may-be to views of very largest scope, atter all, perhaps the political (perhaps the literary and sociological), America goes best about its development 115 own way-sometimes, to temporary sight, appaling enough It is the fashion among dillettants and fops (perhaps I myself am not guiltless) to decry the whole tormulation of the active politics of America, as beyond redemption, and to be carefully kept away from See you that you do not fall into this error America, it may be, is doing very well upon the whole, notwithstanding these antics of the parties and their leaders, these halfbrain'd nominees, the many ignorant ballots, and many elected failures and blatherers. It is the dillettants, and all who shirk their duty, who are not doing well. As for you, I advise you to enter more strongly yet into politics I advise every young man to do so Always inform yourself, always do the best you can, always vote Disengage yourself from parties They have been useful, and to some extent remain so, but the floating, uncommitted electors, farmers, clerks, mechanics, the masters of parties-watching aloof, inclining victory this side or that side—such are the ones most needed, present and future For America, if eligible at all to downfall and ruin, is eligible within herself, not without, for I see clearly that the combined foreign world could not beat 40 her down But these savage, wolfish parties alarm me. Owning no law but their own will, more and more combative, less and less tolerant of the idea of ensemble and of equal brotherhood, the perfect equality of the States, the ever-over-arching American ideas, it behooves you to convey yourself implicitly to no party, nor submit blindly to their dictators, but steadily hold yourself judge and master over all of them . .

I had with joy the oceanic, variegated, intense practical energy, the demand for facts, even the business so materialism of the current age, our States But wo to the age or land in which these things, movements, stopping at themselves, do not tend to ideas. As fuel to flame, and flame to the heavens, so must wealth, science, materialism-even this democracy of which we make so much-unerringly feed the highest mind, the soul Infinitude the flight fathomless the mystery Man, so diminutive, dilates beyond the sensible universe, competes with, outcopes space and time, meditating even one great idea. Thus, and thus only, does a human 60 being, his spirit, ascend above, and justify, objective Nature, which, probably nothing in itself, is incredibly and divinely serviceable, indispensable, real, here And as the purport of objective Nature is doubtless folded, hidden, somewhere here—as somewhere here is what this globe and its manifold forms, and the light of day, and night's darkness, and life itself, with all its experiences, are for-it is here the great literature, especially verse, must get its inspiration and throbbing blood. Then may we attain to a poetry worthy the im- 70 mortal soul of man, and which, while absorbing materials, and, in their own sense, the shows of Nature, will, above all, have, both directly and indirectly, a freeing, fluidizing, expanding, religious character, exulting with science, fructifying the moral elements, and stimulating aspirations, and meditations on the unknown

REUNION

The Civil War, which terminated when Lee surrendered to Grant at Appomattox in April 1865, left the nation sadly disrupted. The restoration of unity—at best a long and difficult process—was made longer and more difficult by the Era of Reconstruction, which imposed the rule of ill-qualified Negroes and of carpetbaggers and scalawags upon the Southern states and maintained this rule by the presence of federal troops. When President Hayes withdrew the troops in 1877, reconstruction governments collapsed and the "tragic era" ended.

Much ill-feeling was engendered on both sides by sectional controversy, civil war, and tyrannical misrule. On the other hand, many forces were working inexorably for the restoration of national unity. The states were bound together by a common language, common traditions, and a close interdependence of economic interests. The establishment of schools and colleges in the South by Northern philanthropy contributed much to the growing unity of feeling; the abandonment by the national government after 1883 of the attempt to control race relations in the South contributed still more. Not the least of the unifying influences was our postwar literature. Some writers preached the gospel of union. Others contributed less directly but none the less effectively to the same end by exemplifying in the local color story the admirable qualities to be found in the rank and file of people in various regions.

Among those who celebrated unity and reunion, three writers stand out above the others: Lowell in New England, Whitman in the Middle Atlantic States, and Lanier in the South. On July 3, 1875, Lowell read in Cambridge his poem "Under the Old Elm," which celebrated the hundredth anniversary of Washington's taking command of the American army. After paying eloquent tribute to the greatness of Washington, the poet held out the hand of reconciliation and friendship to Virginia.

Virginia gave us this imperial man . . .

She gave us this unblemished gentleman

What shall we give her back but love and praise

As in the dear old unestranged days

Before the inevitable wrong began?

Mother of states and undiminished men,

Thou gavest us a country, giving him,

And we owe alway what we owed thee then . . .

A great man's memory is the only thing

With influence to outlast the present whim

And bind us as when here he knit our golden ring.

A great man's memory. Lowell was right. The common memory of Washington helped to restore national unity after the schismatic years. Mount Vernon soon became a national shrine. So important to a nation's well-being is the principle enunciated by Lowell that in the years to follow, other great Americans, such as Jefferson, Lincoln, and Lee, irrespective of sectional differences, were to become national heroes.

Whitman's plea for reunion took the characteristic form of an inspiring prophecy of the future greatness of the United States. This greatness would be the achievement of states which are "varied" and "different" and at the same time united in "one identity." In the famous poem ("As a Strong Bird on Pinions Free," later changed to "Thou Mother with Thy Equal Brood," p. 222) read at Dartmouth College in 1872, Whitman expressed unbounded confidence in the future progress of America—a progress which would be not only political and material, but scientific, aesthetic, and moral as well:

Thee in an education grown of thee, in teachers, studies, students, born of thee,

Thee in thy democratic fêtes en-masse, thy high original festivals, operas, lecturers, preachers . . .

Thee in thy pinnacles, intellect, thought, thy topmost rational joys, thy love and godlike aspiration,

In thy resplendent coming literati, thy full-lung'd orators, thy sacerdotal bards, kosmic savans.

These! these in thee, (certain to come,) to-day I prophesy.

It was a vision calculated to make men forget the quarrels of the past and unite in the achievement of a splendid civilization.

Although Sidney Lanier (p. 729) fought through the Civil War, there was no bitterness in his soul. He saw clearly that the South could not attain well-being in isolation and estrangement from the North. In the centennial year of 1876, he attempted in two poems to draw the sections together in loving harmony. "The Psalm of the West" and "The Centennial Meditation of Columbia," the second of which was sung at the Philadelphia Exposition by a great chorus with orchestral accompaniment. Both poems employ the historical approach. a backward glance over the events which have brought us to this good hour should awaken a new sense of pride and responsibility. In "The Psalm of the West" Lanier surveyed the early voyages to the New World (the eight sonnets on Columbus are especially notable), the settling of New England, the progress of the Revolutionary War from Lexington to Yorktown, and the Civil War between "Heart-strong South" and "Head-strong North." The "Psalm" concluded with a prophecy of America's future glory as ardent as Whitman's. The "Centennial Meditation" suggested more briefly the same historical evolution and concluded likewise with a prophecy which was also a prayer for America's future:

Long as thine Art shall love true love,

Long as thy Science truth shall know,

Long as thine Eagle harms no Dove,

Long as thy Law by law shall grow,

Long as thy God is God above,

Thy brother every man below, So long, dear Land of all my love.

Thy name shall shine, thy fame shall glow.

If the three writers just considered aided the process of reunion by emphasizing the solidarity of a new and glorious America, the fictionists of the local color school contributed to the same end with perhaps even greater effectiveness by drawing attention to the innate virtues of Americans everywhere. During the two or three decades following the Civil War, our most popular form of literature was the regional short story. Bret Harte (p. 386) and Hamlin Garland (p. 609) in the West, George Washington Cable (p. 403), Joel Chandler Harris (p. 423), and Mary Noailles Murfree (p. 412) in the South, Sarah Orne Jewett (p. 430) and Mary E. Wilkins Freeman (p. 439) in New England—all portrayed with tender sympathy the lives of the inhabitants of their respective regions. One effect of this body of literature was to reassure Southern readers that there was much natural goodness in the North, and Northern readers that there was much natural goodness in the South. Only the most stubborn of hard feelings could persist under such an emollient.

Consider, for example, the reputedly flinty New England character as seen in the soft light of Miss Jewett's tales. Describing a family reunion on the Maine coast, Miss Jewett wrote in The Country of the Pointed Firs: "Each heart is warm and every face shines with the ancient light. Such a day as this has transfiguring powers, and easily makes friends of those who have been cold-hearted, and gives to those who are dumb their chance to speak, and lends some beauty to the plainest face." Beneath the plain, taciturn, and cold exterior of the New England character, Miss Jewett assured her readers, could be discovered, on propitious occasions, beauty, ampleness of speech, and warmth of heart. These were the points on which non-New Englanders were likely to entertain serious doubts. It is reasonable to suppose that Miss Jewett's stories substantially increased the amount of good feeling in America toward New England.

Or take the character of the Southern highlander—reputedly wild and lawless—as seen through the sympathetic eyes of Miss Murfree. She saw that friendliness, charity, the domestic virtues can be found in abundance in the hill and mountain country of the South. It is a natural goodness, produced not by schools and the higher civilization, but by Nature herself, and therefore the more worthy of recognition and admiration. "The grace of culture is, in its way, a fine thing," Miss Murfree said in one of the stories in In the Tennessee Mountains. "but the best that art can do—the polish of a gentleman—is hardly equal to the best that Nature can do in her higher moods."

Or look (to mention only one more example) at the Southern planter—by report brutal and tyrannical—as he is reflected in the genial pages of Uncle Remus (p. 424). More effectively than any other single writer, Joel Chandler Harris reassured the world of the essential kindliness which had existed between master and slave on the ante-bellum plantation and implied that not even emancipation and reconstruction could destroy the friendly relations of the two races. Harris' stories had an effect similar to that produced in one of his tales by Mr. Benjermun Ram's fiddling:

W'en ole man Benjermun Ram sorter let up wid he fiddlin', he don't see no Brer Wolf, en he don't year no ole Miss Wolf. Den he look in de back room; no Wolf dar. Den he look in de back po'ch; no Wolf dar. Den he look in de closet en de cubbard; no Wolf ain't dar yit.

The infectious laughter of Uncle Remus and the pervasive good humor and kindliness expressed by Harris did much toward putting to flight (as Benjermun Ram put to flight Brer Wolf and Miss Wolf) the ill-will which persisted in partisans both North and South in the postwar years.

It is not too much to say that the writers of the period contributed greatly to the reestablishment of national unity. The local color stories, in particular, were for many readers a fresh and exciting discovery of America, and the writers of this school might have taken for their motto the words spoken by Senator Lamar of Mississippi in his eulogy of Charles Sumner: "My countrymen, know one another and you will love one another."

The remarkable extent to which reunion had been achieved by the end of the century was dramatically demonstrated in the war with Spain, in which Northerners and Southerners fought side by side and ex-Confederate generals held positions of command. World War I and World War II were to afford even more impressive evidence of the growing solidarity of the American nation.

SOCIAL and ECONOMIC PROBLEMS

Industry and Agriculture Expand

American social and economic life changed radically and rapidly during the years between 1865 and 1914. The railroad was a typical achievement of the age, and powerful in its influence on economic and social life. In 1865 there were only thirty-five thousand miles of track in the United States; by 1900 this mileage increased to nearly two hundred thousand. The Westinghouse air brake and other inventions improved the efficiency of railroad transportation. Enormous land grants by the government financed the building of the transcontinental lines: the Union Pacific, the Northern Pacific, and the Santa Fe, all of which had reached the Pacific Coast by 1884. If the cost in land grants was high, the railroads made substantial returns by peopling and developing the vast region west of the Mississippi. The roads, however, often abused their great power, and the Interstate Commerce Act of 1887 marked the beginning of federal regulation.

The railroad was only one factor in the economic revolution which followed the Civil War. A great transportation system presupposed commodities to transport, and these were supplied by an expanding industry and an expanding agriculture.

Industrial expansion was stimulated by a variety of factors: the exploitation of our resources in iron, coal, and oil; the development of improved machinery; the procurement of cheap labor through immigration; and the government's policy of protecting infant industries by high tariffs and allowing a free hand to business. There were many marvels of scientific invention: Andrew Carnegie was using the improved Bessemer process in the manufacture of steel by 1875; Alexander Graham Bell demonstrated the telephone at the Philadelphia Centennial Exposition in 1876; Thomas A. Edison and others made possible the dynamo, which was exhibited at the World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago in 1893 and which, as Henry Adams declared, "gave to history a new phase." Expanding industry required an abundance of labor, and this was supplied by a growing stream of immigrants, who, at the turn of the century, came in larger proportions from the southern and eastern than (as they had done previously) from the northern and western European countries. They were motivated in part by hardships at home, but even more by inducements proffered by agents of American factories and transportation lines. Immigration continued without drastic reduction until 1921.

Under these favorable conditions, our rapidly expanding industry soon got out of hand, and toward the end of the century it became increasingly apparent that some form of government regulation was necessary. Trusts and monopolies—the Standard Oil Company and the United States Steel Corporation, for example—exceeded reasonable bounds. The railroads of the entire country were controlled by only a half-dozen small groups of men. A disproportionate part of the wealth of the nation became concentrated in the pockets of a relatively few people. Big business had formed a corrupt alliance with politics. Abuses were rampant. Attempts at regulation and reform—at first ineffective—began with the Sherman Anti-Trust Act of 1890, and in response to growing social criticism became more effective after the turn of the century. among other things, the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission were increased, and in 1906 a Pure Food and Drugs Act heralded a new era in the responsibilities of business to society.

Agriculture also underwent a revolution during the post-Civil War years. Vast new lands in the West were opened to farming. New machines—reapers, binders, threshers—and new scientific devices—fertilizers, insecticides, improved strains—greatly increased the yield of the land. The methods of big business invaded the farm the cash crop supplanted subsistence farming. But fewer people were needed to do the work, thanks to the improved machinery; the financial returns were precarious; and migration from the farms to the cities grew steadily.

Growth of Cities

Perhaps the most conspicuous change of all was the rapid growth of cities, fed by immigrants from abroad and by farm and village folk from the American countryside. In 1860 one sixth of our population was urban; in 1900, one third. Between 1880 and 1900 the population of Chicago grew from a half million to a million and a half, and the number of American cities with a population of one hundred thousand or more increased from nineteen to thirty-six. City life gained, while country life suffered, in prestige. It was supposed by thousands of young Americans that a better life, somehow, could be lived in the city than in the country, and the bigger the city, the better the life. Many novels of the time—especially those of Theodore Dreiser (p. 668)—show the error of this supposition. The sudden growth of great urban centers created new social and economic problems. Municipal government broke down under the strain. The evils of the slums appeared for the first time in American life.

Labor Organizes

The new industry exploited labor, and it was inevitable that labor should organize to combat the exploitation. A beginning was made by the Knights of Labor, founded in 1869; but the movement did not gain appreciable strength until 1886, when the American Federation of Labor was organized under the leadership of Samuel Gompers. The A. F. of L continued to gain steadily until 1920, when it reached a peak of more than four million members As organized labor grew in strength, industrial conflicts increased in number and intensity. The first of these was the railroad strike of 1877. Others worthy of note are the Pullman strike of 1894 and the strike in the Pennsylvania coal fields in 1902. Strikes have often been an effective weapon, and much has been accomplished to improve the lot of labor by social legislation. Since the Massachusetts "Ten Hour Act for Women and Children in Factories" in 1874, much progress has been made in the working conditions, hours, and wages of labor. Early reform legislation was often declared unconstitutional on the disingenuous principle that "a person has the right to sell his labor upon such terms as he deems proper." But after 1900, more liberal judges, like Louis D. Brandeis, were instrumental in reversing many of the decisions which had blocked social reform.

The LITERATURE of SOCIAL CRITICISM

St. Paul said that "the love of money is the root of all evil," and the history of America after the Civil War exhibits the truth or near-truth of that statement. Perhaps never before was a nation so engrossed in the business of making money. Perhaps never before was materialism so rampant, or so much pride taken in material achievements.

The writers of the period pointed out forcefully the evils of this crass materialism. In Democratic Vistas (p. 226) Walt Whitman warned his readers that material wealth alone would not make a nation great:

I hail with joy the oceanic, variegated, intense practical energy, the demand for facts, even the business materialism of the current age, our States. But wo to the age or land in which these things, movements, stopping at themselves, do not tend to ideas. As fuel to flame, and flame to the heavens, so must wealth, science, materialism—even this democracy of which we make so much—unerringly feed the highest mind, the soul.

Lanier in "The Symphony" (p. 733) pleaded eloquently for a Christian and chivalric code in place of the unfeeling relations between employer and employed:

'Thou Trade! thou king of the modern days!

Change thy ways,

Change thy ways;

Let the sweaty laborers file

A little while,

A little while,

Where Art and Nature sing and smile.

Trade! is thy heart all dead, all dead?

And hast thou nothing but a head?

I'm all for heart,' the flute-voice said

In "these cold, merchantable days," the poet declared, even the love of the sexes is tainted by mercenary motives:

Now, comes a suitor with sharp prying eye—
Says Here, you Lady, if you'll sell, I'll buy:
Come, heart for heart—a trade? What! weeping? why?
Shame on such wooers' dapper mercery!

While Whitman and Lanier were voicing their spiritual protests, Mark Twain (p. 452) was ridiculing mercilessly the get-rich-quick schemes of his money-mad countrymen. In T/τ Gilded Age (p. 464)—a book whose name has been given to the Grant era (1869-1877) and by extension to the twenty or thirty years following the Civil War—the author presented at once hilariously and devastatingly Colonel Sellers' designs for money-making. At one and the same time, Sellers was scheming to corner the corn and hog crops, buy up the wildcat banks, and market an "Optic Liniment" (his own concoction) throughout the world. He and his associates attempted to sell a large tract of worthless land ("the Tennessee land") to the government. Despite skillful lobbying in Washington, they failed, though by a narrow margin, and the book ends with the moral that sober industry and contentment with a modest income honestly earned are infinitely preferable to frantic schemes to get rich quick. It was a good moral, but one which the author himself never learned, and one which millions of Americans had not learned as late as 1929.

The Gilded Age also exposed political corruption in the national capital, where votes were bought and sold. Henry Adams (p. 809) in his novel Democracy (1880) turned a censorious eye on similar political phenomena. He portrays a distinguished United States senator, the leader of his party, who accepted a bribe of $100,000. His reasons were good "political" ones, but they did not satisfy Adams' heroine, whose break with the senator parallels Adams' own withdrawal from the corrupt politics of the Gilded Age. But Adams remained a fascinated observer and refused to surrender his belief in democracy despite its current evil manifestations. "I grant it is an experiment," he said through one of the characters in the novel, "but it is the only direction society can take that is worth its taking. . . . Every other possible step is backward."

Our writers were not long content with a general censure of materialism and political corruption. Growing ills awakened the social conscience and called forth specific indictments which became increasingly prominent in the literature of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Prepared by his own experience on an Iowa farm and indoctrinated in the economic theories of Henry George (p. 765), Hamlin Garland in Main-Travelled Roads (p. 609) exposed, with strong emotional appeal, the hardships and injustices suffered by the farmers in the Iowa-Wisconsin country. An angry and anger-rousing book, Main-Travelled Roads suggests the gathering strength of the Populist Movement and helps explain the spectacular rise of William Jennings Bryan in 1896. An important phase in the history of the railroad's exploitation of the farmer is presented in Frank Norris' The Octopus (p. 642), which powerfully portrays the struggle between the Southern Pacific Railroad (the "octopus") and the wheat farmers of California. The triumphant force is neither the railroad nor the farmers, but the wheat, which Norris represents in both The Octopus (1901) and The Pit (1903) as more powerful than any man or combination of men.

Criticisms of Industrialism

With the opening of the new century, the exposure of injustices and abuses in our national life became the most popular of literary subjects. In politics, the 1900's were the era of Theodore Roosevelt's progressivism and "trust-busting"; in literature, the era of the "muck-rakers." Literature was dedicated to the exposé, and scores of books revealed all sorts of mal-practices to an indignant public. Perhaps the greatest of the muckraking books was Upton Sinclair's The Jungle (p. 802), which dealt graphically with the life of a Lithuanian immigrant employed in the Chicago stockyards. This sturdy young man is gradually broken, and his family completely ruined, by the inhuman cruelties of the stockyards. The book's exposure of unsanitary practices in the processing of meat undoubtedly hastened the enactment of the Pure Food and Drugs Act.

The leader among the muckrakers was Lincoln Steffens, whose Shame of the Cities (p. 785) brought to a focus the problems created by the sudden emergence of great urban communities and contributed to the movement for municipal reform. Steffens' book drew attention to the corruption in city government and attempted to fix the blame on certain prominent citizens. The growing problems of the Big City had been noticed before Steffens and were to be further exposed after his notable book. As early as 1890 William Dean Howells (p. 505) had exhibited, somewhat conservatively, the grime and squalor of New York City in A Hazard of New Fortunes (p. 513). Less conservatively, Stephen Crane's Maggie: A Girl of the Streets (1893) exposed the ugly life of New York's Bowery. In Sister Carrie (1900) and Jennie Gerhardt (1911) Theodore Dreiser told affectingly of the hard lot of the underpaid working girl in the big cities of the Middle West. Henry Blake Fuller in The Cliff-Dwellers (1893) and Robert Herrick in The Common Lot (1904) underscored the degrading effect on Chicago's social life of greed and cutthroat competition. Possibly the apogee of the literary attack on the Big City as a monster of corruption and vice was reached in David Graham Phillips' Swan Lenox (1917), whose heroine encounters (and miraculously survives) nearly all the evils of our modern Babylons.

The most prominent and commanding figure in the new industrial scene was the captain of industry. The years following the Civil War saw the amassing of unprecedented private fortunes. Financiers like Jay Cooke, the first great American banker; John D. Rockefeller, the Oil King; Andrew Carnegie, monopolist of iron and steel; and Jay Gould, Commodore Vanderbilt, and Collis P. Huntington, railroad magnates, became the real rulers of America. The reputations of these great entrepreneurs are now tarnished; their money was often acquired unethically; they have been called, with a good deal of justice, the "robber barons."

The type early attracted the attention of our novelists, but the literary treatment was for a good many years comparatively gentle. In Howells' The Rise of Silas Lapham (1884), Lapham, a wealthy Boston paint manufacturer, is crude but honest. At the great crisis of his career, he loses his business rather than accept a price for properties which is greater than he knows them to be worth. Howells would have defended his portrait of Lapham by saying that the great majority of American financiers were honest, that robber barons were the exception, not the rule. In A Hazard of New Fortunes, Dryfoos, the millionaire, is much less amiable in his domestic and social relations than Lapham, but Howells represents him as reasonably ethical: "He's hard," declares a character in the story whose testimony we can accept, "and he'd push an advantage, but I don't believe he would take an unfair one. He's speculated and made money every time, but I never heard of his wrecking a railroad or belonging to any swindling company or grinding monopoly. He does chance it in stocks, but he's always played on the square." Despite the "robber barons," Howells thought that the ethics of American business were fundamentally sound. Henry James' (p. 541) acquaintance with American financiers and their ways was less intimate than Howells'. Living abroad, James had the opportunity of knowing only those prosperous and emancipated Americans who took a vacation in Europe. His Christopher Newman (The American, 1877) and Adam Verver (The Golden Bowl, 1904) are men of integrity and charm. Although James does not enter at all into their business careers—a subject on which he is always vague—we see Newman and Verver behaving decently and even magnanimously. Newman is devoted to culture in a limited way; Verver has built in "American City" a museum of art which he has filled with priceless treasures. Both are men of honor as well as of cultural aspirations.

The balance has never been struck between the portraits drawn by Howells and James and the authentic careers of the "robber barons." Were all successful businessmen in the Gilded Age boors and scoundrels? Some social historians have implied as much. But the modern reader—unless he is a cynic—is still free to believe that the Gilded Age produced Lapharns and Newmans as well as Cookes and Goulds.

The emphasis of the muckrakers on the exposé resulted in much less flattering portrayals of the American businessman after the turn of the century. The most elaborate study of the type was made by Dreiser in two voluminously documented novels, The Financier (1912) and The Titan (1914), in both of which the business career of Frank Cowperwood more closely approximates the unsavory records of the barons. The literary pendulum was to swing back to a more favorable picture of the American millionaire in Dodsworth (1929), where Sinclair Lewis' hero (recalling James' Newman in many ways) is a thoroughly admirable person despite his wealth.

The Reformers

While emphasizing the blight of materialism upon the soul, and the injustices and abuses of the new industrial order, the literature of social criticism was not entirely destructive; there were constructive elements as well. Specific utopias were proposed. The greatest and most influential of these was Edward Bellamy's Looking Backward (p. 776): "Not since Uncle Tom's Cabin," declares V. L. Parrington, "had an American novel reached so many readers." Believing that economic inequality was the cause of all social ills, Bellamy described a Socialist utopia in which the wealth was distributed with exact equality among its members. A benevolent state controlled public and private economy in the minutest detail; it assigned members to tasks according to their aptitudes; it provided incentives through special recognition of public service. A planned and cooperative society produced sufficient wealth to permit the early retirement of its members and the free enjoyment of cultural pursuits. Looking Backward has made many converts to Socialism. Other writers of the period also proposed the Socialist solution: among them, Howells in A Traveller from Altruria (1893) and Upton Sinclair in The Jungle—after the incredible woes of the stockyards, Sinclair's hero embraces Socialism and becomes an active worker for the cause.

The great body of the literature dealing with social problems, however, proposes not a radical alteration of the American system of free enterprise, but reforms and ameliorations. If men would be honest and fair, if they would be satisfied with a modest income, if they would spend their money unselfishly, if they would be Christians imbued with the spirit of the Sermon on the Mount—then all would be well: this is the burden of many writers who have concerned themselves with the subject. Charles M. Sheldon's In His Steps (1896), which had an amazing sale of more than fifteen million copies, recommended that everyone when confronted by a problem should ask himself, "What would Jesus do?" Less popular and better writers also emphasized the importance of the Christian attitude. Robert Herrick advised in The Common Lot (1904) a quiet withdrawal from the market place into a Wordsworthian simplicity, William Vaughn Moody (p. 758), the first of our poets to examine the new social problems with critical insight, urged in "Gloucester Moors" (1900) the necessity of a social conscience among the more fortunate members of society. The results of the Machine Age, he pointed out in "The Brute" (1900), had been disappointing: contrary to expectations, the Machine (the "brute") had not brought prosperity and leisure to all, but only to "the strong and cunning few." The solution lay, Moody thought, not in the rejection of the Machine (as some nineteenth-century Romantics had believed), but in a better control of the Machine and a fairer distribution of the wealth which it produces:

For the Brute must bring the good time on . . .

He must loose the curse of Adam from the worn neck of the race.

He must give each man his portion, each his pride and worthy place.

Substantial progress was to be made in the new century toward the realization of these aims.

The FRONTIER VERSUS EUROPE: A QUESTION of VALUES

The Freedom of the Frontier

"Westward the course of empire takes its way," wrote Bishop Berkeley in his "Verses on the Prospect of Planting Arts and Learning in America" published in 1752. The Westward movement in America was a fulfillment of the prophecy beyond anything which the good bishop could have foreseen. Before the end of the eighteenth century, pioneers had crossed the Alleghenies; by the middle of the nineteenth century, they had settled the Mississippi Valley as far as Texas and the upper reaches of the Missouri and had invaded California and Oregon; by the end of the century, only the Rocky Mountains and the arid tracts of Arizona and Nevada remained unsettled; and by the beginning of World War I, there was no more frontier. The "epic of America" before 1914 was in no small part the epic of the ever advancing frontier. The treatment of the frontier in literature has been of two kinds: romantic, and realistic and critical. In the nineteenth century the romantic treatment predominated; the realistic and critical treatment did not prevail until after World War I.

Whitman sounded the dominant nineteenth-century note in "Pioneers!" (p. 200). Whitman's pioneers were heroes—"tan-faced children," "youthful and sinewy," armed with "pistols and sharp-edged axes."

We primeval forests felling,

We the rivers stemming, vexing we and piercing deep the mines within, We the surface broad surveying, we the virgin soil upheaving,

Pioneers! O Pioneers!

(A century later it was to appear that the pioneers had done too thorough a job in upheaving the soil and felling the forests.) They were "impatient" and "full of action"—a "resistless, restless race." Such was Whitman's glorification of the Westward movement. Other poets of the nineteenth century—Emerson and Lowell in New England, Lanier in the South, and Joaquin Miller in the West—echoed Whitman's praise and admiration.

The distinguished historian Frederick Jackson Turner was almost as romantic as the poets in his treatment of the subject in "The Significance of the Frontier in American History" written in 1893. "Stand at Cumberland Gap," he wrote, "and watch the procession of civilization, marching single file—the buffalo following the trail to the salt springs, the Indian, the fur trader and hunter, the cattle raiser, the pioneer farmer—and the frontier has passed by. Stand at South Pass in the Rockies a century later and see the same procession with wider intervals between." Turner defined the frontier as "the line of most rapid and effective Americanization." The American character was largely formed by the frontier; frontier traits became the traits most distinctive of America:

To the frontier the American intellect owes its striking characteristics. That coarseness and strength combined with acuteness and inquisitiveness; that practical, inventive turn of mind, quick to find expedients; that masterful grasp of material things, lacking in the artistic but powerful to effect great ends; that restless, nervous energy, that dominant individualism, working for good and for evil, and withal that buoyancy and exuberance which comes with freedom—these are the traits of the frontier, or traits called out elsewhere because of the existence of the frontier.

Turner's sentences are almost a prose paraphrase of Whitman.

When we come to the literature written by frontiersmen, we find much that is sordid and unattractive in the life described, but the total effect is still romantic. Frontier life was vital, expansive, exuberant; it was in the full tide of growth; here was no Indian summer, no sere and vellow leaf.

The life portrayed in the books by Mark Twain's precursors—Davy Crockett's Autobiography (1834, p. 319), A. B. Longstreet's Georgia Scenes (1835), W. T. Thompson's Major Jones's Courtship (1843, p. 324), Johnson H. Hooper's Some Adventures of Captain Simon Suggs (1845), J. G. Baldwin's The Flush Times of Alabama and Mississippi (1853), G. W. Harris' Sut Lovingood (1867, p. 329)—contains much that is vulgar, brutal, and unprincipled. The bloody athletic contests described by Longstreet, the low chicanery of Simon Suggs, the rough practical jokes of Sut Lovingood may repel the delicate reader. But there is no denying the vitality, the sturdy strength and individualism, and, above all, the high spirits and love of fun. Life on the frontier must have been good to produce so much solid enjoyment; perhaps no other early settlements in the world's history have been enlivened by such hilarity. The literary apex of the hilarity was Sut Lovingood; nowhere else, even in our own literature, will one find quite so much of that quality, or the qualities it connotes—good health and an inexhaustible enjoyment of physical living. Sut Lovingood and his fellows were a remarkably healthy and uninhibited race.

Lincoln liked to read the Southwestern Yarnspinners, for he was one of them; and from their writings runs a straight line of genealogical descent to the great works of Mark Twain: Roughing It (p. 461), in which he told with gusto the tall tales of his sojourn in the Far West, and Life on the Mississippi (p. 480), The Adventures of Tom Sawyer, and The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (p. 490), in which he immortalized the Mississippi from Hannibal to New Orleans. Mark Twain did not omit the seamy side of the Mississippi River region in the 1850's—the squalor, the vulgarity, the lawlessness; but this aspect is almost forgotten by the reader because there was so much that was splendid and exhilarating. The splendor was symbolized for Mark Twain in the steamboat, and "the boat was rather a handsome sight!" The exhilaration was owing to the unrestricted freedom of the frontier world, an abandon symbolized by Huck and Jim on the raft—Huck free, Jim on the road to liberty. As our civilization grew older and more complex—as it matured, in short—Mark Twain felt that its members were more and more restricted. Writing in middle life, he remembered with nostalgia the unrestrained spirit of his early world:

I never felt easy till the raft was two miles below there and out in the middle of the Mississippi. Then we hung up our signal lantern, and judged that we was free and safe once more. I hadn't had a bite to eat since yesterday, so Jim he got out some corn-dodgers and buttermilk, and pork and cabbage and greens—there ain't nothing in the world so good when it's cooked right—and whilst I eat my supper we talked and had a good time. I was powerful glad to get away from the feuds, and so was Jim to get away from the swamp. We said there warn't no home like a raft, after all. Other places do seem so cramped up and smothery, but a raft don't. You feel mighty free and easy and comfortable on a raft.

The frontier love of freedom found enduring expression in the statesmanship of Lincoln and the writings of Mark Twain.

The European Tradition

The Westward movement was a powerful driving force which settled the American continent; but there has been another, a counter-force, less powerful but insistent, which has operated throughout our history. As Ferner Nuhn pointed out in The Wind Blew from the East, there has been in American life and literature from the beginning "the everpresent pullback toward modes of culture that lie in our past... the desire to retrace the racial steps... the nostalgic tradition." The Atlantic seaboard has felt drawn constantly to Europe; the Middle West and the Far West, to the Atlantic seaboard. In colonial times, Increase Mather and William Byrd—each in his own way—enjoyed London. In the nineteenth century, Irving and Longfellow and Lowell assimilated the culture of Europe, and Hawthorne felt acutely the ancestral ties to "our old home." Among our major writers, only Thoreau and Whitman—those staunch Americans—never traveled abroad. In the latter half of the century, the Eastward pull began to be felt in the newly settled West: Howells and Garland were drawn from their Western habitats to Boston by the lodestone of the East; Mark Twain settled in Hartford. Some Westerners even today confess to a feeling of "isolation."

The counter-pull has produced two kinds of literary subjects: comparisons of the Eastern and the Western parts of the United States, and comparisons of Europe and America. Although the first subject may be found here and there in our literature (A Hazard of New Fortunes transplants several Midwesterners to the East and suggests some comparisons of the two sections; Moody's The Great Divide studies the contrasting moralities of New England and the West), it does not attain the importance of the second: Europe versus America is one of the more significant themes in American literature.

Mark Twain treated Europe with unorthodox scorn in The Innocents Abroad (p. 458) He had a frontiersman's hatred of tyranny, and Europe to him meant the twofold tyranny of church and state, of priests and kings. The best thing that had ever happened in Europe, he thought, was the French Revolution, and he regretted that it had not done its work more thoroughly. He could not enjoy the great art of Florence when he recalled the sycophantic attitude of the artists toward the Medicis. Not only in Innocents Abroad but in other works as well (A Connecticut Yankee at King Arthur's Court, Life on the Mississippi, Huckleberry Fmn) he lashed out against feudalism and its survivals wherever he found them, whether in Europe or in Walter Scott's novels or in the ante-bellum South. It was primarily Mark Twain's love of freedom and his sense of the dignity of the common man which blinded him to the glories of Europe.

Two great contemporaries of Mark Twain were not so blinded: Henry James spent most of his life in England because he felt that "it takes an old civilization to set a novelist in motion"; Henry Adams, the historian, was drawn to medieval France as an example of "unity," against which he set the "multiplicity" of the modern world.

Though James admired the "items of high civilization" which he professed to find in Europe and failed to find in America, he wrote in large part about Americans—Americans in Europe. In novel after novel (The American, The Portrait of a Lady, The Ambassadors, The Golden Bowl) he shows us Americans, admirable though unsophisticated, in the process of exposure to European influences. These influences make for social and aesthetic enrichment; they are, at the same time, often questionable morally. James' innocent Americans—Christopher Newman, Isabel Archer, Lambert Strether, Maggie Verver, in, respectively, the four novels just named—are shocked by the evil which they discover in Europe. But they do not succumb to the evil; indeed, they are triumphant over it. Lesser Americans in James' stories may be corrupted by Europe or may remain impervious to its culture, but his American heroes and heroines, though not always happy or successful, emerge from their European experiences culturally entiched and strong of soul. Perhaps James meant to suggest that the ideal civilization would combine the freshness and moral strength of America with the rich culture of the Old World.

Henry Adams was not interested in the richness of contemporary Europe so much as in the richness of its medieval past. In his attempt to establish historical lines of force—his "dynamic theory of history"—by which he might explain the modern world and perhaps predict its future course, Adams centered his interest in twelfth-century France and in the Cathedral of Chartres as the epitome of that time and place. In Chartres he found the perfect symbol of unity. In that distant age, the Virgin, in whose worship Chartres was built, exerted a dominating influence over men of all degrees. She was the greatest force of the age—energizing, controlling, comforting, beatifying.

If the Virgin was the symbol of medieval unity, the dynamo, Adams thought, was the symbol of modern multiplicity. The Virgin was a unifying spiritual force; the dynamo was obviously a force, but neither spiritual nor unifying. As religion decayed, enormous, incalculable forces unleashed by science—steam power, electricity, radioactivity—threatened to destroy mankind. It was a serious question, Adams thought in the Education, whether there was enough intelligence and moral character in the world to control these new forces and use them for man's welfare. The release of atomic energy makes the question an even more serious one today. The Education of Henry Adams (p. 811) is perhaps the best statement in our literature of the background of our present problems.

In Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres (1904) Adams, the disillusioned intellectual, surrendered to the spell of Chartres and the Virgin:

One sees her personal presence on every side. Anyone can feel it who will only consent to feel like a child. Sitting here any Sunday afternoon, while the voices of the children are chanting in the choir—your mind held in the grasp of the strong lines and shadows of the architecture; your eyes flooded with the autumn tones of the glass; your ears drowned with the purity of the voices; one sense reacting upon another until sensation reaches the limit of its range—you, or any other lost soul, could, if you cared to look and listen, feel a sense beyond the human ready to reveal a sense divine that would make that world once more intelligible, and would bring the Virgin to life again, in all the depths of feeling which she shows here—in lines, vaults, chapels, colours, legends, chants—more eloquent than the prayerbook, more beautiful than the autumn sunlight.

Europe to Adams was a bright example of something eminently valuable—possibly essential to man's prosperity and happiness—which the modern world has lost.

Europe retained a good deal of prestige throughout the nineteenth century and after, despite Innocents Abroad and the frontier school; but European prestige lost ground steadily as the twentieth century advanced, despite a growing disposition of Americans to be critical of frontier values.

SCIENCE and RELIGION

The march of science in the nineteenth century profoundly affected religious thought Geology established the antiquity of the earth, thus discrediting the chronology of Genesis. Evolution, as set forth in Darwin's The Origin of Species in 1859, saw man as the result of a slow development from simpler forms of animal life, thus challenging the Christian belief in his special creation. Astronomical science seemed to point to an infinite universe, in the face of which man appeared insignificant. Before the end of the period 1865-1914, sociological, biological, and psychological investigations still further reduced man's importance and autonomy. William Graham Sumner argued that human behavior was largely determined by "folkways," the mores of one's environment. Biology emphasized the determining influence of physical inheritance, of glandular secretions; psychology, the determining influence of automatic responses to stimuli. So effective was the combined onslaught of the sciences that by the end of the period, man appeared to be—from the scientific point of view -little more than an ingenious mechanism. Modern science seemed to leave no room for the soul, or God, or the transcendental perception of truth—for those religious beliefs, in short, which had motivated most Americans for nearly three centuries and which had found eloquent expression in the writings of Edwards, Emerson, and Whitman. The inspired view of the psalmist-"What is man that thou art mindful of him? . . . For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honor"—became little short of absurd to the scientific mind. All phenomena, we were to suppose, were naturalistic phenomena, and were explicable on purely naturalistic, as opposed to spiritual or transcendental, grounds.

Early Resistance to Science

The scientific movement did not capture our literature immediately, and, as one might expect, the poets offered a sturdier resistance than other writers. Although Whitman accepted the evolutionary idea, it was the Emersonian (which was in turn the Lamarckian) concept, rather than the concept of Darwin, which emphasized the struggle for survival. For Whitman, as for Emerson, the evolutionary idea exalted man by enlarging his future possibilities:

My feet strike an apex of the apices of the stairs,

On every step bunches of ages, and larger bunches between the steps,

All below duly travel'd, and still I mount and mount.

As the scientific movement advanced in the post-Civil War years, Whitman became not less but more Transcendental. His Transcendentalism reached its highest points in the late poems, "Passage to India" (p. 217):

O my brave soul!

O farther farther sail!

and the "Prayer of Columbus" (1876):

Shadowy vast shapes smile through the air and sky,

And on the distant waves sail countless ships,

And anthems in new tongues I hear saluting me.

Lanier was a spiritually minded person who had no intention of surrendering his Christian faith to the new science. But partly as a natural reaction against his strict Calvinistic upbringing in Macon, partly through the influence of his professor of science, James Woodrow, at Oglethorpe, and partly because of the liberal atmosphere at Johns Hopkins, he welcomed science with an open mind. His copy of Darwin, we are told, was copiously annotated. He made a special study of the physics of sound in connection with his investigation of prosody in The Science of English Verse. Science, then, was an unmixed good. An intelligent man, he thought, must be, above all else, "catholic" ("The Marshes of Glynn," p. 740): he must eschew the narrowness of creed and cultivate breadth. The ideal soul is characterized by its "loves," its points of receptivity, and excludes neither science nor any other good thing ("My Springs"):

And home-loves and high glory-loves,

And science-loves and story-loves.

He was aware (in "The Mocking Bird") that science might have its limitations:

Sweet Science, this large riddle read me plain:

How may the death of that dull insect be

The life of you trim Shakspere in the tree?

He admitted (in "Acknowledgement") that possibly his age was dazzled by the new science: "blinking at o'er bright science." These, however, were small reservations in Lanier's mind; no writer of the period was more hospitable to science. Lanier's eager search for truth was thoroughly admirable. But one cannot avoid a suspicion of indiscrimination and naïveté. Lanier did not recognize the contradictions involved; like more able thinkers than himself in the 1870's, he advocated the reconciliation of religion and science. Unlike some other reconcilers, he was apparently unaware that such a reconciliation would entail a diminution of Christian doctrine.

The breadth which Lanier extolled and exemplified seemed vicious to the greatest of the New England poets of the time, Emily Dickinson (p. 746). In liberalism, she thought, lurked an insidious and fatal danger to religion. Religion was being watered down to the point of insipidity. Her satire of the liberal clergyman—and she must have had in mind the popular advocates of reconciliation between the old religion and the new science—is a telling indictment: "He preached upon 'breadth' till it argued him narrow. . . ." Miss Dickinson was scarcely touched by the scientific movement. Her religion was the older Puritanism, modified somewhat by Emersonian Transcendentalism. For her, the things of religion still lay beyond the realm of scientific demonstration; they were still the objects of faith:

I never spoke with God,
Nor visited in heaven;
Yet certain am I of the spot
As if the chart were given.

If religious faith transcends the world of science, so does the individual life, on occasion, transcend the mechanisms with which science strives to hem it in:

We never know how high we are

Till we are called to rise;

And then, if we are true to plan,

Our statures touch the skies

The "plan" Miss Dickinson refers to is not the scientist's but God's.

The Spread of Mechanistic Philosophy

Lanier died in 1881; Emily Dickinson, in 1886; Whitman, in 1892; and with them died in American literature a religious faith untroubled by science. By the end of the century, our poets and prose writers were feeling the full impact of the scientific movement

Stephen Crane (p. 627) inferred from the biological struggle for survival and the astronomical immensity of the universe that man is unimportant:

A man said to the universe

"Sir. I exist!"

"However," replied the universe,

"The fact has not created in me

A sense of obligation."

"A high cold star on a winter s night" ("The Open Boat," p. 628) is the symbol of the indifference of Nature and Nature's God. It seemed ironical to Crane, who found intense irony everywhere in human experience, that the discoverer of the universe should be dwarfed by his discovery, that the chief spiritual result of man's scientific achievements should be the conviction of his own insignificance.

Mark Twain, late in life, became a convert to the mechanistic philosophy. Partly through the influence of the new agnosticism as expounded by Robert G. Ingersoll and others, and partly, perhaps, in the attempt to stifle the deep-seated feeling that his literary performance had not been in keeping with his creative powers, he declared and attempted to prove that "man is a machine." In What Is Man? (1906) he summarized his argument as follows:

To me, Man is a machine, made up of many mechanisms, the moral and mental ones acting automatically in accordance with the impulses of an interior Master who is built out of born-temperament and an accumulation of multitudinous outside influences and trainings; a machine whose one function is to secure the spiritual contentment of the Master, be his desires good or be they evil; a machine whose will is absolute and must be obeyed; and always 15 obeyed.

What Is Man? was a strange and contradictory book to come from the author of Huckleberry Fmn. Was that wonderful Western freedom—that of Tom and Huck and the steamboat pilot, the American freedom which showed no "embarrassment even in the presence of travelling foreign princes" and which Europe had almost perished for the lack of—was that freedom, scientifically considered, only an illusion? To believe so was to deny the thesis of his great books. It is small wonder that Mark Twain's last years were embittered.

If to Henry Adams man himself was something more than a machine, man at least seemed to be impelled along lines of force. "Modern politics," he said in the Education, "is a struggle not of men but of forces. The men become every year more and more creatures of force, massed about central power-houses." He began to "see lines of force all about him, where he had always seen lines of will," and thus "before knowing it," he confessed, "the mind stepped into the mechanical theory of the universe." The future which Adams envisioned for the race was not too hopeful. There was a fair possibility of man's being engulfed in the new forces: "In the earlier stages of progress, the forces to be assimilated were simple and easy to absorb, but, as the mind of man enlarged its range, it enlarged the field of complexity, and must continue to do so, even into chaos, until the reservoirs of sensuous or supersensuous energies are exhausted, or cease to affect him, or until he succumbs to their excess."

Like Adams, Theodore Dreiser believed that men were creatures of force With the turn of the century, the mechanistic philosophy began to appear in the naturalistic novel, which soon became its chief literary vehicle. Many naturalistic novelists felt a profound sympathy with the unfortunate members of modern society, who appeared to be the helpless and blameless victims of forces beyond their control. The mechanistic philosophy afforded a means of complete exoneration: if a person was dominated by chemical forces from within and social forces from without, he was not morally responsible for his acts or culpable for his misdeeds. In accordance with this view Dreiser wrote his great naturalistic novels: Sister Carrie, Jennie Gerhardt, The Financier, The Titan, and An American Tragedy. "All of us," declared Lester Kane in Jennie Gerhardt, "are more or less pawns. We're moved about like chessmen by circumstances over which we have no control." The world seemed utterly without purpose to Dreiser:

In distant ages a queer thing had come to pass. There had started on its way in the form of evolution a minute cellular organism which had apparently reproduced itself by division, had early learned to combine itself with others, to organize itself into bodies, strange forms of fish, animals and birds, and had finally learned to organize itself into man. Man, on his part, composed as he was of self-organizing cells, was pushing himself forward into comfort and different aspects of existence by means of union and organization with other men. Why? Heaven only knew.

The obvious tendency through Crane, Mark Twain, Adams, and Dreiser was a growing pessimism.

Mechanistic materialism, so prominent in the literature of the 1900's, was not unchallenged after its apparent triumph. Josiah Royce expounded at Harvard an idealism reminiscent of Emerson's. William James, another Harvard professor, brother of the novelist and America's first great authority in the new science of psychology, emphasized in The Va- reties of Religious Experience (1902) the energizing power of religious faith. This power could hardly be accounted for, he thought, in terms of a mechanistic universe. The creative individual need not succumb to Adams' lines of force or Dreiser's weight of circumstance. James set up the pragmatic test of truth: "The ultimate test for us of what a truth means is the conduct it dictates or inspires." And, finally, Herrick among the novelists and Moody among the poets in the first decade of the century presented the religious view of life. But despite these dissenting voices, it appeared likely that the determinism of mechanistic science would continue to gain in popular and literary acceptance.

The NEW IMPERIALISM

Throughout the nineteenth century, expansionist doctrines had been urged sporadically. Certain prominent Americans had advocated in the name of "manifest destiny" the desirability of annexing the entire North American continent. Out of this agitation had come the war with Mexico and the acquisition of large territories in the Southwest in 1845-1853 and the purchase of Alaska in 1867. But this expansion could hardly be called flagrantly imperialistic since, Alaska excepted, the new territory seemed necessary to round out our natural boundaries.

The Cuban Revolution of 1895 afforded a plausible excuse for American intervention, and the quick victory over Spain in 1898 stimulated imperialistic sentiments. The spectacular and exciting events of the war—Dewey's victory in Manila Bay, the crushing defeat of Cevera's squadron as it attempted to escape from Santiago, the charge of Roosevelt's Rough Riders up San Juan Hill—evoked a dubious mixture of patriotism and jingoism. After the defeat of Spain, the Filipinos resisted our rule and General Miles' army put down the insurrection. Many thoughtful Americans were alarmed at the new imperialistic policy upon which our nation seemed to be embarking. The crisis called forth protests from persons as various as William Jennings Bryan, Jane Addams, Charles W. Eliot, Finley Peter Dunn 2, and William Vaughn Moody.

Through the inimitable "Observations of Mr. Dooley," Dunne (p. 797) satirized the whole imperialistic policy:

"An there ye ar-re, Hinnissy. I hope this here lucid story will quite the waggin tongues iv scandal an' that people will let th' Ph'lippeens stew in their own happiness."

"But sure they might do something f'r thim," said Mr. Hennessy.

"They will," said Mr. Dooley. "They'll give thim a measure iv freedom."

"But whin?"

"Whin they'll stand still long enough to be measured"

Moody lashed out against the conquest of the Philippines in one of the most impassioned poems of our literature, "An Ode in Time of Hesitation" (p. 759):

Are we the eagle nation Milton saw

Mewing its mighty youth,

Soon to possess the mountain winds of truth,

And be a swift familiar of the sun . . .

Or have we but the talons and the maw,

And for the abject likeness of our heart

Shall some less lordly bird be set apart?—

Some gross-billed wader where the swamps are fat?

Some gorger in the sun? Some prowler with the bat?

But neither the humor of Dunne nor the Miltonic fervor of Moody could stem the tide—we took the Philippines. The immediate outcome notwithstanding, the protests need not be regarded as futile: they may very well have had the effect of making our rulers more careful, for our record in administering the Islands proved to be creditable.

Secretary of State Hay made partial amends to the anti-imperialists by his Chinese policy, and Moody's tone changed from condemnation in the "Ode" to pride in "The Quarry." Having declared the policy of the "Open Door," Hay backed it up by thwarting the obvious intention of the European powers to use the Boxer Rebellion as a favorable opportunity for the dismemberment of China. The American eagle—no longer a "gross-billed wader"—now appeared in a heroic rôle. When China—backward, helpless, unaware (the description of China in the poem is extraordinarily fine)—was about to be pounced upon by the "brutes of prey," the "grand circler," uttering a cry of warning, drove them away:

. . . stiller-tongued, with eyes somewhat askance,

They settled to the slot and disappeared.

A distinguished historian has recently declared that "The Quarry is worth all of the literature of imperialism together."

The United States emerged from the war with Spain a world power. National pride centered to an unprecedented degree (except possibly during the War of 1812) in the Navy. Alfred T. Mahan's Influence of Sea Power upon History, whose doctrine was espoused by Theodore Roosevelt, helped to make us navy-minded; the victories over Spain raised naval patriotism to a high pitch; Theodore Roosevelt dramatized the rôle of the "big stick" by sending the fleet around the world in 1907. But the great majority of Americans were not imperialists at heart. By 1910 pacifism seemed to be gathering strength: Bryan, thrice Democratic candidate for the Presidency, advocated disarmament; David Starr Jordan, president of Stanford, argued that war was the reversal of evolution—the survival of the unfit; William James attempted to discover "a moral equivalent of war." Not deeply affected by the flare-up of 1898-1900, the national temperament preferred peace with isolation. As the period neared its close, little did Americans dream that events in Europe would soon draw them, whether willing or not, into a vigorous participation in world affairs.

"The eight years in America from 1860 to 1868," wrote Charles Dudley Warner and his collaborator, Mark Twain, in The Gilded Age (1873), "uprooted institutions that were centuries old, changed the politics of a people, transformed the social life of half the country, and wrought so profoundly upon the entire national character that the influence cannot be measured short of two or three generations." Although many writers continued to follow older patterns, these changes in American life brought changes in at least some forms of the literature. Some changes adapted forms to the tastes of the growing middle-class reading public. Others helped in the expression of the nostalgia, the puzzlement, or the distress of people living in a transitional period.

Authors continued to write old-fashioned essays, but this form began to date as it was crowded from magazines by journalistic articles. By the end of the period, muckraking reports by Lincoln Steffens (see p. 784) and others had become much more typical. A great deal of poetry—some of it weak and imitative, some redeemed by individual qualities of its creators—was poured into prewar molds. But the period saw the rise to prominence of much popular poetry, some created by the people for the people, some written by more literate poets who consciously tried to please the growing group of readers who enjoyed poetry in dialect. Preeminently, though, this was an age of fiction, and fiction changed more than any other type of literature. There were some developments in the drama, too, which paralleled developments in fiction and which foreshadowed some achievements of the modern period.

OLDER PATTERNS of POETRY

Much poetry—"literary" poetry as contrasted with folk songs and folk poetry—showed remarkably few effects of the changing intellectual climate. Poetry in general somehow lost its vitality for many intelligent readers; it awaited a rebirth, portents of which began to appear in the final years of the period. This was partly because many poets—Bryant, Longfellow, Holmes, Lowell, Emerson, and Whittier—whose careers had begun in an earlier period continued to satisfy and to determine tastes after the war. It was partly because these established artisans and their British contemporaries were imitated in innocuous, genteel poems by hosts of inferior poets—Richard Henry Stoddard (1825-1903), Bayard Taylor (1825-78), Edmund Clarence Stedman (1833-1903), Thomas Bailey Aldrich (1836-1907), and Richard Watson Gilder (1849-1909), to name but a few. Even on a higher level, Sill, Hayne, and Moody—all of whom had important things to say and said them with real eloquence—were well satisfied with established verse forms. Crane was a minor, though arresting, exception in his use of free verse. With the exception of Whitman, who was generally ignored, even the leading poets of the period—Sidney Lanier and Emily Dickinson—usually shaped their poetry to conform with accepted schemes. Each, however, sang with a noteworthy difference.

Sidney Lanier: Musician and Poet

Sidney Lanier, in his conception of poetry, was much closer to prewar New England poets than he was to Walt Whitman. "Whitman," he charged, "is poetry's butcher. Huge raw collops slashed from the rump of poetry, and never mind gristle—is what Whitman feeds our souls with." In his lectures on The English Novel Lanier devoted a good deal of time, a bit irrelevantly, to attacks upon Whitman's heresies. And when Lanier himself wrote free verse, as he frequently did, he did not think of publishing it. Instead, he conceived of himself as writing not poems but outlines for poems which awaited more conventional artistic clothing before they were fit to appear in public. Whitman, he held, had been at his best when writing "O Captain, My Captain" because in it he had "abandoned his theory of formlessness and written in form." Like the Brahmins, Lanier saw the poet achieving greatness when he used his supreme artistry to fuse beauty and truth. "Art, to be free," he wrote, "is not to be independent of form but to be master of many forms."

Lanier's departures from conventional versification came, therefore, less because he disagreed with the older poets than because he had individual tastes and talents. Because, even better than Emerson, he knew and loved the Elizabethans, he tended to use many images and conceits which were Elizabethan in their daring. Because he was a musician and a lover of the forms of music, in several poems, notably "The Symphony," he employed organizations analogous to those of musical compositions. And also because he was a musician, he tended, as he showed in his Science of English Verse, to think of poetic rhythms as essentially the same as musical rhythms. The result of this belief was that, though he kept within the limits which he had defined, he was a master of more complex modulations of meter, of more artful handlings of vowels and consonants for melody, than any of his predecessors, save Poe, had been.

Emily Dickinson: Meaning in Miniatures

Emily Dickinson, despite the fact that only a few of her poems were published before 1890, actually was almost contemporaneous, as a writer, with her idol, Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803-1882): she began to write poetry, it appears, in the mid-fifties and continued until her death. She was probably as innocent of theories about technique as any poet could possibly be, as her test for poetry shows—"If I read a book and it makes my body so cold no fire can ever warm me, I know that is poetry. If I feel physically as if the top of my head were taken off, I know that is poetry." In all probability when such an impressionistic critic conceived of what she was doing, she did not self-consciously consider herself a rebel against established forms. Like Lanier, therefore, when she diverged from conventional procedures, she did so less because she had new theories than because, even for a poet, she was an unusual personality.

One belief of Emerson which his admirer in Amherst did share and enunciate was that a task for the poet was, as Emerson put it, to "embrace the common, . . . explore and sit at the feet of the familiar, the low." "Give me," said Emerson, "insight into to-day, and you may have the antique and future worlds." Miss Dickinson saw the poet as one who distills attars

"from the familiar species that perished by the door." So in stanzas ordinarily like those of Emerson and, incidentally, like those of church hymns, she tried to tell (again as Emerson phrased it) the "meaning" of "the meal in the firkin; the milk in the pan; ... the glance of the eye ... every trifle bristling with the polarity that ranges it instantly on an eternal law. . . ."

The common, for her, included a household group of men, women, and children; New England nature in the small range of nearby fields, and the rooms of a house as they were known to a housekeeper. She saw these with eyes focused to minute details—with intimate knowledge comparable to a nun's knowledge of each stone and lichen in her narrow cell. And when she announced what the details in her world of miniatures meant, the revelations were very personal ones—the discoveries of a mind which was both serious and playful, both mystical and whimsical. Novel imagery was the result, much of it predicted by nothing else in literature so well as by the poem "Huswifery" by seventeenth-century Edward Taylor, which had told of faith by employing conceits derived from household tasks.

"I'll Tell You How the Sun Rose" (p. 754) is in some ways typical. Like a large share of the poems by this introspective recluse, it begins with the first personal pronoun, and goes on to record highly individual insights into a common experience. In the second line she playfully interprets the sunrise in terms of feminine fineries—"A ribbon at a time"—a conceit paralleled, in the next stanza, by the image of ladylike hills "untying their bonnets." A comparison of the light with darting squirrels, two details of the commonplace scene—steeples "swimming" in "amethyst" and bobolinks bursting into song—then the soft soliloquy of the watcher, give the effect of the dawn. The end of the day is impressionistically represented, in the next two stanzas, by figures which involve children climbing a stile and a "dominie" putting up pasture bars and leading away his flock. All the details come from ordinary observations, and their very commonplaceness gives the interpretation a unique appeal.

Though this poem is less intense in thought and feeling than many by Miss Dickinson, its imagery is fairly representative. As Henry W. Wells remarks in The American Way of Poetry, "Children playing in the garret or asleep in their beds at dawn, New England customs at Thanksgiving, apples snug in the cellar through the winter, the loud ticking of the clock at night, signs on chimneys and doors, needle and thread, the little girl shut in the closet and told to be still—such images take on the most piquant and unexpected emotional meanings ... Her microscope requires only one clover and one bee to make a prairie; one flake of snow debating whether it will cross a rut suffices her to create at once a mood and a winter's day." The fusion of such homespun imagery with the thoughts and whimsies of a poet made Emily Dickinson's work a new thing.

FOLK SONGS and FOLK POETRY

One of the glories of the period 1865-1914 was the discovery, by many, of one aspect in particular of our rich native folklore—the folk songs. The scholars active before and after 1914 did not, to be sure, create the songs. The ballads had been made by humble, uneducated folk, and the scholars merely collected them and made them known. Even before the war there had been some interest in such lore, indicated by sporadic studies. Notably, young Francis James Child (1825-1896), newly appointed to the Harvard faculty, had been inspired, by study in Germany in the 1840's, to carry on research in British balladry. His lifelong work, climaxed by his five-volume collection, English and Scottish Popular Ballads (1882-1898), made such work "respectable" and aroused the interest of many scholars in the subject. Postwar interest in sectional life and in national history stimulated new enthusiasm. By the end of the period, therefore, knowledge about folk songs had increased tremendously.

During the war and the years after it, the songs which had been chanted by soldiers were collected in such volumes as Songs of Soldiers (1864), Poetry of the Civil War (1866), and Southern Poems of the War (1867). At least some of the verses drawn together in such volumes were of folk origin. Concurrently, several writers began to introduce the public to Negro spirituals in magazine articles such as "Negro Spirituals" (Atlantic Monthly, 1867) and in books such as Slave Songs of the United States (1867), Jubilee Songs (1872), and Cabin and Plantation Songs (1875). The last two volumes contained versions of folk songs as sung by the students of two newly founded institutions, Fisk and Hampton.

In the following decades, more songs of the people came slowly to light. In 1880, for example, when Joel Chandler Harris issued his first collection of Uncle Remus stories, themselves valuable as folklore, he included a number of plantation songs as he had heard them sung in Georgia. In 1883 a fine study, Games and Songs of American Children, was published by W. W. Newell. The American Folk-Lore Society began in 1888 the regular publication of its Journal, which from time to time published, along with other lore, folk songs as they were sung by the Negroes, the folk of New England, or the Southern mountaineers. Other learned journals printed occasional articles. Stedman and Hutchinson included several sections of folk songs in their anthology, A Library of American Literature (1887-1890). In 1894, Alfred M. Williams included in his Studies in Folk-Song and Popular Poetry not only the ballads of other nations but also Civil War songs and American sea-chanteys. In 1908 a new vein was opened when N. Howard Thorp, Southwestern cowhand and himself a maker of ballads, published a little pamphlet, Songs of the Cowboys, a collection in which he stated, whenever possible, exactly where, when, and from whom he had picked up each. Two years later John Lomax, who had learned at Harvard to prize the ballads he had heard as a boy and a youth in Texas, published a better-known collection, Cowboy Songs and Frontier Ballads.

During the year between these two collections, a folk song very different from cowboy ballads swept the country, carried from coast to coast by vaudeville singers and gramophone records. This was "Casey Jones" (p. 311), a railroad song which had been composed years before by some anonymous lyricist to celebrate "a brave engineer," and which was published, in a somewhat refined version, by T. L. Siebert and E. Newton. During 1909, too, a writer in the Journal of American Folk-Lore, Louise Rand Bascom, published the opening lines of another railroad song, as heard in North Carolina:

Johnie Henry was a hard-workin' man,/He died with his hammer in his hand.

These, she said, were all the words of the song she had heard. A few years later (1913) in "Songs and Rhymes from the South," an article in the same publication, E. C. Perrow printed fragments or complete versions of songs about this same John Henry which he had collected in the same publication of songs about this same John Henry which he had collected in the same publication of the sam in east Tennessee, Indiana, Mississippi, and Kentucky. All these, as well as others to be recorded later, were apparently based upon the exploits of a giant Negro who had driven steel for the Chesapeake and Ohio Big Bend Tunnel in West Virginia in the early 1870's.

This record of a few milestones tells only the beginnings of the American study of folk songs which, in the modern period, was to engage the attention of both careful scholars and lovers of poetry and music. Two rather different reasons for the awakened interest in such lore may be suggested. The study of folklore, thanks largely to the efforts of Child and his students, had become both respectable and scientific, and collectors had been initiated into the mysteries of study. For another thing, in those days when life was beginning to show its present pace and complexity, there was an attraction in the arts and cultures of the primitive, unlearned folk who sang such songs. Their traditional creations, at least, were not marred by the harassing problems of a transitional period.

The makers of the songs, naturally, plied their art for reasons which had nothing to do with either the science of ballad collecting or the distress of city folk during a time of change. Their songs came directly from their own experiences, their way of living, their feelings. To express what they had to say, they fitted poetic words of the only kind they knew to music of the only sort with which they were familiar. Thus the Negroes amalgamated the old-time hymns which whites had taught them with African rhythms which had been passed along to them by their enslaved forebears; and the isolated whites of the mountains or the prairies fashioned their compositions after the example of current songs or of ballads which had been brought to America from England or Scotland by early settlers.

These folk songs probably had few appeals to a sizable group which thought that poetry had to be elegant, genteel, and ornamental. Appreciation of balladry was usually confined to a pair of audiences differing greatly from one another. One audience, like the makers of the songs, was, in some ways, naive—shy on book knowledge, although probably learned in the emotions and behavior of real men and women. Such an audience appreciated the songs much as had their original audiences. The other audience was highly sophisticated—one which could perceive the historical value of balladry as a cultural expression, and one which could appreciate simplicity of style, suggestiveness of detail, and music which, though it differed from the music currently fashionable, had a beauty of its own.

Some poets who were not folk poets took hints about writing from the ballad makers and wrote what might be called not folk songs but "folk poetry." Some of these—Whittier, for instance—used ballad verse or metrical forms resembling it, and employed language with ballad-like simplicity. Others, in various parts of the country, wrote dialect verse.

In the South a number of poets continued the tradition which had been started before the war by Stephen Collins Foster, and wrote poetry echoing Negro melodies and employing Negro dialect. Irwin Russell (1853-1879) of Mississippi, in his Christmas Night in the Quarters (1878), produced a masterpiece of this genre, a sympathetic mingling of the Negroes' religion and humor in authentic dialect. Hayne and Lanier, as well as other less famous Southerners, also wrote poetry using Negro dialect. During the period, too, Paul Laurence Dunbar (1872-1906) in Lyrics of Lowly Life (1896) showed himself to be, as Howells held, the first writer of pure African descent "to feel the Negro life aesthetically and to express it lyrically."

The most popular dialect poetry, however, was written in the Far West and the Middle West. Outstanding were John Hay (1838-1905), author of Pike County Ballads; Bret Harte, whose most famous poem in this style was the popular "Plain Language from Truthful James" (p. 396), and James Whitcomb Riley (1849-1916), whose first book was The Old Swimmin' Hole and 'Leven More Poems (1883). At their best, such poems caught some of the flavor of rural life and some of the tang of American speech; they had wholesome humor and sentiment. At their worst, they were maudlin in their sentimental nostalgia for the "olden times." At both their best and their worst, however, they were interesting reflections of the tastes and the expressions of the feelings of the period. The extraordinary success of such writings showed that a large class of readers had come into being who were happy to buy the writings of even "humbler poets" than those Longfellow had praised—poets whose "simple and heartfelt lays" were, indeed, extraordinarily simple.

HUMOR

The period 1865-1914 is noteworthy as one during which humor perceptibly contributed to the development of fiction and merged with that type of literature. Thus our most admired humorist to date, Mark Twain, whose works were written in this period, was praised not only for making people laugh but also for writing great fiction. His mingling, in some of his work, of the techniques of comedy with the techniques of the short story and the novel was typical: many authors found the procedures of some of the humorists useful in creating postwar fiction. Some humor, by contrast, moved further and further from fiction, in the end becoming almost divorced from it.

In the years before the Civil War, magazines and newspapers—"exchanges"—came from all over the country to the office of the little Hannibal, Missouri, newspaper run by Mark's brother, Orion Clemens. Young Samuel Clemens, in the days when he was learning the printer's trade, read humorous writings in these publications and set some of them up in type. Some of the humor was that of New England—sketches and stories of Yankee characters like Jack Downing. More often it was the fine brand of humor then being produced in the part of the country with which he was familiar, the old Southwest—Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Missouri.

Southwestern Yarnspinners

One important thing about much of this Southwestern humor was its relationship to a favorite frontier pastime, yarnspinning. Traveling across country, moving down river, resting at night by campfires, household firesides, or by glowing stoves, the people of the section (like rural folk elsewhere in the country) found that good stories helped pass the time pleasantly. Able storytellers were greatly admired, and political figures like Davy Crockett and Abe Lincoln who were masters of the art could win votes by spinning yarns for their constituents. So the art of oral narration flourished on the frontier.

The stories ranged all the way from wild fantasy to fairly straightforward accounts of everyday happenings. Some fireside yarns were playful lies comparable to their modern survivors, "fish stories" or Walt Disney animated cartoons. Their tellers, like Ovid Bolus, described in Baldwin's The Flush Times of Alabama and Mississippi, "lied with a relish . . . lied with a coming appetite, growing with what it fed on . . . lied from the delight of invention and the charm of fictitious narrative." They lied about the astonishing fertility of the soil, about encounters with huge beasts, as did Jim Doggett in "The Big Bear of Arkansas" (p. 338). Almost as often, in some parts of the country, they imaginatively exaggerated the poverty of the soil, telling of land so poor that birds flying across it had to carry rations, so poor that if a buyer couldn't read he was likely to learn to his sorrow that the seller had got rid of two sections instead of the one contracted for.

Such lies about land, climate, and beasts were inventive and fantastic, and so were those about certain mythical heroes—gigantic comic demigods capable, so the stories asserted, of superhuman deeds. Among these were Mike Fink, keelboat king on Western rivers; Davy Crockett, hunter, congressman, and warrior; John Henry, the Negro steeldriver; Pecos Bill, the rootin-tootin Texas cowboy; Paul Bunyan, mighty logger of the whole north country from Maine to Washington. Some of the tall tales which gifted truth-stretchers recounted about a few of these worthies began to get into print as early as the 1820's. Mike Fink, for instance, was introduced in a short story in the Western Souvenir in 1828, and between that date and 1914 stories about him were told in a hundred varied publications—books, magazines, almanacs, and newspapers. Davy Crockett, who became prominent about the same time, was yarned about in even more publications. As the period ended, Paul Bunyan stories began to appear, and after 1914 all three heroes were to be celebrated by a number of authors.

The printed yarns about these men and others of their ilk were definitely influenced by the forms of the oral tales. Many details were products of the soaring frontier imagination; some of them were indeed fantastic (see the almanac stories of Davy Crockett, p. 321). But the incongruity which made the tales comic was the incongruity between the actual and the impossible. Thus though whole sequences of events were completely impossible, happening was made to arise from happening in an elaborately logical fashion. An earthy dialect style rather than the majestic language of inspired poetry matter-of-factly recounted astonishing feats. Details painstakingly rendered—highly authentic details—gave added verisimilitude. Sometimes, even touches which were quite vulgar heightened contrasts between the earthy and the unearthly. A few lines after Jim Doggett had poetically evoked a giant bear of Arkansas which "loomed like a black mist," Jim was shamefacedly telling about losing his pants. And frequently, though the tale was impossible by any sane standards, the character of the teller, and his motives for inventing his lie, were most plausibly rendered. The playfulness of tall tales was underlined, in short, by the constant reminders of actuality.

Even more of actuality entered into stories of another sort told by Western firesides and eventually translated into print—comic tales about more commonplace frontier characters and happenings. Several reasons for authenticity in such narratives may be cited. There was a desire on the part of some sophisticated storytellers and writers to show that they, like eighteenth-century British humorists, could detachedly perceive and appreciate "originals" and "eccentrics." Again, there was a wish, on the part of many, to write history—as A. B. Longstreet put it, in his pioneer book, Georgia Scenes. "... to supply a chasm in history which has always been overlooked—the manners, customs, amusements, wit, dialect, as they appear in all grades of society to an eye and ear witness. ..." Finally, of course, there was a desire to entertain one's fellows. Lawyers, for instance, riding the circuits, said Samuel A. Hammett, in 1853, "living as they do in the thinly inhabited portion of our land, and among a class of persons generally their inferiors in point of education . . . are apt to seek for amusement in listening to the droll stories and odd things always to be heard at the country store or bar-room."

Whatever their motivation, authors who wrote such tales managed among them to record in extraordinary detail many aspects of frontier life. Franklin J. Meine, in his excellent anthology, Tall Tales of the Southwest, lists a group of subjects that is strikingly inclusive—local customs, games, courtships, weddings, law circuits, political life, hunting, travel, medicine, gambling, religion, fights, and oddities in character. As Bernard De Voto claims, in Mark Twan's America, "No aspect of the life in the simpler America is missing from this literature." The details about backgrounds, costumes, mores, and dialect are plentiful and vivid. Regardless of their crudities and exaggerations, such authors as Crockett, Thorpe, Thompson, and G. W. Harris represent the first American achievement of what later was called "realism."

Although some humorists, for instance Finley Peter Dunne, continued the older style, humor in general after the Civil War followed two channels. That which was generally classified as "humor" lost much of its prewar localized quality—tended in fact to become divorced from fiction. Professional humorists such as Josh Billings (p. 348) and Artemus Ward (p. 345) managed to appeal to larger audiences than ante-bellum humorists had by replacing much of the humor of regional scene and individualized characters with humor which depended almost exclusively upon expression; and background, character, and plot became unimportant. Characters became generalized so that it was practically impossible for readers to tell where they lived (except somewhere on the North American continent) and whether they were good or bad, wise or foolish. The source of laughter, rather, was the style—ludicrously assembled sentences, words badly spelled, malapropisms, puns, and the like. This, then, was the first type of humor that developed after the war. The second type merged with a kind of fiction which flourished between about 1868 and 1900—local color.

LOCAL COLOR

In the decade following the end of the Civil War, Whittier and Harriet Beecher Stowe of New England, Bret Harte of the Far West, Edward Eggleston and Mark Twain of the Middle West, and George Washington Cable of the Deep South all won enthusiastic praise for their depictions of life and character in their particular corners of the country. This was the beginning of a great movement in fiction in the United States. In 1894, critic Edward E. Hale, Jr., could write, in The Dial. "Everybody writes 'local' stories nowadays; it is as natural as whooping cough." There was a slight exaggeration in this statement, but certainly at least a vast number of authors were so engaged. Mary Noailles Murfree of Tennessee, Joel Chandler Harris of Georgia, Sarah Orne Jewett of Maine, Mary E. Wilkins Freeman of Massachusetts, and O. Henry of Texas and New York City are only a few of scores who wrote such fiction.

Directly or indirectly, much of this writing was influenced by the prewar humor of New England or the old Southwest. Mrs. Stowe's best work took the form of fireside yarns (p. 381), many of them humorous, spun by a quaint Yankee character, Sam Lawson. It seems probable that Edward Eggleston (p. 398) learned much of his art from such dialect humorists as Jack Downing, Hosea Biglow, and various Southwestern practitioners. Miss Murfree admittedly was indebted to Sut Lovingood. Joel Chandler Harris, too, and O. Henry (p. 448) knew American humor well, and actually wrote a good deal of it themselves, before they began to write fiction. And it is noteworthy that Bret Harte, who was so successful that many fictionists paid him the tribute of imitation, definitely believed that the humorous story of "bar-rooms, gatherings in the 'country store,' and . . . public meetings" was "the parent of the American 'short story.'"

Naturally, it was not so simple as that. Many influences which had shaped our fiction in the past continued to shape it. The genial essays of Irving, sentimental novels, the writings of Scott, Cooper, Dickens, and others left their imprint. Yet the prewar humorous story was influential in ways which Harte suggested when he described it: "It was concise and condensed, yet suggestive . . . delightfully extravagant—or a miracle of understatement. It voiced not only the dialect, but the habits of thought of a people or locality. . . . It went directly to the point." Many details in this formula applied to representative local color stories.

So far as the local colorists, in their narratives, lived up to this description, they tended to be recorders of actuality. Several thought of themselves as merely reflectors of life. Typical was Mrs. Stowe's claim that in her New England fiction she tried to "make her mind as still and passive as a looking-glass, or a mountain lake," in order that she might reflect "New England life and character." "My studies for this object," she said, "have been . . . taken from real characters, real scenes, and real incidents." But perhaps because of the example set by romantic fictionists, perhaps, also, because of the nostalgia which most writers felt for the past, local colorists tended to write not of the scene of the day but of a day that was ended. So Mrs. Stowe wrote of the New England of her childhood, Eggleston of the Indiana of frontier days, Harte of the California of the Gold Rush, and others of happy ante-bellum plantations. The mists of time blurred the mirrors somewhat, and the local colorists as a rule avoided the sordid and the tragic in favor of geniality, sentiment, and pathos.

MARK TWAIN: HUMORIST and LOCAL COLORIST

Reared on the frontier and instructed in writing by prewar Yankee and Southwestern humorists, Mark Twain came into national prominence in the years when postwar professional humorists and local colorists were flourishing. In his varied writings the student of humor may see evidence of the influences of all these schools. But since Samuel L. Clemens happened to be a genius, he frequently managed to surpass his teachers.

Most of Twain's ephemeral works and passages are the creations of a "Funny Man" who was working rather too hard to get laughs. At their worst such creations were typified by the "Thomas Jefferson Snodgrass Letters," which he wrote in the late fifties, newspaper screeds soon forgotten and not reprinted until they were dug up by scholars as specimens of his youthful efforts. The style was like that of Artemus Ward and his cohorts of the postwar period—a style notable for cacography and for outlandish expressions. Later, Clemens, like other humorists of the school, refined this style somewhat—dropping bad spelling, for instance—in various sketches and in parts of his travel books. Often, in using the later style, he was quite funny. At its best, nevertheless, this type of humor never marked his highest reaches And now and then—as in some later chapters of Huckleberry Finn—burlesque and buffoonery struck discordant notes

The artistry of the frontier oral story, by contrast, was one of Twain's most important assets. Having lived in the frontier town of Hannibal, traveled around the whole country, and worked on river boats and in mining camps, he had, by 1865, heard as well as read a great number of humorous stories told by master storytellers. He knew, as he said in "How to Tell a Story," that ". . . the humorous story is strictly a work of art, high and delicate art—and only an artist can tell it." He knew important aspects of the technique: "The humorous story is told gravely; the teller does his best to conceal the fact that there is anything funny about it. . . ." Again, "To string incongruities and absurdities together in a wandering and sometimes purposeless way, and seem innocently unaware that they are absurdities, is the basis of the American art. . . ." Finally, he knew how the introductory framework of an enclosed narrative, as well as the language and thoughts of the yarnspinner, might be made to reveal the narrator as an appealing or amusing character. When, therefore, Clemens heard the "Jumping Frog" story unfolded by a mining-camp fireside in 1865, he was able to write it out in a masterly form (p. 454). And when later, in "Baker's Blue-Jay Yarn" (p. 477) and elsewhere, he created tall tales in the style of "A Coon Hunt in a Fency Country" (p. 327) and "The Big Bear of Arkansas," his were even better than those ante-bellum masterpieces.

Twain's travel books and to some extent his novels were combinations of similar brief narratives with longer chronological accounts. As Mr. De Voto remarks, in Mark Twain's America. "He took the humorous anecdote, combined it with autobiographical reminiscence, and so achieved the narrative form best adapted to his mind. . . . The Innocents Abroad is structurally an autobiographical narrative. Descriptive passages . . . interrupt the narrative from time to time but its steady progress is accomplished by means of stories. Some of them are brief, unelaborated anecdotes, in no way different from the type out of which they proceed, but others already show Mark's perception that this form can be utilized for more intricate effects. . . . The same framework produces Roughing It. A Tramp Abroad, Life on the Mississippi, and Following the Equator." Similarly in novels such as The Gilded Age and Huckleberry Finn Twain constructed mosaics made up of anecdotal units.

Just as anyone familiar with humor sees these resemblances, so anyone familiar with local color writing notes resemblances to writings of that type. The material for all of Twain's best narratives was his boyhood home, Hannibal, or the great river which rolled before it. More accurately, the stuff of his best works was not the actuality but his memory of the scenes and of the life he had known in childhood and youth. Memory, somehow, had blurred away most sordid and unlovely details, leaving an idyll to be set forth in nostalgic fiction. The localized details and the longing for times past were completely typical of local color fiction.

Two skills in particular give Twain's best fiction, long or short, much of its distinction: ability to characterize and ability to use words in a masterly fashion. Other humorists in America before Twain had managed, at best, to create only a few memorable characters.

Twain dotted his pages with them with a prodigality comparable to that of Chaucer or Dickens. And he had such descriptive skill, such a knack for portraying actions, such an accurate ear for speech that he could make both characters who appeared for a few lines and characters whose stories occupied many pages come alive for readers. As a stylist, also, he was outstanding. He took great pains with style; it is remarkable that a large share of his remarks about literature touch knowingly upon this aspect of writing. Some of his reasons for praising a sentence which he quotes are illuminating: "For compactness, simplicity, and vigor of expression, I will 'back' that sentence against any in literature." He praises a letter from his daughter Susan for "clearness of statement, directness, felicity of expression, photographic ability in setting forth an incident—style—good style—no barnacles on it in the way of unnecessary, retarding words." He came close to living up to the ideal implied by these comments. He wrote very much as he talked, transferring to the printed page the natural rhythms of unpretentious speech, both when he set down his own thoughts and when he quoted the words of characters. His words were simple; almost always they were distinctly American; and he used them economically. Perhaps even more important, without any appearance of being "literary," he was able to find words which gave full scope to his exuberant, poetic imagination. It makes some sense, therefore, to claim, as some critics do, that Mark Twain was the first great stylist who wrote purely in the American language.

VARIED TYPES of REALISM

Comic tall tales, by juxtaposing the workaday world with the world of fantasy, made fun of imaginative excesses, and even the most extravagant American humor was in some ways anti-romantic. Since funny character sketches drew many details directly from actuality, some of the humor led the way toward fiction which was concerned with ordinary characters and scenes. Local color writing, which had a similar concern, also departed to some extent from the romantic fiction of the ante-bellum period. Scholars, therefore, see in both humorous writing and local color writing a trend toward "realism" which culminated, toward the end of the century, in numerous realistic and naturalistic fictional works.

The term "realism," like its counterpart "romanticism," is a vague term which has been variously defined. The group pursuing it in this period differed in theory and practice. They generally agreed, probably, that realistic fiction truly presented "actuality"—"real life"—and that it was concerned with the near, rather than the distant, in time and place. Most realists, therefore, believed that the probability of happenings in novels might properly be tested, not by rules set up by the inventor of an imaginative world but by what was likely in the actions of living men and women. Alice might properly dwindle to a minute size in Wonderland, but not in a realistic novel, since there the laws of physics and of biology as well as the stern limitations of heredity and environment were constantly operative. So far there was agreement; but disagreement naturally arose when authors tried to define "actuality." Where was the "real" to be found—in the world itself, in the inductively discovered scientific truths about the nature of the world, in the impression which the world made upon the observer's mind, or in a combination of these? The methods of authors depended upon their answer to this question and upon their ability to portray what they considered to be reality.

Clemens clearly indicated how he thought art should portray actuality when, in a newspaper letter of 1867, he thus criticized a painting by Bierstadt: "Now, to sum up the picture's merits, those snow-peaks are correct—they look natural; the valley is correct and natural; the pine trees clinging to the bluff on the right, and the grove on the left, and the boulders, are all like nature. . . . But when I got around to the atmosphere, I was obliged to say 'This man has imported this atmosphere . . . from some foreign country, because nothing like it was ever seen in California.' "Steadfastly Twain believed that the artist in colors or in words did his work best when he was "true to nature," accurately and honestly recording what he saw. "There is nothing," he wrote in a personal letter of 1868, "that makes me prouder than to be regarded by intelligent people as 'authentic.' "So far as he could, therefore, he made his fiction an exact transcript of life. Only because his memory changed thangs, because his notions of propriety changed things, and because he was something of a poet did he (to use his own terms) "import" the "atmosphere" in his best narratives.

William Dean Howells, Twain's close friend, had at the start of his career a similar conception of the task of the fictionist. Fiction, Howells also thought, should be lifelike. Moreover, it should concern itself only with the most ordinary facets of life. A passage in Their Wedding Journey (1872) concerning the people in a railway car suggests the attitude: "It was in all respects an ordinary carful of human beings, and it was perhaps the more worthy to be studied on that account. As in literature the true artist will shun the use even of real events if they are of an improbable character, so the sincere observer of man will not desire to look upon his heroic or occasional phases, but will seek him in his habitual moods of vacancy and tiresomeness. To me, at any rate, he is at such times very precious. . . ." Since he followed this formula, the literalness of Howells' transcripts in his early writings was significant. But he recognized certain limitations —limitations which kept his literalness from being complete. It is important to recall that he first glimpsed the possibilities of realism while reading the comedies of Carlo Goldoni and that he was extremely fond, all his life, of the witty novels of Jane Austen. Like these two writers, he tended to concern himself, at the start of his career, more with the comedies of human experience than with the tragedies. In addition, because he believed that American life, typically, was relatively pure, and because he held that, even if it were not, it was wrong for an American novelist "to deal with certain facts of life which are not usually talked of before young people, and especially young ladies," he rather prudishly limited his treatment of sex.

An admirer of Howells, Harold Frederic (p. 621), and Joseph Kirkland (p. 603) as well, had much the general attitude Howells had about the fiction writer: his task was to serve up "a slice of life." Kırkland's Zury: the Meanest Man in Spring County, he told an acquaintance, was authentic: "I know farm life. All the characters in Zury have their prototypes in my down-state acquaintances. The book is as true as I could make it. Many of its incidents are literally exact." But both Frederic and Kirkland were less convinced of the need for limitations upon subject matter than Howells was. Frederic, as he demonstrated clearly in Seth's Brother's Wite (1887) and The Lauton Girl (1890), was not averse to treating sex in a fashion which might distress young ladies; The Damnation of Theron Ware (1896) dealt in an equally frank way with religion. And Kirkland admitted his indebtedness to an English novelist who was in those days considered quite daring. "This novel," he wrote of Zury, "is a palpable imitation of Thomas Hardy's Far from the Madding Crowd; an attempt to reproduce on American soil the unflinching realism given by that remarkable work of English low life down in actual contact with the soil itself." The word "unflinching" as well as Kirkland's uninhibited treatment of moral problems in Zury showed that he had an attitude toward frankness in the novel closer to that of Hardy than to that of Howells.

When Hamlin Garland met Howells in Cambridge, Massachusetts, in 1885, Garland had, so Howells said later, "convictions flatteringly like mine" As Garland made clear in Crumbling Idols (1894, p. 616), he believed in what a French critic had dubbed "veritism." The true artist, he held, "must consciously stand alone before nature and before life" and must sincerely set down "the drama of the average type of character." In two ways, however, he departed from the early Howells. In the first place, Garland was moderately frank in his consideration of sex. ("I am old-fashioned," wrote Howells of this tendency in 1912, "and I have moments when I could wish that the author had not been of such unsparing conscience.") In the second place, Garland, under the tutelage of a group of assorted nineteenth-century thinkers, acquired the belief that "to fiction is given the task of subtilely embodying the splendid creed" of improvement—social, moral, and philosophical. "It is safe to say,"

he prophesied in Crumbling Idols, "that the fiction of the future will grow more democratic in outlook and more individualistic in method. . . . The higher art would seem to be the art that perceives and states the relations of things, giving atmosphere and relative values as they appear to the sight." Hence, Main-Travelled Roads not only pictured some of the harsher aspects of Middlewestern farm life, it also crusaded against conditions and suggested remedies

By the time this first collection of Garland's stories appeared, Howells, too, had come to believe that fiction should have an element—one of great importance—which had been lacking in his early fiction. His first encounter—at fifty—with Tolstoy's writings had, as Howells indicated in My Literary Passions, brought about a change in his thinking. "He,' wrote Howells, "has been to me that final consciousness which he speaks of so easily in his essay on Life. I came in it to the knowledge of myself in ways that I had not dreamt before, and began at last to discern my relations to the race, without which we are nothing. The supreme art in literature had its highest effect in making me set art forever below humanity. . . ." What this meant was that Howells, in Annie Kilburn (1889), A Hazard of New Fortunes (1890), The World of Chance (1893), and his other mature novels became a novelist of social purpose—selecting characters not only because they were typical but also because their characteristics and their stories preached sermons about society and economics.

NATURALISM

Just as the line between some local color fiction and some realism is hard to draw, it is difficult to distinguish clearly and surely between realism and some "naturalism," another "ism" about which there was, in this period, a great deal of discussion. In general, the American naturalists—Crane, Norris, Dreiser, and others—took at least some of their cues from a group of authors, led by Émile Zola (1840-1902), who were important in France after 1880 The characteristics of the French group have been admirably summarized by Professors Nitze and Dargan in their History of French Literature: "Naturalism . . . is an excessive form of Realism and is usually considered as possessing the following characteristics. First, it allows a still larger variety of subjects, emphasizing the lower and coarser forms of life; it presents this material in a form which is often revolting; it rejects ideality, it minimizes heart-interest and plot interest in favor of 'facts' and notations; it magnifies the study of the industries and seeks to apply to fiction the processes of the natural sciences; from these, taken in their application to heredity and environment, it draws its conception of life-deterministic, fatalistic, essentially pessimistic. The laws of brute Nature are viewed as grimly controlling the destinies of helpless and hopeless men." An interesting fact about this accurate description of a literary method is that it deals more with the philosophical views of novelists than with their fictional technique. The reason may well be that, for the naturalistic writers, "actuality" is located not merely in life itself but also in the philosophical interpretation of life. For Zola, art was nature, yes, but nature as it was interpreted by the artist. In a fashion comparable to that of the scientist, theoretically, the naturalist exposed his sensibility to life and then "scientifically" worked with characters and actions known through his experience. But the vast difference between the artist and the scientist whom he thought he was imitating was that the artist, unable really to prove his hypotheses in the laboratory, took them for granted and merely illustrated them from his experience.

American naturalists resembled their French prototypes in treating subjects barred even from realistic writings, in treating lower forms of life—thus differing from realists in their details. Also each American naturalist, on the basis of his own reading and his own thinking, created characters and plots illustrative of his own peculiar "scientific" convictions. Thus Dreiser, believing that men's actions were "chemical compulsions," pictured situations and happenings which made clear that characters had no control over their actions. Believing, further, that "the race was to the swift and the battle to the strong," he devised plots which showed weak characters conquered by ruthless and mighty opponents. Norris, excitedly perceiving both unconquerable forces of Nature and the relentless man-made power of the soulless railroad, devised in The Octopus a plot which showed Force at work: "Men were mere nothings, mere animalculae, mere ephemerides that fluttered and fell and were forgotten between dawn and dusk. . . . Men were nought, death was nought, life was nought. Force only existed—Force that brought men into the world—Force that crowded them out to make way for the succeeding generation—Force that made the wheat grow—Force that garnered it from the soil to give place to the succeeding crop." And Stephen Crane showed the hero of The Red Badge of Courage discovering naturalistic truths on the blood-drenched field of battle, or showed the correspondent in "The Open Boat" becoming aware of the complete indifference of Nature to puny men.

Dreiser, unlike some of the French naturalists, had a good deal of contempt for niceties of style. Not so Norris and Crane. Norris used a great deal of symbolism, some of it rather explicit—readers may feel a bit obvious. (The slaughter of the sheep, p. 642, is an example.) Crane, rather more subtle as a poet, was sometimes less labored in his handling of symbolism, but much of it came into his work—usually in the form of images seen through the eyes and interpreted by the minds of his characters. Such images both pictured and interpreted details. The correspondent in "The Open Boat," for instance, thus saw a wind-tower on the tantalizing beach. "This tower was a giant, standing with its back to the plight of the ants. It represented in a degree, to the correspondent, the serenity of nature amid the struggle of the individual—nature in the wind, and nature in the vision of men. She did not seem cruel to him then, nor beneficent, nor treacherous, nor wise. But she was indifferent, flatly indifferent." Touches similar to this were to give significance, later, to backgrounds and actions in the writings of such diverse authors as Willa Cather, Ernest Hemingway, and John Steinbeck.

HENRY JAMES

To Stephen Crane, probably the most intuitive artist of the period, thoughts and feelings of characters, then, were important. To Henry James, probably the most conscious artist, they were even more important. As his "The Art of Fiction" (p. 547) shows, James was a careful thinker about the nature of reality, the nature of art, and the relationship between the two. His belief was that "reality," as a story presented it, was twice translated, once through the author's experiencing of it, again through the artistic representation of it. Both the initial impression and the execution were important.

For him a novel "in its broadest definition" was "a personal, a direct impression of life: that, to begin with, constitutes its value, which is greater or less according to the intensity of the impression." For a person with the kind of sensitivity needed in writing great fiction, he went on, "Experience is never limited, and it is never complete; it is an immense sensibility, a kind of huge spider-web of the finest silken threads suspended in the chamber of consciousness, and catching every air-borne particle in its tissue." Since "impressions were experience," James did not hesitate to advise the novice, "Try to be one of the people on whom nothing is lost!"

But having gained such a sensitive and complete impression of life, the artist, James contended, also had the problem of giving his fiction "that air of reality (solidity of specification)" which he felt was "the supreine virtue of the novel—the merit on which all its other merits . . . helplessly and submissively depend." James was aware throughout his career that to achieve this end through artistry was a highly complicated and delicate business. A brilliant series of Prefaces which he wrote, in his maturity, for the volumes of his collected works showed in detail how, during his artistic lifetime, he struggled with problems of form to give his writings exactly the intended "effects."

Such a conception of fiction clearly sets James off from those practitioners who believed that the best fiction was the exact reproduction of life as well as from those who believed that it was an embodiment of naturalistic generalizations about life. Since he saw reality—even generalizations about reality—as a series of impressions, and since he saw fiction as the artistic rendition of such impressions, his sort of realism was essentially a complicated psychological process. In his writings, more than others, therefore, one sees the impact of the newer psychology in which Henry James' brother, William, was a leading authority. One sees, too, progress in the development of a technique which had been notably advanced even before James by George Eliot in England and Gustave Flaubert in France—the technique of making new psychological insights a vital part of fiction.

How James' notions led him to shape the form of a narrative is shown in some of their details in his 1907 Preface to Roderick Hudson (1876), wherein he told how that book had been written. After a "story idea" had come to him, the chief difficulty, he suggested, was to decide exactly how to limit "developments" so as to interrelate them. "Up to what point," he asked himself, "is such and such a development indispensable to interest? . . . When, for the complete expression of one's subject, does a particular relation stop—giving way to some other not concerned in that expression?" The complexity of experience made this problem difficult: "Really, universally, relations stop nowhere, and the exquisite problem of the artist is eternally but to draw, by a geometry of his own, the circle within which they shall happily appear to do so." Selection and arrangement therefore were absolutely necessary. He needed to hit upon exactly the right details of background; he needed (though later he felt he had failed, in this particular book) to devise an adequate time scheme; he needed—and this was very important—to find a "centre, the point of command of all the rest." In this story, such a center was the impression of the whole action received by someone other than Hudson. "From this centre the subject has been treated, from this centre the interest has spread, and so, whatever else it may do or may not do, the thing has acknowledged a principle of composition and continues at least to hang together. . . . The centre of interest throughout ... is Rowland Mallet's consciousness-which I had of course to make sufficiently acute to enable it, like a set and lighted scene, to hold the play." James believed that what Mallet saw, felt, or guessed could, if properly rendered, be made to give the story unity, movement, and meaning. Though James gave details about a number of additional procedures, this summary traces a main line of his typical thought about his artistry.

An author with such concerns obviously was bound to write narratives which differed greatly from those by most of James' contemporaries. James, naturally, was horrified by what he saw as the formlessness of many fictional works. He believed, as he said in "The Art of Fiction," that "... a novel is a living thing, all one and continuous, like any other organism, and in proportion as it lives it will be found, I think, that in each of the parts is something of the other parts." And he learned that quite often his most useful step in achieving the selectivity and the arrangement necessary for such an organic entity was the location of the story in the mind of some character—a consciousness, like Rowland's, say, "connected intimately with the general human exposure, and thereby bedimmed and befooled and bewildered, anxious, restless, fallible," in short "not too acute," but endowed, nevertheless, "with such intelligence that the appearances reflected in it, and constituting together there the situation and the 'story,' should become by that fact intelligible." Thus the sensitive author had, in the story, a sensitive counterpart whose limitations and perceptions both bounded and filled in the pattern. Working in such a fashion, James became a leader in calling attention to the importance of the "fictional point of view"—to the values to be derived from letting a narrative unfold as it was experienced by some character. Psychology thus became of central importance in his fiction, and its hitherto unexploited potentialities for writers were suggested to a great number of authors who followed James.

The DRAMA

In general, the period between the Civil War and 1914 was one of depression in the history of American drama. Hundreds of plays, to be sure, were produced, and many were admired; but few have proved to be worthy of memory. As Barrett Clark says of the plays of the period in An Hour of American Drama: "It is not the quaintness of the language and the labored style of these plays that has caused them to be forgotten, it is the fundamental fact that they are the products of superficial writers, of men who could believe that 'plays are not written but rewritten,' an epigram appropriately attributed to [such popular playwrights of the period as] Boucicault, Bronson Howard, Augustin Daly, Augustus Thomas, and a dozen other able playmakers. The kind of plays these men wrote were indeed rewritten: they had to be. But here 'rewritten' means picked apart, built up, 'lifted,' like a dowager's face, put on a diet, painted, and rouged." During this comparatively arid period, productive chiefly of melodramas and slick plays cunningly designed to lure cash customers, there were three tendencies of some significance, each comparable to some contemporary development in fiction: toward realism, toward the more intelligent consideration of serious problems, and toward symbolism.

Hamlin Garland, lecturing on "Local Color in Fiction and Drama," was able, so he said later, to consider quite a few playwrights who, like his favorite fiction writers, were moving toward realism via stage representations of the life and character of certain regions. Examples—typical, though in some ways superior—were Bronson Howard (1842-1908), who in Shenandoah (1888) vividly pictured the valley of the title as it had been during the war; James A. Herne (1839-1901), who made a noteworthy effort to draw true-to-life characters against a homely background in Margaret Fleming (1890) and Shore Acres (1892); and Augustus Thomas (1837-1934), who dramatized the life of varied sections in plays such as Alabama (1891), In Mizzouri (1893), The Capitol (1895), and Arizona (1899).

These same authors serve as well as others to show how the drama, like the novel of purpose, began to consider various problems. Here, Americans were particularly influenced by the Norwegian Henrik Ibsen (1828-1906), who became world famous during this period as an author of problem plays. Herne's Shore Acres was much discussed not only because it was realistic but also because it contained references to advanced scientific and social ideas, and Margaret Fleming dealt with family relationships in a fashion then considered quite daring. Bronson Howard's The Henrietta (1887) satirized the fever and the greed of financial and social life. And Thomas treated pseudo-scientific topics such as hypnotism, psychological domination, and mental healing in plays including The Witching Hour (1907) and As a Man Thinks (1911).

Toward the end of the period, many critics of the day found in Clyde Fitch (1865-1909) a man who could fuse sincerity and artistry with good theater. Fitch's creed, as he expressed it in "The Play and the Public," sounded like one of the definitions of realism then current in writings about fiction:

In the modern play, I feel myself very strongly the particular value—a value I can't help feeling inestimable—of reflecting absolutely and truthfully the life and environment about us. Be truthful, and then nothing can be too big, nothing should be too small, so long as it is here, and there. Every class, every kind, every emotion, every motive, every occupation, every business, every idleness. . . . Apart from the question of literalism, apart from the question of art, reflect the real thing with true observation and with sincere feeling for what it is and what it represents, and that is art and literature.

Fitch tried to follow this formula in a varied group of plays—dramas which not only tried to be "true to life" but which also commented upon various problems. The Climbers (1901) and The City (1909) were serious portrayals of various aspects—political, financial, and social—of New York life. The Girl with the Green Eyes (1902) and The Truth (1906) were interesting psychological studies, the first of a character abnormally jealous, the second of a congenital liar. The feeling of a reader today is likely to be that these plays have fine stuff in them—as fine as anything to be found in the theater of the era—but that they suffer because

Fitch, like other dramatists, had to shape his work to make it appeal to theatergoers who were a little too fond of broad effects.

In The New York Idea (1906, p. 681), Langdon Mitchell, active contemporaneously with Fitch, showed rather more of a tendency to deal with problems than a tendency toward realism. Nevertheless, since this drama, like Royall Tyler's The Contrast and a host of other plays, was a social comedy, it was essentially realistic in a good many of its details And its deft construction and witty dialogue made it more memorable than many dramas of its day which were heavily serious.

William Vaughn Moody, a poet and a professor, started his career as a "practical dramatist" after having written poetic dramas which were profound in their ideas and impressive as poetry, but which had no chance of professional presentation. When he tried his hand at writing plays which might be produced, his very aloofness from the commercial theater helped him avoid some of its bad tendencies. As Walter Prichard Eaton remarks in The Drama in English: "The superficial traits of modern drama meant little to him, one way or the other. It was its deeper spirit he was after." Having such an attitude, and having, moreover, a real flair for dramatizing the psychologies of characters and for representing ideas by action, he wrote for the stage The Great Divide, a surprisingly successful play. This drama had in it, to be sure, elements of sensationalism and melodrama; but these were means to an end rather than ends themselves. Actually The Great Divide was a symbolic representation of the conflict between the Puritanical tradition of New England on the one hand and, on the other, the frontier's impulsive gusto for life. It showed the approach of a poet, "Poetry," Moody believed, "is the salvation of the stage. . . . It is the poetry in a play that makes it great." A play written in such a spirit, although in retrospect it might seem a bit crude, pointed to a better period in the American theater. As Mr. Eaton asserts, "With a play like this the modern drama in America was coming of age." W. B.

"I HEAR AMERICA SINGING"

The many ways of living in America between the Civil War and 1914 influenced various makers of folk songs. Groups had their own individual favorites, and they kept these anonymous creations alive by singing them again and again. Since the forms of these works were not frozen in print, what typically happens to folk songs happened to them words or even lines were changed, and sometimes whole stanzas disappeared. Early settlers had brought to America a number of Scotch and English ballads which were still being sung and admired by their descendants. The American songs had many qualities of these older ballads: intriguing uses of incremental repetitions and refrains, dramatic ways of unfolding happenings, ways of leaping over some details and of presenting others with minute care.

Whittier, among the famous literary men, and four or five scholars were about the only Americans who paid much heed to these American songs until the 1860's But in the period following the war, and in the twentieth century the growing interest of Americans in our social and literary history caused many literary men and scholars to become active as students of the folklore.

H Hubbard, Railroad Avenue, New York, 1945 • (In addition to these books, a number of recordings of folk songs will be of great value—those made by such singers as Burl Ives, Paul Robeson, Marian Anderson, Carl Sandburg, and John Jacob Niles, as well as the recordings of nonprofessional folk singers issued by the Archive of American Folk Song of the Library of Congress)

Spirituals

The Negroes were the makers of the spirituals—religious songs which, as a rule, translated Biblical tales or Christian sentiments into the idiom of the race Details about the origins of the songs are not known, but two things seem likely: that the camp meetings of Southern whites in pre-

Civil War days suggested both words and ways of singing, and that both the sense of rhythm and the racial experiences of the Negroes molded the songs. Unable to express their feelings directly, the Negroes often interpreted their own experiences in Biblical stories and lyrics.

"Go Down, Moses," for example—used as Harriet Tubman's signal of safety as she, a former slave, helped many other Negroes escape to freedom—translated the bondage of Israel into a parallel of their own enslavement Hundreds of spirituals were composed, and most of them have noble themes simply and sincerely developed and fitted to moving tunes Even more than other folk songs, these must be heard to be appreciated.

Go Down, Moses

When Israel was in Egypt's land,

Let my people go!

Oppress'd so hard dey could not stand,

Let my people go!

Chorus

Go down, Moses,

Way down in Egypt's land.
Tell ole Pha-roah,

Let my people go!

Thus say de Lawd, bold Moses said,
Let my people go!

If not I'll smite your first-born dead,
Let my people go!

No more shall dey in bondage toil, Let my people go! Let dem come out wid Egypt's spoil, Let my people go!

Lay Dis Body Down

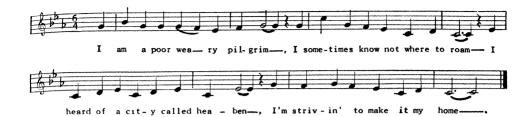

I know moon-rise, I know star-rise,
Lay dis body down,
I walk in de moonlight, I walk in de starlight,
To lay dis body down.

I walk in de graveyard, I walk troo de graveyard, To lay dis body down. I'll lie in de grass and stretch out my arms— Lay dis body down.

I go to de judgment in de evenin' of de day,
When I lay dis body down;
And my soul and your soul will meet in de day
When I lay dis body down.

Cowboy Songs

Rich in ballad lore, the cowboys of the plains in some of their songs told of the work of the cowboy—caring for cattle in the wintertime, rounding them up in the spring, driving them up the trail to market. Many songs were used for practical purposes, to stir up the cattle or to quiet them when they were nervous at night. Others told stories of adventures or of love affairs, and the old stuff of balladry took on new coloring because of the way men lived in the cow country. Since many of the cowhands came from the Southern uplands, where old British ballads were preserved by singing, many cowboy tunes are reminiscent of the older ones. But since Americans had developed tunes of a different sort, several mutations—modifications of the older tunes—were frequent "Oh Bury Me Not on the Lone Prairie" offers an example of such a modified old melody, in this case a parody of a sentimental ballad entitled "The Ocean Burial". The simple guitar accompaniment to many of these songs accentuates the distinctive rhythm of cowboy ballads

Of the songs that follow, "Whoopee Ti Yi Yo" tells of the spring roundup, "Good-by, Old Paint" is addressed to a good pony, "The Old Chisholm Trail" recounts the hardships of a drive up the trail, "Sam Bass" unfolds the history of a Western bad man, and "Blood on the Saddle tells of the gory death of a cowboy killed when a bronco rolled on him in a rodeo.

Sam Bass was born in Indiana, it was his native home, And at the age of seventeen young Sam began to roam, Sam first came out to Texas a cowboy for to be,-A kinder-hearted fellow you seldom ever see.

Sam used to deal in race stock, one called the Denton mare.

He matched her in scrub races, and took her to the fair. Sam used to coin the money and spent it just as free, He always drank good whiskey wherever he might be.

Sam left the Collins ranch in the merry month of May With a herd of Texas cattle the Black Hills 10 for to see.

Sold out in Custer City and then got on a spree,-A harder set of cowboys you seldom ever see.

On their way back to Texas they robbed the UP. train, And then split up in couples and started out again. Joe Collins and his partner were overtaken soon. With all their hard-earned money they had to meet their doom.

Sam made it back to Texas all right side up with care; Rode into the town of Denton with all his friends to share.

Sam's life was short in Texas, three robberies did he do, He robbed all the passenger, mail, and express 20 cars too.

Sam had four companions—four bold and daring lads— They were Richardson, Jackson, Joe Collins, and Old Dad, Four more bold and daring cowboys the rangers never knew.

They whipped the Texas rangers and ran the boys in blue.

Sam had another companion, called Arkansas for short, Was shot by a Texas ranger by the name of Thomas

Oh, Tom is a big six-footer and thinks he's mighty fly, But I can tell you his racket,—he's a deadbeat on the sly.

Jim Murphy was arrested and then released on bail; He jumped his bond at Tyler and took the train for Terrell.

But Mayor Jones had posted Jim and that was all a stall, "Twas only a plan to capture Sam before the coming fall.

Sam met his fate at Round Rock, July the twenty-first, They pierced poor Sam with rifle balls and then emptied his purse.

Poor Sam he is a corpse and six foot under clay, And Jackson's in the bushes trying to get away.

Jim had borrowed Sam's good gold and didn't want to pay The only shot he saw was to give poor Sam away He sold out Sam and Barnes and left their friends to mourn.—

Oh, what a scorching Jim will get when Gabriel $blow_S$ his horn.

And so he sold out Sam and Barnes and left their

I'm a-ridin' old Paint, I'm a-leadin' old Dan; Good-by, old Paint, I'm a-leavin' Cheyenne With my feet in the stirrups, my bridle in my hand, Good-by, old Paint, I'm a-leavin' Cheyenne.

Old Paint's a good pony, he paces when he can;
Good-by, little Annie, I'm off for Cheyenne.

Oh, hitch up your horses and feed 'em some hay,
And seat yourself by me as long as you stay.

My hosses ain't hungry, they won't eat your hay; My wagon is loaded and rollin' away. I'm a-ridin', old Paint, I'm a-leadin' old Dan, I'm a-goin' to Montan' to throw the hoolihan.

They feed in the coulees, they water in the draw, Their tails are all matted, their backs are all raw. Old Bill Jones had two daughters and a song; One went to Denver, the other went wrong.

Oh, whiskey and beer, they are nothing to me, They killed my old Dad, now they can try me

I'll tell you the truth, not lyin' or jokin', I'd rather be in jail than to be heart-broken.

Oh, when I die take my saddle from the wall, Put it on my pony, lead him from the stall, Tie my bones to his back, turn our faces to the west, And we'll ride the prairie that we love the best.

Whoopee Ti Yi Yo, Git Along, Little Dogies

long, --- lit-tle do-gles, For you know ---

As I was a-walking one morning for pleasure, I spied a cow-puncher a-riding along; His hat was throwed back and his spurs were a-jinglin'.

As he approached me a-singin' this song:

Chorus

Whoopee ti yi yo, git along, little dogies, It's your misfortune and none of my own; Whoopee ti yi yo, git along, little dogies, For you know Wyoming will be your new home Early in the springtime we'll round up the dogies, Slap on their brands, and bob off their tails; Round up our horses, load up the chuck wagon, Then throw those dogies upon the trail

It's whooping and yelling and driving the dogies, Oh, how I wish you would go on, It's whooping and punching and go on, little dogies, For you know Wyoming will be your new home

Some of the boys goes up the trail for pleasure, But that's where they git it most awfully wrong, For you haven't any idea the trouble they give us When we go driving them dogies along When the night comes on and we hold them on the bed-ground,

These little dogies that roll on so slow, Roll up the herd and cut out the strays, And roll the little dogies that never rolled before

Your mother she was raised way down in Texas, Where the jimson weed and sand-burrs grow, Now we'll fill you up on prickly pear and cholla Till you are ready for the trail to Idaho

Oh, you'll be soup for Uncle Sam's Injuns, "It's beef, heap beef," I hear them cry Git along, git along, git along, little dogies, You're going to be beef steers by and by

The Old Chisholm Trail

Come along, boys, and listen to my tale, I'll tell you of my troubles on the old Chisholm trail.

Chorus

Come ti yi youpy, youpy yea, youpy yea, Coma ti yi youpy, youpy yea

I started up the trail October twenty-third, I started up the trail with the 2-U herd

Oh, a ten-dollar hoss and a forty-dollar saddle, And I'm goin' to punchin' Texas cattle

I woke up one morning on the old Chisholm trail, Rope in my hand and a cow by the tail

I'm up in the mornin' afore daylight And afore I sleep the moon shines bright

My hoss throwed me off at the creek called Mud, My hoss throwed me off round the 2-U herd.

Last time I saw him he was going 'cross the level A-kicking up his heels and a-running like the devil.

It's cloudy in the west, a-looking like rain, And my damned old slicker's in the wagon again.

No chaps, no slicker, and it's pouring down rain, And I swear, by God, I'll never night-herd again

Saddle up, boys, and saddle up well, For I think these cattle have scattered to hell

With my blanket and my gun and my rawhide rope, I'm a-slidin' down the trail in a long, keen lope

I don't give a damn if they never do stop, I'll ride as long as an eight-day clock,

Blood on the Saddle

40

There was bul-lud on the saddle— And bul-lud all araound, An' a great big puddle Of bul-lud on the graound

Oh, a cowboy lay in it, All covered with gore, An' he never will ride on Any broncos no more

Oh, pity the cowboy, All bul-luddy and red, Oh, a bronco fell on him, An' mashed in his head.

There was bul-lud on the saddle— And bul-lud all araound, An' a great big puddle Of bul-lud on the graound

On the Railroad

For city and country people alike, in the days before widespread automobile travel, the railroads were routes to adventure, lines of communication with the rest of the world. In a small town the most exciting daily event was the arrival of the limited Among the people along the tracks there was much railroad love, and naturally the hobos, the construction gangs, and the roundhouse workers had their own songs. In American Ballads and

Folk Songs, edited by John A Lomax and Alan Lomax, the section called "Working on the Railroad" included seventeen such songs Some of these are "Steel Laying Holler," "Tie Tamping Chant," and "The Wreck of the C & O." The first song given here celebrates a mythically strong Negro steel-driving man, and "Casey Jones" tells the story of an engineer who was brave but had a fickle helpmate

John Henry

John Henry was a li'l baby, uh-huh, Sittin' on his mama's knee, oh, yeah, Said "De Big Bend Tunnel on de C & O road Gonna cause de death of me, Lawd, Lawd, gonna cause de death of me"

John Henry, he had a woman,
Her name was Mary Magdalene,
She would go to de tunnel and sing for John,
Jes' to hear John Henry's hammer ring,
Lawd, Lawd, jes' to hear John Henry's hammer ring

John Henry had a li'l woman, Her name was Lucy Ann, John Henry took sick an' had to go to bed, Lucy Ann drove steel like a man, Lawd, Lawd, Lucy Ann drove steel like a man

Cap'n says to John Henry,
"Gonna bring me a steam drill 'round,
Gonna take dat steam drill out on de job,
Gonna whop dat steel on down,
Lawd, Lawd, gonna whop dat steel on down

John Henry tol' his cap n,
Lightnin' was in his eye
"Cap'n, bet yo' las' rcd cent on me,
Fo' I'll beat it to de bottom or I'll die,
Lawd, Lawd, I'll beat it to de bottom or I'll die"

Sun shine hot an' burnin',
Wer'n't no breeze a-tall,
Sweat ran down like water down a hill,
Dat day John Henry let his hammer fall.
Lawd, Lawd, dat day John Henry let his hammer fall

John Henry went to de tunnel,
An' dey put him in de lead to drive,
De rock so tall an' John Henry so small,
Dat he lied down his hammer an' he cried,
Lawd. Lawd. dat he lied down his hammer an' he cried

John Henry started on de right hand,
De steam drill started on de lef'—
"Before I'd let dis steam drill beat me down,
I'd hammer my fool self to death,
Lawd, Lawd, I'd hammer my fool self to death"

White man tol' John Henry,
"Nigger, damn yo' soul,
You might beat dis steam an' drill of mine,
When de rocks in dis mountain turn to gol', Lawd, Lawd when de rocks in dis mountain turn to gol'."

John Henry said to his shaker,
"Nigger, why don' you sing?
I'm throwin' twelve poun's from my hips on down,
Jes' listen to de col' steel ring,
Lawd, Lawd, jes' listen to de col' steel ring."

Oh, de captain said to John Henry,
"I b'lieve this mountain's sinkin' in "
John Henry said to his captain, oh my!
"Ain' nothin' but my hammer suckin' win',
Lawd, Lawd, ain' nothin' but my hammer suckin' win'."

John Henry tol' his shaker, "Shaker, you better pray,

³ Big Bend Tunnel, the largest tunnel on the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad constructed in West Virginia, 1870-1873 • 46 shaker, drill holder

For, if I miss dis six-foot steel, Tomorrow'll be yo' buryin' day, Lawd, Lawd, tomorrow'll be yo' buryin' day."

John Henry tol' his captain,
'Looka yonder what I see—
Yo' drill's done broke an' yo' hole's done choke,
An' you cain' drive steel like me,
Lawd, Lawd, an' you cain' drive steel like me

De man dat invented de steam drill, Thought he was mighty fine. John Henry drove his fifteen feet, An' de steam drill only made nine, Lawd, Lawd, an' de steam drill only made nine

De hammer dat John Henry swung, It weighed over nine pound, He broke a rib in his lef'-han' side, An' his intrels fell on de groun', Lawd, Lawd, an' his intrels fell on de groun'

John Henry was hammerin' on de mountain,
An' his hammer was strikin' fire,
He drove so hard till he broke his pore heart,
An' he lied down his hammer an' he died,
Lawd, Lawd, he lied down his hammer an' he died

All de womens in de Wes', When dey heared of John Henry's death, Stood in de rain, flagged de eas'-boun' train. Goin' where John Henry fell dead, Lawd, Lawd, goin' where John Henry fell dead.

John Henry's lil mother, She was all dressed in red, She jumped in bed, covered up her head, Said she didn' know her son was dead, Lawd, Lawd, didn' know her son was dead

60

John Henry had a pretty lil woman,
An' de dress she wo' was blue,
An' de las' words she said to him
"John Henry, I've been true to you, Lawd, Lawd, John Henry, I've been true to you"

"Oh, who's gonna shoe yo' lil feetses,
An' who's gonna glub yo' han's,
An' who's gonna kiss yo' rosy, rosy lips,
An' who's gonna be yo' man,
Lawd, Lawd, an' who's gonna be yo' man?"

"Oh, my mama's gonna shoe my lil feetses, An' my papa's gonna glub my lil han's, An' my sister's gonna kiss my rosy, rosy lips, An' I don' need no man, Lawd, Lawd, an' I don' need no man"

Dey took John Henry to de graveyard, An' dey buried him in de san', An' every locomotive come roarin' by, Says, "Dere Liys a steel-drivin' man. Lawd, Lawd, dere lays a steel-drivin' man."

Casey Jones

Come all you rounders if you want to hear The story of a brave engineer Casey Jones was the rounder's name, On the six-eight wheeler he won his fame.

The caller called Casey at half-past four; He kissed his wife at the station door; He mounted to the cabin with his orders in his hand, And took a farewell trip to that promised land. Chorus

Casey Jones! Mounted to the cabin,
Casey Jones! With his orders in his hand,
Casey Jones! Mounted to the cabin
And took that farewell trip to the promised land

"Put in your water and shovel in your coal;
Put your head out the window, watch them drivers roll.
I'll run her till she leaves the rail,
'Cause I'm eight hours late with that western mail'

He looked at his watch and his watch was slow; He looked at the water and the water was low; He turned to the fireman and then he said, "We're going to reach Frisco, if we'll all be dead."

Chorus

Casey Jones' Going to reach Frisco,
Casey Jones' If we'll all be dead.
Casey Jones' Going to reach Frisco,
We're going to reach Frisco, but we'll all be dead.

Casey pulled up that Reno hill, He tooted for the crossing, it was awful shrill. The switchman knew by the engine's moans That the man at the throttle was Casey Jones.

He pulled up within two miles of the place; Number Four stared him right in the face; 3: Turned to the fireman, said, "Boy, you'd better jump, 'Cause there's two locomotives that's going to bump."

Chorus

Casey Jones' Two locomotives!
Casey Jones' That's a-going to bump!
Casey Jones! Two locomotives'
There's two locomotives that's a-going to bump

Casey mumbled just before he died,
"There's two more railroads that I'd like to ride."
Fireman said, "What can they be?"
"The Southern Pacific and the Santa Fe."

Mrs Jones sat on her bed a-sighing. Just received a message that poor Casey was dying, Said, "Go to bed, children, and hush your crying, 'Cause you got another papa on the Salt Lake Line."

Chorus

Mrs. Casey Jones! Got another papa!

Mrs. Casey Jones! On the Salt Lake Line!

Mrs Casey Jones! Got another papa!

You ye got another papa on the Salt Lake Line

Hallelujah, I'm a Hobo

The hobos of the United States have contributed to American folk music several fine songs, ranging from the carefree "Hallelujah, Bum Again" and "We Are Four Bums" to the rather wistful "Wanderin" Some of these songs were set to modifications of popular tunes and ballads. Others were mockingly sung to the music of the revival hymns which the hobos heard in mission shelters. Among these were "Hallelujah, Bum Again," which employs the tune of Hallelujah, Thine the Glory," and "Pie in the Sky," which is based on "In the Sweet Bye and Bye"

In "The Big Rock Candy Mountain," an imaginative singer describes his vision of a far-off land where fine weather, abundant food and drink, and an absence of policemen combine to make a hobo's paradise

The Big Rock Candy Mountain

One ev ning as the sun went down
And the jungle fire was burning.
Down the track came a hobo, humming.
And he said, "Boys, I'm not turning
I'm headed for a land that's far away,
Beside the crystal fountain
I'll see you all this coming fall
On the Big Rock Candy Mountain"

Chorus

In the Big Rock Candy Mountain,
There's a land that's fair and bright.
Where the handouts grow on bushes
And you sleep out ev'ry night,
Where the boxcars all are empty
And the sun shines ev'ry day—
Oh, the birds and the bees and the cigaret trees,
The rock-and-rye springs where the whangdoodle sings,
On the Big Rock Candy Mountain.

On the Big Rock Candy Mountain,
All the cops have wooden legs,
And the bulldogs all have rubber teeth,
And the hens lay softboiled eggs
The farmers' trees are full of fruit,
And the barns are full of hay.
Oh, I'm bound to go where there ain't no snow,
Where the sleet don't fall and the wind don't blow,
On the Big Rock Candy Mountain.

On the Big Rock Candy Mountain,
You never change your socks,
And the little streams of alkyhol
Come trickling down the rocks
The shacks all have to tip their hats
And the railroad bulls are blind,
There's a lake of stew and of whisky, too,
You can paddle all around in a big canoe,
On the Big Rock Candy Mountain

20

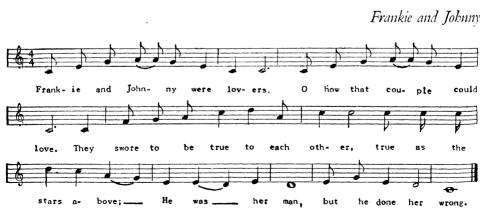

On the Big Rock Candy Mountain, The jails are made of tin, And you can bust right out again As soon as they put you in There ain't no shorthandled shovels, No axes, saws or picksI'm a-going to stay where you sleep all day— Oh, they boiled in oil the inventor of toil On the Big Rock Candy Mountain.

Oh, come with me, and we'll go see The Big Rock Candy Mountain.

In the Slums

Like many such songs, this one is sung in many versions and has an origin about which there is much dispute. One authority claims that the song originated as early as 1840, and another places it in 1850. In 1942, however, a Mrs. Frankie Baker claimed during the course of a suit that she was the original Frankie and that the incident upon which the song was founded had taken place in 1900. In spite of her claim, Mrs. Baker lost the suit when various scholars testified that "Frankie and Johnny" certainly had been sung before the end of the nineteenth century Regardless of its origin, this ballad about a tragedy in the Negro slums of St Louis, by what it takes for granted and by what it casually mentions, reveals a notion of etiquette, a concept of elegance, and a moral code which represent a way of life. Note, for instance, Frankie's pious grief for the man she has murdered. The variations in the refrain are admirable examples of an old artistic device of the folk song.

Roota-toot, three times she shot, right through that hotel door.

She shot her man, 'cause he done her wrong

Johnny grabbed off his Stetson. "O good Lawd, Frankie, don't shoot."

But Frankie put her finger on the trigger, and the gun went roota-toot-toot.

He was her man, but she shot him down

"Roll me over easy, roll me over slow,

Roll me over easy, boys, 'cause my wounds are hurting me so,

I was her man, but I done her wrong

With the first shot Johnny staggered, with the second shot he fell,

When the third bullet hit him, there was a new man's face in hell.

He was her man, but he done her wrong

Frankie heard a rumbling away down under the ground Maybe it was Johnny where she had shot him down He was her man, and she done him wrong

"Oh, bring on your rubber-tired hearses, bring on your rubber-tired hacks,

They're takın' my Johnny to the buryın' groun' but they'll never bring him back

He was my man, but he done me wrong"

The judge he said to the jury, "It's plain as plain can be This woman shot her man, so it's murder in the second degree

He was her man, though he done her wrong"

Now it wasn't murder in the second degree, it wasn't murder in the third

Frankie simply dropped her man, like a hunter drops a bird

He was her man, but he done her wrong

"Oh, put me in that dungeon Oh, put me in that cell Put me where the northeast wind blows from the southeast corner of hell 50

I shot my man 'cause he done me wrong"

Frankie walked up to the scaffold, as calm as a girl could be,

She turned her eyes to heaven and said, "Good Lord, I'm coming to thee

He was my man, and I done him wrong."

Homesteadin'

According to a Nebraskan, the following song was an adaptation by Emery Miller of a popular song—"The Little Old Log Cabin in the Lane"—written by one Will S Hays Miller was a Nebraska settler of the 1880's "Early settlers," writes Carl Sandburg, "noticed log cabins were scarcer as timber land thinned out going further west

On the windy, open prairies of the Great Plains, the best house to be had on short order was of sod. A cellar was dug first, long slices of turf were piled around the cellar lines, wooden crosspoles held the sod roof." This song is typical of several which jocosely and lugubriously lament the hardships of pioneer life. It is still current

The Little Old Sod Shanty

I am looking rather seedy now while holding down my claim,

And my victuals are not always of the best,

And the mice play shyly round me as I nestle down to

In my little old sod shanty in the West Yet I rather like the novelty of living in this way, Though my bill of fare is always rather tame, But I'm happy as a clam on the land of Uncle Sam, In my little old sod shanty on my claim

Chorus

The hinges are of leather and the windows have no glass,

While the board roof lets the howling blizzards in,

And I hear the hungry kiyote as he slinks up through the grass,

Round my little old sod shanty on my claim.

O when I left my eastern home, a bachelor so gay, To try and win my way to wealth and fame,

1 little thought that I'd come down to burning twisted hay

In the little old sod shanty on my claim

My clothes are plastered o'er with dough, I'm looking like a fright,

And everything is scattered round the room,

But I wouldn't give the freedom that I have out in the West

For the table of the Eastern man's old home

Still I wish that some kind-hearted girl would pity on me take

And relieve me from the mess that I am in,

The angel, how I'd bless her if this her home she'd make

In the little old sod shanty on my claim.

And we would make our fortunes on the prairies of the West.

Just as happy as two lovers we'd remain,

We'd forget the trials and troubles we endured at the first.

In the little old sod shanty on our claim,

And if kindly fate should bless us with now and then

To cheer our hearts with honest pride of fame,

O then we'd be contented for the toil that we had spent

In the little old sod shanty on our claim.

When time enough had lapsed and all of those little

To noble man- and womanhood had grown,

It wouldn't seem half so lonely as around us we should look.

And see the little old sod shanty on our claim.

David Crockett

1786 · 1836

In the days when Tennessee was still part of the Far West, David Crockett was born and reared in a Tennessee frontier log cabin. His schooling was meager, totaling altogether about one hundred days, but his lack of book learning did not keep him from becoming, in time, a United States congressman and a hero of the folk Davy won followers in the period of coonskin democracy because, as a hunter, an Indian fighter, and a commoner who relied on good horse sense, he had abilities and ways particularly admired by his neighbors. His motto—"Be sure you're right, and then go ahead"—caught in a few words the spirit of the times

Davy learned to farm and to hunt in boyhood After fighting in the Creek War under Jackson (1813-1814), he was twice elected to the state legislature (1821-1823) and twice to Congress (1827-1831, 1833-1835) Newspapers of the day made much of his rough, homespun humor, and books about him-some by others. some by Davy himself-swelled his fame When a Western critic read Crockett's autobiography, Narrative of the Life of David Crockett of West Tennessee (1834), he noticed that "the events are such . . . as we have seen acted over and over, and heard repeatedly recited by the firesides of our hardy backwoodsmen" The comment suggests Crockett's importance in literary history. His accounts did much to bring in the fireside yarn, with its authentic rendering of Western ways of living, thinking, talking, and narrating, as an eventual literary influence upon authors such as Harte (p. 386). and Clemens (p. 452)

Furthermore, during Crockett's lifetime, and particularly after his heroic death in the Alamo in 1836, tall tales about him circulated in yarnspinning sessions and in print. He was pictured in such tales as a comic demigod, doing superhuman deeds imagined by exuberant storytellers. These tales combined imagination of the sort one finds in poetry with enough robust humor to make them palatable to ordinary men. They are related to the earlier whoppers of Samuel Peters, the later yarns of Mark Twain, and the present-day fantastic moving pictures of Walt Disney.

Bear Hunting

In the morning I left my son at the camp, and we started on towards the harricane, and when we had went about a mile, we started a very large bear, but we got along mighty slow on account of the cracks in the earth occasioned by the earthquakes We, however made out to keep in hearing of the dogs for about three miles, and then we come to the harricane. Here we had to quit our horses, as old Nick himself couldn't have got through it without sneaking it along in the form that he put on, to make a fool of our old grandmother Eve By this time several of my dogs had got tired and come back, but we went ahead on foot for some little time in the harricane, when we met a bear coming straight to us, and not more than twenty or thirty yards off I started my tired dogs after him, and McDaniel pursued them, and I went on to where my other dogs were I had seen the track of the bear they were after, and I knowed he was a screamer I followed on to about the middle of the harricane, but my dogs pursued a him so close, that they made him climb an old stump about twenty feet high I got in shooting distance of him and fired, but I was all over in such a flutter from fatigue and running, that I couldn't hold steady, but, however, I broke his shoulder, and he fell I run up and loaded my gun as quick as possible, and shot him again and killed him. When I went to take out my knife to butcher him, I found I had lost it in coming through the harricane The vines and briers was so thick that I would sometimes have to get down and crawl like a 3. varment to get through at all, and a vine had, as I supposed, caught in the handle and pulled it out While I was standing and studying what to do, my friend came to me He had followed my trail through the harricane, and had found my knife, which was mighty good news to me, as a hunter hates the worst in the world to lose a good dog, or any part of his huntingtools I now left McDaniel to butcher the bear, and I went after our horses, and brought them as near as the nature of case would allow 1 then took our bags, and went back to where he was, and when we had 40 skin'd the bear, we fleeced off the fat and carried it to our horses at several loads. We then packed it up on out horses, and had a heavy pack of it on each one We now started and went on till about sunset, when I concluded we must be near our camp, so I hollered and my son answered me, and we moved on in the direction to the camp We had gone but a little way when I heard my dogs make a warm start again, and I jumped down from my horse and gave him up to my friend, and told him I would follow them He went on to the camp, and 50 I went ahead after my dogs with all my might for a considerable distance, till at last night came on. The woods were very rough and hilly, and all covered over with cane

I now was compel'd to move on more slowly, and, was frequently falling over logs, and into the cracks made by the earthquakes, so that I was very much afraid I would break my gun However I went on about three miles, when I came to a good big creek, which I waded It was very cold, and the creek was 60 about knee-deep, but I felt no great inconvenience from it just then, as I was all over wet with sweat from running, and I felt hot enough After I got over the creek and out of the cane, which was very thick on all our creeks, I listened for my dogs. I found they had either treed or brought the bear to a stop, as they continued barking in the same place. I pushed on its near in the direction to the noise as I could, till I found the hill was too steep for me to climb, and so I backed and went down the creek some distance till I came to a hollow, 70 and then took up that, till I come to a place where I could climb up the hill. It was mighty dark, and was difficult to see my way or any thing else When I got up the hill, I found I had passed the dogs, and so I turned and went to them. I found, when I got there, they had treed the bear in a large forked poplar, and it was setting in the fork.

I could see the lump, but not plain enough to shoot with any certainty, as there was no moonlight, and so I set in to hunting for some dry brush to make me a 80 light; but I could find none, though I could find that the ground was torn mightily to pieces by the cracks.

At last I thought I could shoot by guess, and kill him; so I pointed as near the lump as I could, and fired away. But the bear didn't come, he only clomb up higher and got out on a limb, which helped me to see him better. I now loaded up again and fired, but this time he didn't move at all. I commenced loading for a third fire, but the first thing I knowed, the bear was down among the 10 dogs, and they were fighting all around me I had my big butcher in my belt, and I had a pair of dressed buckskin breeches on. So I took out my knife, and stood, determined, if he should get hold of me, to defend myself in the best way I could I stood there for some time, and could now and then see a white dog I had, but the rest of them, and the bear, which were dark coloured, I couldn't see at all, it was so miserable dark They still fought around me, and sometimes within three feet of me, but, at last, the bear got down into one 20 of the cracks, that the earthquakes had made in the eground, about four feet deep, and I could tell the biting end of him by the hollering of my dogs. So I took my gun and pushed the muzzle of it about, till I thought I had it against the main part of his body, and fired, but it happened to be only the fleshy part of his foreleg With this, he jumped out of the crack, and he and the dogs had another hard fight around me, as before At last, however, they forced him back into the crack again, as he was when I had shot

I had laid down my gun in the dark, and I now began to hunt for it, and while hunting, I got hold of a pole, and I concluded I would punch him awhile with that I did so, and when I would punch him, the dogs would jump in on hun, when he would bite them badly, and they would jump out again 1 concluded, as he would take punching so patiently, it might be that he would he still enough for me to get down in the crack, and feel slowly along till I could find the right place to give him a dig with my butcher. So I got down, and my 40 dogs got in before him and kept his head towards them, till I got along easily up to him, and placing my hand on his rump, felt for his shoulder, just behind which I intended to stick him. I made a lounge with my long knife, and fortunately stuck him right through the heart; at which he just sank down, and I crawled out in a hurry. In a little time my dogs all come out too, and seemed satisfied, which was the way they always had of telling me that they had finished him.

I suffered very much that night with cold, as mu leather breeches, and every thing else I had on, was wet and frozen But I managed to get my bear out of this crack after several hard trials, and so I butchered him. and laid down to try to sleep. But my fire was very bad. and I couldn't find any thing that would burn well to make it any better, and I concluded I should freeze, if I didn't warm myself in some way by exercise So I got up, and hollered a while, and then I would just jump up and down with all my might, and throw myself into all sorts of motions But all this wouldn't do, for my blood was now getting cold, and the chills coming all 6. over me I was so tired, too, that I could hardly walk, but I thought I would do the best I could to save my life, and then, if I died, nobody would be to blame. So I went to a tree about two feet through, and not a limb on it for thirty feet, and I would climb up it to the limbs, and then lock my arms together around it, and slide down to the bottom again. This would make the insides of my legs and arms feel mighty warm and good. I continued this till daylight in the morning, and how often I clomb up my tree and slid down I don't know, but I reckon at least a hundred times.

In the morning I got my bear hung up so as to be safe, and then set out to hunt for my camp I found it after a while, and McDaniel and my son were very much rejoiced to see me get back, for they were about to give me up for lost. We got our breakfasts, and then secured our meat by building a high scaffold, and covering it over. We had no fear of its spoiling, for the weather was so cold that it couldn't.

We now started after my other bear, which had 80 caused me so much trouble and suffering; and before we got him, we got a start after another, and took him also We went on to the creek I had crossed the night before and camped, and then went to where my bear was, that I had killed in the crack When we examined the place, McDaniel said he wouldn't have gone into it, as I did, for all the bears in the woods.

We took the meat down to our camp and salted at and also the last one we had killed, intending, in the morning, to make a hunt in the harricane again

We prepared for resting that night, and I can assure the reader I was in need of it. We had laid down by our hre, and about ten o'clock there came a most terrible earthquake, which shook the earth so, that we were rocked about like we had been in a cradle We were very much alarmed; for though we were accustomed to feel earthquakes, we were now right in the region which had been torn to pieces by them in 1812, and we thought at might take a notion and swallow us up, like the big fish did Jonah

In the morning we packed up and moved to the harricane, where we made another camp, and turned out that evening and killed a very large bear, which made eight we had now killed in this hunt

The next morning we entered the harricane again, and in little or no time my dogs were in full cry We pursued them, and soon came to a thick cane-brake, in which they had stop'd their bear We got up close to him, as the cane was so thick that we couldn't see more than a few feet. Here I made my friend hold the cane a little open with his gun till I shot the bear, which was a mighty large one. I killed him dead in his tracks. We 20 got him out and butchered him, and in a little time started another and killed him, which now made ten we had killed, and we know'd we couldn't pack any more home, as we had only five horses along; therefore we returned to the camp and salted up all our meat, to be ready for a start homeward next morning

The morning came, and we packed our horses with the meat, and had as much as they could possibly carry, and sure enough cut out for home. It was about thirty miles, and we reached home the second day. I had now 30 accommodated my neighbour with meat enough to do him, and had killed in all, up to that time, fifty-eight bears, during the fall and winter

As soon as the time come for them to quit their houses and come out again in the spring, I took a notion to hunt a little more, and in about one month I killed forty-seven more, which made one hundred and five bears I had killed in less than one year from that time 1834

The Crockett Almanacs

Between 1835 and 1856 there appeared in various cities— Nashville, New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and others almanacs put out by various publishers and called the Crockett Almanacs. Like others, these almanacs contained data about the calendar year, unlike most others, they contained many tall tales, usually written as if in the language of Crockett or his unlearned frontier neighbors

Whether Crockett had anything to do with the earliest almanacs is not known, and certainly before long the tales were concocted by journalists, some of whom knew a good deal about frontier life and some of whom knew very little. The stories in the periodicals, however, all were purportedly told by the famous frontiersman. At their best these almanac humorists, whoever they were, caught the qualities of good yarnspinning sessions. The style was that of lively fireside talk, homely, relatively simple, but concrete, vigorous, full of conceits. The materials were typical combinations of earthy, even vulgar, reality with the unearthly inventions of soaring imaginations The sort of literature in the almanacs, in other words, foreshadowed the widespread use of the American language of informal talk in print and the fantastic inventions of T. B. Thorpe, Joel Chandler Harris, Mark Twain, and Walt Disney. "A Sensible Varmint" and "Death of Crockett" are from Turner and Fisher almanacs, "Crockett's Morning Hunt" from a Cozans almanac; all appeared in New York.

A SENSIBLE VARMINT

Almost every body that knows the forest, understands parfectly well that Davy Crockett never loses powder and ball, havin' ben brought up to believe it a sin to throw away amminition, and that is the benefit of a vartuous eddikation. I war out in the forest one arternoon, and had jist got to a place called the Great Gap, when I seed a rackkoon setting all alone upon a tree. I clapped the breech of Brown Betty to my shoulder, and war jist going to put a piece of lead between his shoulders, when he lifted one paw, and sez he, "Is your name Crockett?"

Sez I. "You are rite for wonst, my name is Davy Crockett."

Davy and the sensible varmint.

"Then," sez he, "you needn't take no further trouble, for I may as well come down without another word" And the cretur valked rite down from the tree, for he in considered himself shot

I stoops down and pats him on the head, and sez I, "I hope I may be shot myself before I hurt a hair of your head, for I never had sich a compliment in my life"

"Seeing as how you say that," sez he, "I'll jist walk off for the present, not doubting your word a bit, d'ye see, but lest you should kinder happen to change your mind."

DEATH OF CROCKETT

Thar's a great rejoicin' among the bears of Kaintuck, and the alligators of the Massissippi rolls up that shining ribs to the sun, and has grown so fat and lazy that they, will hardly move out of the way for a steamboat The rattlesnakes come up out of that holes and frolic within ten foot of the clearings, and the foxes goes to sleep in the goose-pens. It is bekase the rifle of Crockett is silent forever, and the print of his moccasins is found no more in our woods. His old fox-skin cap hangs up in the cabin, and every hunter, whether he are a Puke. a Wolverine, or a Sucker, never looks at it without turnin' away his head and droppin' a salt tear.

Luke Wing entered the cabin the other day and took: down old Killdevil to look at it. The muzzle was half stopped up with rust, and a great green spider run out of it and made his escape in the cracks of the wall. The varmints of the forest will fear it no more. His last act to defend it, war when the poor gallant Kurnill drew a bead on a pesky Mexican and brought him down Crockett went to put "Big Butcher" into another, and the feller on the ground turned half over, and stuck a knife into him. Another come up behind and run his bayonet into Ciockett's back for the cretur would as a soon have faced a hindred live mammoths as to have faced Crockett at any time

Down fell the Kurnill like a lion struck by thunder and lightning. He never spoke again. It was a great loss to the country and the world, and to ole Kaintuck in particklar. That were never known such a member of Congress as Crockett and never will be agin. The painters and bears will miss him, for he never missed them

He died like a member o' Congress ought to die While he war about to do his country some sarvice and raise her name as high as her mountains, he war cut down in the prime o life, and at a time when he war most wanted His screams and yells are heard no more and the whole country are clouded with a darkness for the gallant Kurnill He war an ornament to the forest and war never known to refuse his whiskey to a stranger When he war alive, it war most beautiful to hear his scream coming through the forest, it would turn and twist itself into some of the most splendifferous knots, and then until itself and keep on till it got clar into nowhere.

²⁷ Puke, Wolverine, Sucker, natives, respectively, of Missouri, Michi gan, and Illinois

But he are a dead man now, and if you want to see old Caintuck's tears, go thar, and speak o' her gallant Kurnill, nd that's not a human but what will turn away and go sehind some tree and dry up that tears He are dead low, and may he rest forever and a day arter 1847

CROCKETT'S MORNING HUNT

One January morning it was so all-screwen-up cold that the forest trees war so stiff that they couldn't shake and the very day-break froze fast as it war tryin' to dawn The tinder-box in my cabin would no more ketch fire than a sunk raft at the bottom o' the sea Seein' that daylight war so far behind time, I thought creation war in a fair way for freezin' fast

"So," thinks I, "I must strike a leetle fire from my nngers, light my pipe, travel out a few leagues, and see about it'

Then I brought my knuckles together like two thunder clouds, but the sparks froze up afore I could begin to collect 'em-so out I walked, and endeavored to keep myself unfriz by goin' at a hop, step and jump gait, and ... whistlin' the tune of "fire in the mountains!" as I went along in three double quick time Well, arter I had walked about twenty-five miles up the peak o' Daybreak Hill I soon discovered what war the matter. The airth had actually friz fast in her axis, and William. the sun had got jammed between two cakes o' ice under the wheels, an' that he had bin shinin' and workin' to get loose, till he friz fast in his cold sweat

"C-r-e-a-t-i-o-n1" thought I, "this are the toughest sort o' suspension, and it mustn't be endured-somethin' must be done, or human creation is done for"

It was then so antedeluvian and premature cold that my upper and lower teeth an' tongue war all collapsed together as tight as a friz oyster. I took a fresh twenty pound bear off o' my back that I'd picked up on the road, an' beat the animal agin the ice till the hot ile began to walk out on him at all sides I then took an' held him over the airth's axes, an' squeezed him till I thaw'd 'em loose, poured about a ton on it over the sun's face, give the airth's cog-wheel one kick backward, till I got the sun loose-whistled "Push along, keep movin'!" an' in 40 about fifteen seconds the airth gin a grunt, and begun movin-the sun walked up beautiful, salutin' me with sich a wind o' gratitude that it made me sneeze I lit my pipe by the blaze o' his top-knot, shouldered my bear, an' walked home, introducin' the people to fresh daylight with a piece of sunrise in my pocket, with which I cooked my bear steaks, an' enjoyed one o' the best breakfasts I had tasted for some time. If I didn't, jist wake some mornin' and go with me to the office o' sunrise!

William Tappan Thompson

1812 · 1882

In 1842 William Tappan Thompson was an editor of a weekly newspaper, The Southern Miscellany, published in Madison, Georgia Born in Ohio in 1812, orphaned at fourteen, Thompson had been prepared for editorship by work as a printer's devil, by political executive work in Tallahassee, Florida, and by newspaper, magazine, and printing work in Augusta The readers to whom the Miscellany was intended to appeal, the citizens of surrounding Morgan County, were Scotch-Irish farmers who owned few or no slaves Moderately educated, rustic, thrifty, rather stern in their Protestant morality, they were aptly nicknamed at the time "the Yankees of the South."

It was for such readers that Thompson prepared his most famous humorous pieces—the Major Jones letters Major Jones, a Georgia prototype of Smith's Jack Downing, was much like the people who enjoyed his writings—a semi-educated, highly moral farmer who derived his income from a small plantation worked by a few slaves. His letters to the editor of the Miscellamy told of his homely thoughts and adventures—his experiences as a major in the militia, his humble courtship, his marriage and family life. Published as Major Jones's Courtship in 1843, this set of letters had huge sales, both in the South and in the North, going through more than twenty editions scattered over a period of fifty years.

Major Jones, who also appeared in The Chronicles of Pineville (1845) and a series of pro-Southern letters—Major Jones's Sketches of Travel (1848)—published first in a Baltimore paper, differed a great deal from most of the other leading Southwestern humorous characters of the time A fellow of great naiveté, he nevertheless was blessed with so much horse sense that he, as a rule, had sounder ideas and sentiments about most subjects than did other contemporary Southwestern humorous characters. More than most such figures of the period and the section, too, he recorded the day-by-day domestic life of his class and others. And rough vulgarity often typical of other humorous writings did not get into the works of Major Jones. Such qualities were partly the result of Thompson's attempt to make the Major's letters appeal to a particular group of readers, partly the result, of course, of his skill in seeing keenly and recording authentically the life he knew

The letters, with their accurate use of the vernacular speech of Georgia, were clearly related to the humor, based on the oral tale, so popular in the Southwest at the time. Even closer to this prevalent sort of humor were a number of mock oral tales represented by "A Coon Hunt in a Fency Country." These short, direct narratives, told in dialect, usually followed a formula thus described by Professor Henry Prentice Miller. "A single paragraph of general moralizing or crackerbox philosophizing, a quick, phrased sketching of the characters, a few statements about background, a single incident, and finally the point or nub, which ties up with the initial paragraph." Some of these economically told yarns deserve high rank among short humorous masterpieces.

LETTER XII

Pineville, December 27, 1842

To Mr. Thompson:—Dear Sir—Crismus is over, and the thing is done did! You know I told you in my last letter I was gwine to bring Miss Mary up to the chalk on Crismus Well, I done it, slick as a whistle, though it come mighty nigh bein a serious bisness But I'll tell you all about the whole circumstance

The fact 1s, I's made my mind up more'n twenty times to jest go and come right out with the whole bisness, but whenever I got whar she was, and whenever she looked at me with her witchin eyes, and kind o' blushed at me, I always felt sort o' skeered and fainty, and all what I made up to tell her was forgot, so I couldn't think of it to save me But you's a married man, Mr Thompson, so I couldn't tell you nothin about popin the question, as they call it It's a mighty grate favour to ax of a pretty gall, and to people what aint used to it, it goes monstrous hard, don't it? They say widders don't mind it no more'n nothin But I'm makin a transgression, as the preacher ses

Crismus eve I put on my new suit, and shaved my 2face as slick as a smoothin iron, and after tea went over to old Miss Stallinses. As soon as I went into the parler whar they was all settin round the fire, Miss Carline and Miss Kesiah both laughed right out.

There! there!" ses they, "I told you so! I know'd it would be Joseph."

What's I done, Miss Carline?" ses I

You come under little sister's chicken bone, and I do believe she know'd you was comin when she put it over the dore."

"No I didn't-I didn't no such thing, now," ses Miss Mary, and her face blushed red all over

"Oh, you needn't deny it," ses Miss Kesiah, "you belong to Joseph now, jest as sure as ther's any charm in chicken bones'

I know'd that was a first rate chance to say something. but the dear little creeter looked so sorry and kep blushin 50, I couldn't say nothin zactly to the pint' so I tuck a chair and reached up and tuck down the bone and put it in my pocket

"What are you gwine to do with that old chicken bone now, Majer?" ses Miss Mary

"I'm gwine to keep it as long as I live," ses I, "as a ... Crismus present from the handsomest gall in Georgia When I sed that, she blushed worse and worse

"Aint you shamed, Majer?" ses she

"Now you ought to give her a Crismus gift, Joseph, to keep all her life," sed Miss Carline

"Ah," ses old Miss Stallins, "when I was a gall we used to hang up our stockins---"

"Why, mother" ses all of 'em, "to say stockins right

Then I felt a little streaked too, cause they was all · blushin as hard as they could

"Highty-tity!" ses the old lady-"what monstrous finement to be shore! I'd like to know what harm ther is in stockins People now-a-days is gittin so mealymouthed they can't call nothin by its right name, and I don't see as they's any better than the old time people was When I was a gall like you, child, I use to hang up my stockins and git 'em full of presents"

The galls kep laughin and blushin

"Never mind," ses Miss Mary, "Majer's got to give e me a Crismus gift-won't you, Majer?"

"Oh, yes," ses I, "you know I promised you one"

"But I didn't mean that," ses she

"I've got one for you, what I want you to keep all your life, but it would take a two bushel bag to hold it," ses I "Oh, that's the kind," ses she.

"But will you promise to keep it as long as you live?" ses I.

"Certainly I will, Majer."

"-monstrous finement now-a-days-old people don't know nothin about perliteness," said old Miss Stallins, 50 jest gwine to sleep with her nittin in her lap.

"Now you hear that, Miss Carline," ses I. "She ses she'll keep it all her life"

"Yes, I will," ses Miss Mary—"but what is it?"

"Never mind," ses I, "you hang up a bag big enough to hold it and you'll find out what it is, when you see it in the mornin."

Miss Carline winked at Miss Kesiali, and then whispered to her—then they both laughed and looked at me as mischievous as they could They spicioned something

"You'll be shore to give it to me now, if I hang up a bag," ses Miss Mary

"And promise to keep it," ses I

"Well, I will, cause I know that you wouldn't give me nothin that wasn't worth keepin"

They all agreed they would hang up a bag for me to put Miss Mary's Crismus present in, on the back porch, and about ten o'clock I told 'em good evenin and went home

I sot up till mid-night, and when they was all gone to bed I went softly into the back gate, and went up to 70 the porch, and thar, shore enough, was a great big mealbag hangin to the jice. It was monstrous unhandy to git to it, but I was termined not to back out. So I sot some chairs on top of a bench and got hold of the rope and let myself down into the bag, but jest as I was gittin in, it swung agin the chairs, and down they went with a terrible racket, but nobody din't wake up but Miss Stallinses old cur dog, and here he come rippin and tearin through the yard like rath, and round and round he went tryin to find what was the matter. I 80 scrooch'd down in the bag and didn't breathe louder nor a kitten, for fear he'd find me out, and after a while he quit barkin

The wind begun to blow bominable cold, and the old bag kep turnin round and swingin so it made me seasick as the mischief I was afraid to move for fear the rope would break and let me fall, and that I sot with my teeth rattlin like I had a ager It seemed like it would never come daylight, and I do believe if I didn't love Miss Mary so powerful I would froze to death, for my 90 heart was the only spot that felt warm, and it didn't beat more'n two licks a minit, only when I thought how she would be supprised in the mornin, and then it went in a canter. Bimeby the cussed old dog come up on the porch and begun to smell about the bag, and then he barked like he thought he'd treed something "Bow! wow! wow!" ses he. Then he'd smell agin, and try to git up to the bag. "Git out!" ses I, very low, for fear the galls mought hear me. "Bow! wow!" ses he. "Be gone! you bominable fool," ses I, and I felt all over in spots, for I spected every minit he'd nip me, and what made it worse, I didn't know whar abouts he'd take hold. "Bow! wow! wow!" Then I tried coaxin——"Come here, good 10 feller," ses I, and whistled a little to him, but it wasn't no use Thar he stood and kep up his everlastin whinin and barkin, all night. I couldn't tell when daylight was breakin, only by the chickens crowin, and I was monstrous glad to hear 'em, for if I'd had to stay that one hour more, I don't believe I'd ever got out of that bag alive.

Old Miss Stallins come out fust, and as soon as she seed the bag, see she,

"What upon yeath has Joseph went and put in that bag for Mary? I'll lay its a yearlin or some live animal, 20 or Bruin wouldn't bark at it so."

She went in to call the galls, and I sot thar, shiverin all over so I couldn't hardly speak if I tried to—but I didn't say nothin. Bimeby they all come running out on the porch.

"My goodness! what is it?" ses Miss Mary.

"Oh, it's alive!" ses Miss Kesiah, "I seed it move"

"Call Cato, and make him cut the rope," ses Miss Carline, "and let's see what it is. Come here, Cato, and git this bag down."

"Don't hurt it for the world," ses Miss Mary.

Cato untied the rope that was round the jice, and let the bag down easy on the floor, and I tumbled out all covered with corn meal, from head to foot

"Goodness gracious!" ses Miss Mary, "if it aint the Majer himself!"

"Yes," ses I, "and you know you promised to keep my Crismus present as long as you lived."

The galls laughed themselves almost to death, and went to brushin off the meal as fast as they could, sayin to they was gwine to hang that bag up every Crismus till they got husbands too Miss Mary—bless her bright eyes—she blushed as beautiful as a morning-glory, and sed she'd stick to her word. She was right out of bed, and her hair wasn't komed, and her dress wasn't fix'd at all, but the way she looked preity was real distractin. I do believe if I was froze stiff, one look at her sweet face, as she stood that lookin down to the floor with her roguish eyes, and her bright curls fallin all over he_f snowy neck, would have fotched me too. I tell you what it was worth hangin in a meal bag from one Crismus to another to feel as happy as I have ever sense.

I went home after we had the laugh out, and sot by the fire till I got thawed. In the forenoon all the Stal linses come over to our house and we had one of the greatest Crismus dinners that ever was seed in Georgia and I don't believe a happier company ever sot down to the same table. Old Miss Stallins and mother settled the match, and talked over every thing that ever happened in ther families, and laughed at me and Mary, and cried about ther dead husbands, cause they wasn't alive to see ther children married.

It's all settled now, 'cept we haint sot the weddin day. I'd like to have it all over at once, but young galls always like to be engaged a while, you know, so I spose I must wait a month or so Mary (she ses I mustn't call her Miss Mary now) has been a good deal of trouble and botheration to me, but if you could see her you wouldn't think I ought to grudge a little sufferin to git sich a sweet little wife.

You must come to the weddin if you possibly kin I'll let you know when No more from

Your friend, till death,

Jos Jones

N. B I like to forgot to tell you about cousin Pete He got snapt on egnog when he heard of my ingagement, and he's been as meller as hoss-apple ever sense

A Coon Hunt in a Fency Country

It is really astonishin what a monstrous sight of mischief ther is in a bottle of rum. It one of 'em was to be submitted to a analization as the doctors calls it, it would be tound to contain all manner of devilment that ever entered the head of man, from cussin and stealin up to murder and whippin his own mother, and nonsense enough to turn all the men in the world out of ther senses If a man's got any badness in him, let him drink whiskey, and it will bring it out jest as sassafras tea does the measles; and it he's a good-for-nothin sort of a feller, without no bad traits in partickeler, it'll bring out all his foolishness. It affects different people in different ways-it makes some men monstrous brave and full of fight, and some it makes cowards—some it makes rich and happy and some pore and miserable. And it has different effects on different people's eyes-some it makes see double, and some it makes so blind that they can't tell themselves from a side of bacon. One of the worst cases of rum-foolery that I've heard of for a long rime tuck place in Pineville last fall

Bill Sweeney and Tom Culpepper is the two greatest old conveys in our settlement for coon-huntin. The fact is, they don't do much of any thing else, and when they can't catch coons, it's a shore sign that coons is scarce Well, one night they had every thing ready for a reglar hunt, but owin to some extra good fortin, Tom had got a pocket-pistol, as he called it, of genewine old Jimmaky rum After takin a good startin horn, they went out on ther hunt, with ther lightwood torch a blazin, and the odogs a barkin and yelpin like they was crazy. They struck out into the woods, gwine in the direction of old Starlin Jones's new ground, a great place for coons Every now and then they would stop to wait for the dogs, and then they would drink one another's health, until they begun to feel first-rate On they went, chattin away about one thing and another, takin a nip now and then from Tom's bottle, not mindin much whar they was gwine Bimeby they come to a fence Well, over they got without much difficulty.

"Who's fence is this?" ses Bill

"Taint no matter," ses Tom, "let's take a drink"

After takin a pull at the bottle, they went on agin, wonderin what upon yeath had come of the dogs. The next thing they come to was a terrible muddy branch After gropin ther way through the bushes and briers and gittin on t'other side, they tuck another drink Fixin up ther torch and startin on agin, they didn't go but a little ways before they come to another branch, as bad as the first one, and a little further they come to another fence—a monstrous high one this time

"What upon yeath is we got to, Culpepper?" ses Bill, I never seed such a heap of fences and branches in these parts'

"Why," ses Tom, "it's old Starlin's doins, you know he's alway bildin fences and makin infernal improvements, as he calls 'em But never mind, we's through 'em now"

"The devil we is," ses Bill, "why, here's the alfiredest high fence vit"

Shore enough, that they was right agin another fence 60 By this time they begun to be considerable tired and limber in ther jints and it was sich a terrible high fence Tom drapped the last piece of the torch and that they was in the dark

"Now you is done it! 'ses Bill

Tom knowd he had, but he thought it was no use to grieve over what couldn't be helped, so, ses he,

"Never mind, old hoss-come ahead, and I'll take you out," and the next minit, kerslash' he went into the water up to his neck

Bill heard the splash, and he clung to the fence with both hands like he thought it was slewin round to throw him off "Hellow, Tom" ses he, "whar in creation has you got

"Here I is!" ses Tom, spittin the water out of his mouth, and coughin like he'd wallered something "Look out, ther's another dratted branch here"

"Name o' sense, whar is we?" ses Bill "If this isn't a fency country, dad fetch my buttons!"

80

٨n

"Yes, and a branchy one, too!" ses Tom, "and they is the thickest and the highest and the deepest that I ever seed in all my born days."

After a good deal of cussin and gruntin Bill got himself loose from the fence

"Which way is you?" ses he

"Here, right over the branch," ses Tom

The next minit in Bill went, up to his middle in the branch

"Come ahead," ses Tom, "and let's go home"

"Come thunder!" ses Bill, "in sich a place as this, whar a feller hain't more'n got his coat-tail unhitched from a fence before he's over head and ears in a cussed branch"

Bill made a terrible job of gittin across the branch, which he swore was the deepest one yit. They managed to git together agin after feelin about in the dark a while, and, takin another drink, they sor out for home, cussin the fences and the branches, and helpin one another up now and then when they got ther legs tangled in the brush, but they hadn't gone more'n twenty yards before they found themselves in the middle of another branch After gittin through the branch and gwine about twenty yards they was brung up all standin agin by another everlastin fence.

"Dad blame my picter," ses Bill, "if I don't think we's bewitched. Who upon yeath would go and build fences all over outdoors this way?"

It tuck 'em a long time to climb this fence, but when they got on top of it they found the ground on tother side without much trouble. This time the bottle was broke, and they come monstrous nigh havin a fight about the catastrofy. But it was a very good thing the licker was spilt, for after crossin three or four more branches and climbin as many more fences, it got to be daylight, when to ther great astonishment they found out that they had been climbin the same fence and wadin the same branch all night, not more'n a hundred yards from the place whar they first come to 'em.

Bill Sweeney ses he can't account for it no other way but that the licker sort o turned ther heads, and he ses he really does believe if it hadn't gin out, they'd been climbin that same fence and wadin that same branch till now

George Washington Harris

1814 · 1869

At the age of five, George Washington Harris was taken from his birthplace in Allegheny City, Pennsylvania, to Knoxville, Tennessee For forty years he lived in this sleepy village, coming to know intimately the life of its peaceful valley He left its "Knobs" and mountains only when the economic stirrings preceding the Civil War forced him away

Harris' wide and varied experience included an apprenticeship in a jewelry shop, the captaincy of a steamboat, farming, the operation of a metalworking shop glass factory, and sawmill, service as postmaster, and finally, work on a railroad During his whole career Harris had a deep interest in politics, and from 1839 until his death, whenever the political situation became crucial, he boisterously attacked forces which threatened the "good old days."

For a number of years Harris wrote humorous sketches for the New York Spirit of the Times. After 1854 his stories couched in the quaint language of his comic character, Sut Lovingood, obtained, according to one discerning critic of that period, "a circulation and popularity, throughout the country, which no similar productions, in modern times, have enjoyed" Sut, as a self-confessed "nat'ral born durn'd fool," delivered blows at the foibles of mankind from the vantage point of this "unassailable position" For his victims he reached as high as Abraham Lincoln and as low as a "durn'd, infurnel, hiperkritical, pot-bellied, scaley-hided, whiskywastin'" circuit rider. In fact, most of humanity in some torm or other can find itself "sloshin about" in his caldron of comic situation. In a typical Lovingood story, the characters whom Sut disliked were comically portrayed and then, in all probability, physically maltreated. Sur's notion of the height of humor was a man whom he disliked surrounded by a knot of angry hornets and trying vainly to get away in a hurry. What Harris is admired for by modern enthusiasts about his yarns is his ability to put oral tales with all the art of their comic movement and all the poetry of their style onto the printed page.

Bart Davis's Dance

 D_u yu know that bow-larged boy on the fence thar?" said Sut

"No, who is he?"

"That's Bart Davis's yungest son, name Obed Jis' obsarve how his snout's skin'd an' his year slit an' so forth"

"Yes, I see, how did it happen?"

"Happen" hit didn't happen et all, hit wer dun apupos, permeditated a-pupos Ther wer a dance et his dad's, las' Sat'day nite wer two weeks ago, what hed like tu bred a berryin ur two, the corpses wer mos' redy, an' nuffin but acksidint kep em frum bein finished. I wer thar mysef, an' kin say an' swar that the chances run mity even, a-tween mirth an' mournin Fur a spell hit wer the exhitenest time I ever seed on sich a ocashun, not tu hev no more whisky nur we hed Thar warn't but 'bout half a barril when we begun, an' when we quit, we burnt the hoops an' staves tu dance the las' reel by

"Everybody knows Bart is a durn'd no-count, jug- 20 kerryin, slow-thinkin, flea-hurtin, herrin-eatin, Noth Calinian, plays a three-string fiddil wif a grasshopper jirk, while his wife totes the wood. He hes but two gifs wuf a durn wun is, he'll vide his whisky wif yu down tu the las' half pint, that he stops, fur that's jis' a horn yu know, an' tuther is, he ain't feard ove enything a-livin, sept ole Peg I don't wunder et that, fur hit mus' take a man wif a onnatrally big melt, not tu be fear'd ove his wife, onless she's blind ur hes a sweethart Peg (she's his ole quilt, yu know) is a regular steel- $_{\rm 30}$ trap ove an 'oman, she goes wif wun side ove her frock tucked up at the hips, her har down her back, an' a roasted hickory onder her arm tu scold the brats wif, an' tu skeer Bart They's bof great on dancin ove Sar'day nites et home, an' sumwhar else on tuther nites Ef thar's a frolic enywhar in five mile, Bart is sure tu be thar, an' Peg, too, ef she's in travilin fix, which ain't more nur five months in the year. She goes fur two reasons wun is, tu eat an' dance, an' tuther tu watch Bart He hes two reasons also wun is tu suck in all the 40 whisky floatin roun, an' tu du a heap ove things what needs watchin They giner'lly hes a dermestic discussun arter they gets home, in which, teeth, claws, an' beggin am the argymints, an' 'I won't du so no more,' the aind ove hit. They am a lively an' even yok'd par

Nobody else on the green yearh orter be tied tu either ove em.

"Well they mounted that par ove hames yu see on the fence thar, the boy name Obed ontu a muel, an' sent him tu the still-hous, tu narrate hit that thar wud be a dance et home the nex nite, an' fur every feller what warn't married tu fetch a gal, an' them what wer married tu fetch two Now this rangement show'd Bait's good sence, fur he know'd that hit takes more gals tu du married fellers then single wuns. Caze people what hes but one kind ove vittils et home, hit allers takes more tu du em abroad

"When the nite cum they wer all thar, a hous' plum full, an' amung em a lot ove counter-hoppers wif strip'd sugar candy in their pockets, an' young lawyers wif cinamint ile ontu ther har; all on em frum town, an' jis' ole enuf tu begin tu strut an' gobble Thunder and litnin, an' sun-flower pattrin calliker, mixed wif check an' stripe, homspun swept all about thar, wif one, jis' 20 one black silk They laid off two reels, wun call'd the leather shoc reel, an' tuther, the barfoot reel I danced in the wun I nam'd las'."

Sut Lovingood.

"Why did they divide that way, Sut?"

"Why, durn hit, don't yu know that the dancin wud turn intu fitin afore the fust set got ofen the flure, ef they mix'd em? The shoes wud scronch the bar toes in dancin, an' rite then an' thar they'd mix fur a fite A hard-shell preacher wif his mouf mortised intu his face in shape like a muel's shoe, heels down, fotch hissef than soon arter dark, an' made moshuns like he ment tu stav x all nite. He got intu a corner, an' commenced a'tchunin up his sighin an' groanin aperatus, a-shakin ove his head, an' lookin like he hed the belly-ake He cudn't hev look'd more solemcoly, ef his mam hed died that mornin a-owin him two dullars an' a 'alf All these wimin an' luvely souns an' moshuns wer made on count ove the dancin. an' p'raps the cussin an' kissin. The whisky part ove that inturtainment he'd nuffin against. I know'd that, fur every time he roll'd his eyes to'ards the barril, he'd lick his lips sorter sloppy like, jis' es ef he'd been dippin 40 his bill intu a crock ove chicken gravy, an' wer tryin tu save the stray draps, what hung outside his face Oh! he wer jis' a-honin arter that ball-face whisky, he'd a 11s' kiss'd hit es sweet, an' es long, es ef hit hed been a willin gal I sorter aidged up a-side him, an' sez I-

"Mister, will yu hev a few draps ove camfire, ur laudamy? Yu seems tu be pow'ful ailin in yer innards Yu hesent swallered a live rat, ur a mole, hes yu?"

"He shook his head, an' forch a sigh, what ainded in a groan Sez I---

"'Rats ur moles am onhelthy things tu swaller afore they'se departed this life'

"He blow'd out a orful sigh, part outen his nose, but mos' ove hit out whar the toe ove the muel-shoe wer, an' see he—

"'This am a wicked an' a parvarse generashun ove vipurs, yung man'

"'An' gin up tu hardness ove hart, an' deviltry, an' belevin thunderin lies,' said I, an' I puff'd out a big sigh, wif a little groan fur a tail Sez he—

"'Thar am no-o-o-o dancin in hell,' an sot intu shakin ove his head, till I thot he'd keep on fur everlastin, an' ever more Sez I—

"'Haint yu slitely mistaken'd in that las' re-mark ove yourn' Ef that's es much hot truck, an' brimstone, an'

¹⁴ counter-hoppers, store clerks cinders, an' hickory smoke, an' big hurtin, in hell es yu tolks sez thar am, thar mus' be sum dancin, purtickeler-Jy jigs an' quick-steps, they don't lack fur music, I reckon, fur I'se allers hearn hell wer full ove fiddlers, an' thar's Yankees enuf thar tu invent fire-proof fiddils fur em so they don't want fur tchunes. All on yeath that bothers me is the rosim.

'Ah, yung onregenerit man,' sez he, 'thar's more rosim in hell than thar's in all Noth Caliny.'

"But hit ain't quite hard enuf tu rub ontu fiddil bows, 18 hit?' sez I

He groand an' shook his head, an' sent one ove his eyes to'ards the whisky corner I went an' fotch 'im a big slug intu a gourd. That shovel-shaped onder lip ove his'n jis' fell out'ards like ontu the fallin door ove a stone coal stove, an he upsot the gourd inside ove his teef I seed the mark ove the truck gwine down his troat jis' like a snake travelin thru a wet sassidge gut He smelt into the good a good long smell, turned up his eyes, an' sed 'Barlm ove life'

"Thinks I, ole Sock, I know what fotch yu tu this frolic besides yu're hoss an' our whisky Bart now cum up, an' Hardshell tole him he'd cum tu stay all nite, ef he suited all roun

"'Sartinly, oh vas, an' welcum,' sed Bart

"The ole Sock, never alterin the shape ove the hole tore in his face, sed, mity sneerin like, 'Yu is hosspitabil' I seed Bart sorter start, an' look at him, an' go off awinkin at me tu foller him We went outside the hous', intu a chimbly corner, an' thar wer two fellers, wun ove em a she, a-whisperin We went tu tuther corner, an' thar wer two more, then we went tu the stabil, an' hearn whisperin thar, hit mout been rats a-runnin in straw So Bart cud hold in no longer Sez he-

"'Never mine, I don't keer a durn who hears me I bleve I'se been 'sulted in my own hous', didn't that durn'd preachin mersheen call me a hoss?

"That's jis' what he sed He call'd yu a hoss-pitabil," sez I

"'Pıtabıl, pıtabıl,' sez Bart, 'dam ef I don't b'leve that's wus nur the hoss

"'Sartinly,' sez I, 'pitabil is a sorter Latin tail stuck tu hit so yu moutn't onderstand, hit means pitiful hoss in Inglish, an' ef I wer yu, I'd see that his stumack wer spiled fur Peg's fried chicken an' biskit. I'd go rite in an' show him how a hoss ken kick an' sich like' He jis' gritted his teef, like he wer a-chompin aigshells, ur paragorick phials, an' put fur the hous', a-rollin up his shut-sleeves es he went, plum up to his arm-pit.

"The durn'd, hiperkritikil, groanin ole Hardshell raskil 50 hed dun got the dancin stop't; he'd tuck the fiddil away frum the nigger, an' wer a-holdin hit by the naik in wun han, an' a-makin gesters wif the bow in tuther He wer mounted ontu a cheer, clost by the meal barril, an' wer exortin em orfully 'bout thar sins ove omishun an' cummishun, purtickerly the cummishun wuns, wif the dancin sins at the head, warin sunflower caliker wuns nex'; an' then cum that smaller sins, sich es ridin a-hine fellers on the same hoss, whisperin outen doors, an' a-winkin a-hine fans, tuckey-tails an' hankerchers, an' 60 sed that black silk wer plenty in hell, that hit wer used fur mournin thar, an' not tu dance in. The he sins, ove the small sort, wer cumin frum town ove nites, a-warin store clothes, smellin ove cinamint ile, an' a-totin striped sugar candy in thar pockets, tu turn the minds ove the weak gals, instead ove a flask ove that good holesum ole truck, what they'se got in towns, name

'coniack' "The wimmen folks wer backed up in bunches, in the corners, an' agin the beds, wif that fingers in that 70 moufs, an' wun ur two ove the saftest ove em wer gettin up a quiet sort ove dry cryin

"The he fellers all looked like they'd mos' es leave fite es not, ef they knew how tu start the thing, when in bounced Bart; he looked like a catamount, wun jump an' he stood a-top ove the meal barril, squar in frunt ove Hardshell, his har a-swayin about wif pure mad, like a patch ove ripe rye in a wind, an' his eyes wer es roun an es red as a bull's when he's a-jinin in battil wif anuther bull frum Bashan He struck wun fistes away 80 out a-hine, an' wif tuther reachin at arm's laingth, he cummenc'd borin, like he hed a gimblit in his shot fis', rite onder the snout ove the thunderin Hardshell, like he wer tryin tu bore his mouf inter a better shape, an' a-narratin thru his teef these facs, in words what sounded like grittin hard co'n

"'Y" durn'd infunel, incumpassabil warter-dorg! yu cuss'd hiperkritikal, ongrateful ole mus-rat! yu h-ll fir'd, divin, splatterin, pond-makin, iron-jacker'd ole son ove a mud-turtil, yu hes 'sulted me in my own hous', 90 an' in Latin et that, an' then yu've tuck the imperdent liberty tu skare these yere children outen thar innersent mucement, (still borin away frum left tu right, wif that horny fis' ove his'n, an' the Hardshell's head gwine furder back every twist.) Call'd me a hoss——Git ofen that cheer!

"Es he sed 'git,' he loaned the passun a mos' tremenjus contushun, rite in the bull curl I seed his shoe-soles agwine up each side ove Bart's fis' afore he hed time tu muve hit, arter he struck. Hit wer a lick, George, that hed hit been a kick, a four year ole muel wud hev been pow'ful proud ove I seed ni ontu a gallon ove sparks ove fire fly outen the passun's eyes mysef (he mus hev seed a bushel) when hit reached his curl. He let the fiddil go when he wer in the highes parr ove his backward summerset, an' the nigger what hed been watchin up at hit all this time, wis'ful like, es a dorg watches a meat-skin when yu holds hit too high fur him tu grab, cotch his fiddil in bof hans afore hit toch the yeath

"Dar by golly, you no git tu smash dis fiddil, wid 20 yu durn fool fitin an' preachin."

"An' holdin it wavinly abuv his head, he dodged outen the surkil ove imejut danger. The old Shell lit ontu his all fours, hit bein that much more nur a full summerset, an' the black silk lit a-stradil ove him. I know'd hit wer the black silk, bekase I seed the white stockins an' grey garters. Hev I mention'd that thar wer one hundred an' twenty-five pouns ove live, black-eyed gal in under that black silk?"

"No, Sut"

o"Well, thar wer, an' that she wer bof live an' willin, ole Dipper wer soon redy tu swar. 'Black silk in hell is thar,' scream'd she, a-hissin like ontu a cat, an' cummenced a-pullin up by the roots his long har, like hit wer flax, wif bof hans, an' a-shakin the bunches ofen her fingers, an' then gwine fur more, the hissin gittin a littil louder every pull George, that wer the fust spessamin ove a smokin mad gal I've seed in a hen's age, she kerried out my idear ove a fust-rate flax-puller, pullin agin two, fur a bet I think she gin the ole Shell the idear that sum strong man body wer a-holden his head ni ontu the saws ove a activ cotton gin

"Now the boy name Obed, with the hame laigs, hevin a sorter jestis' ove the peace turn ove mine, run in tu pull her off, an' cudn't du hit afore she made a rake fur his har, an' got hit. She jis' mixed the hanful wif the pile on the flure, an' gin hersef back tu the job ove preparin the passun fur a wig. A hawk-billed, weazeleyed, rat-mouthed feller, what hed been a-struttin roun Black Silk all nite, a-trailin wun wing, an' a-lickin his lips, seed the fool boy name Obed, a-tryin tu git her tu silite ofen the old Sock, so he jis' growl'd low, an' barked once, an' kiver'd him, an' afore his mam Peg, an' me, an' five uther gals, cud git him loose, he hed made her cub the speckterkil yu sees roostin on that ar fence, an' he's hed ni ontu three weeks tu mend his looks in, by Jew David's plarster, sweet ile, an' the keer ove his mam

"The fitin now got tu be gineral on mos parts ove the field, an' es the cuppils cum in frum outen doors, lookin sorter sneakin, an' pale, (frum the nise ove the rumpus, I speck,) wun at leas', outen every par, got jump't on e by sumbody P'raps a gal wud kiver a cumin in gal, anuther gal wud go fur the har an' skin ove a cumin in he feller, then, agin, the fis' ove a he wud meet anuther cumin in he, right atween the eyes, an' so on till the thing got tu be durn'dably mix'd up an' lively Peg boun 'ip the boy name Obed's wouns, bruises, an petrifyin sores, an' then went on wif supper cookin, like all wer quiet on the Pertomack

'Es soon es ole Shell begun to cum to, frum Bart's dubbil distill'd thunder-bolt, the hurtin all over his head begun tu attrack his 'tenshun, an' soaked thru his skull, an' in thar tuck the shape ove an idear, the idear shaped hitsef intu spoken wurds, an' they wer, 'Gird up yer loins an' git' I seed the wurkin ove his mind, so I jis shouted es loud es I could beller, 'The Pherlistshuns be upon yu Sampsın' He hearn hit, an' wer struck wif the force ove the remark, an' started fur the back door, still on his all fours, in a single foot rack Es soon es Black Silk felt him movin, she cummenced spurrin him wif her heels, while she hilt tu his har wif wun han, she 80 tuck a pin outen her collar wif tuther, an' made a cushion fur hit in the hill, ontu the north side ove the pint ove his back-bone, he kicked up an' snorted, an' changed the single foot rack intu a tarin pace, loped outen the door intu outer darkness, an' his heel-tops wer the last I seed ove him He stumbled an' fell down the log-steps, an flung Black Silk like onto a full balloon over his head. (I seed a heap ove white shinin es she went) He felt his way in the dark, thru the woods, fur more pleasant places, an' she cum in larfin, 'Black silk in hell, hey?' -3 wer every word she sed"

"Go on, Sut"

"That's all. I ain't like ole Glabbergab; when I'se spoke off what I knows, I stops talkin."

"Well, what became of Hardshell?"

"Oh! es tu that, he made his 'pearance las' Sunday, in the pulpit, es bald es a jug, wif a black spot aidged wif green an' yaller, 'bout the size ove a president forehead, an' preach't bout the orful kanadanas Absalom's hevin long har, human depravity, an' the Salt Lake; sed he wer gwine that right off, an he'll du hit."

Mrs. Yardley's Quilting

I har's one durn'd nasty muddy job, an' I is jis' glad enuf tu take a ho'n ur two, on the straingth ove hit."

"What have you been doing, Sut?" "Helpin tu salt ole Missis Yardley down"

"What do you mean by that?"

"Fixin her fur rotten cumfurtably, kiverin her up wif sile, tu keep the buzzards frum cheatin the wurms."

"Oh, you have been helping to bury a woman."

"That's hit, by golly' Now why the devil can't I splain mysef like yu? I ladles out my words at randum, like a calf kickin at yaller-jackids, yu jis' rolls em out tu the pint, like a feller a-layin bricks—every one fits How is it that bricks fits so clost enyhow? Rocks won't ni du hit"

"Becaze they'se all ove a size," ventured a man with a wen over his eye.

"The devil yu say, hon'ey-head! haint reapin-mersheens ove a size? I'd like to see two ove em fit clost Yu wait ontil yu sprouts tuther ho'n, afore yu venters tu splain mix'd questions George, did yu know ole Missis Yardley?"

"Well, she wer a curious 'oman in her way, an' she "No." wore shiney specks Now jis' listen. Whenever yu see a ole 'oman ahine a par ove shiney specks, yu keep yer eye skınn'd; they am dang'rus in the extreme Thar is jis' no knowin what they ken du. I hed one a-stradil ove me onst, fur kissin her gal. She went fur my har, an' she went fur my skin, ontil I tho't she ment tu kıll me, an' wud a-dun hit, ef my hollerin hadent fotch ole Dave 30 Jordan, a bacheler, tu my aid He, like a durn'd fool, cotch her by the larg, an' drug her back'ards ofen me She jis kivered him, an' I run, by golly! The nex time I seed him he wer bald headed, an' his face looked like he'd been a-fitin wildcats.

"Ole Missis Yardley wer a great noticer ove littil things, that nobody else ever seed She'd say right in the middil ove sumbody's serious talk 'Law sakes' that goes that yaller slut ove a hen, a-flingin straws over her shoulder, she's arter settin now, an' haint laid but seven 40 aigs. I'll disapint her, see ef I don't, I'll put a punkin in her ne's, an' a feather in her nose. An' bless my soul jis' look at that cow wif the wilted ho'n, a-flingin up dirt an' a-smellin the place whar hit cum frum, wif the rale ginuine still-wurim twis' in her tail, too, what upon the face ove the yeath kin she be arter now, the ole fool? watch her, Sally An' sakes alive' Jis' look at that ole sow, she's a-gwine in a fas' trot, wif her empty bag afloppin agin her sides Thar, she hes stop't, an's alistenin' massy on us' what a long yearnis grunt she gin, 50 hit cum frum way back ove her kidneys Thar she goes agin; she's arter no good, sich kerryin on means no good'

"An' so she wud gabble, no odds who wer a-listenin She looked like she mout been made at fust 'bout four foot long, an' the common thickness ove wimen when they's at tharsefs, an' then had her har tied tu a stump, a par ove steers hitched to her heels, an' then straiched out a-mos' two foot more-mos' ove the straichin cumin outen her laigs an' naik Her stockins, a-hangin on the clothes-line tu dry, looked like a par ove sabre scab- 60 bards, an' her naik looked like a dry beef shank smoked, an' mout been ni ontu es tough I never felt hit mysef, I didn't, I jis' jedges by looks. Her darter Sal wer bilt at fust bout the laingth ove her mam, but wer never straiched eny by a par ove steers an' she wer fat enuf tu kill; she wer taller lyin down than she wer a-standin up Hit wer her who gin me the 'hump shoulder' Jis' look at me; haint I'se got a tech ove the dromedary back that bad' haint I humpy? Well, a-stoopin tu kiss that squatty lardstan ove a gal is what dun hit tu me She wer the fairest-lookin gal I ever seed. She allers wore thick woolin stockins 'bout six inches too long fur her laig, they rolled down over her garters, lookin like a par ove life-presarvers up thar I tell yu she wer a tarin gal enyhow. Luved kissin, wrastlin, an' biled cabbige, an' hated tite clothes, hot weather, an' suckit-riders B'leved strong in married folk's ways, cradles, an' the remishun ove sins, an' didn't b'leve in corsets, fleas, peaners, nur the fashun plates''

"What caused the death of Mrs Yardley, Sut?"

"Nuffin, only her heart stop't beatin 'bout losin a nine dimunt quilt True, she got a skeer'd hoss tu run over her, but she'd a-got over that ef a quilt hadn't been mix'd up in the catastrophy Yu see quilts wer wun ove 20 her speshul gifts, she run strong on the bed-kiver question Irish chain, star ove Texas, sun-flower, nine dimunt, saw teeth, checker board, an' shell quilts, blue, an' white, an' yaller an' black coverlids, an' callickercumfurts reigned triumphan' 'bout her hous' They wer packed in drawers, layin in shelfs full, we: hung four dubbil on lines in the lof, packed in chists, piled on cheers, an' wer everywhar, even ontu the beds, an' wer changed every bed-makin She told everybody she cud git tu listen tu hit that she ment tu give every durn'd 30 one ove them tu Sal when she got married Oh, lordy! what es fat a gal es Sal Yardley cud ever du wif half ove em, an' sleepin wif a husbun at that, is more nor I ever cud see through Jis' think ove her onder twenty layer ove quilts in July, an' yu in that too Gewhillikins! George, look how I is sweatin' now, an' this is December I'd 'bout es lief be shet up in a steam biler wif a three hundred pound bag ove lard, es tu make a bisiness ove sleepin wif that gal-'twould kill a glass-blower.

"Well, tu cum tu the serious part ove this conversashun, that is how the old quilt-mersheen an coverlidloom cum tu stop operashuns on this yeath. She hed narrated hit thru the neighborhood that nex Saterday she'd gin a quiltin—three quilts an one cumfurt tu tie
'Goblers, fiddils, gals, an whisky,' wer the words she sent tu the men-folk, an more tetchin ur wakenin words never drap't ofen an 'oman's tongue She sed tu the gals, 'Sweet toddy, huggin, dancin, an huggers in 'bun-dunce. Them words struck the gals rite in the pit ove the stumick, an spread a ticklin sensashun bof ways, ontil they scratched that heads wif one han, an that heels wif tuther

"Everybody, he an' she, what wer baptized blever. in the righteousnes ove quiltins wer thar, an' hit 118' so happen'd that everybody in them parts, frum fifteen summers tu fifty winters, wer unannamus b'levers Strange, warn't hit? Hit wer the bigges' quiltin ever Missis Yardley hilt, an' she hed hilt hundreds, even body wer thar, 'scept the constibil an' suckit-rider, two dam easily-spared pussons, the numbers ni ontu even too, jis' a few more boys nur gals, that made hit more exhitin, fur hit gin the gals a chance tu kick an' squeal a littil, wifout runnin eny risk ove not gittin kissed at all, an' hit gin reasonabil grouns fur a few scrimmages amung the he's Now es kissin an' fitin am the pepper an' salt ove all soshul getherins, so hit wer more espishully wif this ove ours Es I swung my eyes over the crowd, George, I thought quiltins, managed in a morril an' sensibil way, truly am good things-good fur free drinkin, good fur free eatin, good fur free huggin good fur free dancin, good fur free fitin, an' goodest ove all fur poperlatin a country fas

"That am a fur-seein wisdum in quiltins, ef they hes proper trimmins 'vittils, fiddils, an' sperrits in 'bun dunce'. One holesum quiltin am wuf three old pray't meetins on the poperlashun pint, purtickerly ef hits hilt in the dark ove the moon, an' runs intu the night a few hours, an' April ur May am the time chosen. The moon don't suit quiltins whar everybody is well acquainted an' already fur along in courtin. She dus help pow'ful tu begin a courtin match onder, but when hit draws ni ontu a head, nobody wants a moon but the ole mammys.

"The mornin cum, still, saft, sunshiney, cocks crowin, hens singin, birds chirpin, tuckeys gobblin—jis' the day tu sun quilts, kick, kiss, squeal, an' make love

"All the plow-lines an clothes-lines wer straiched to every post an tree Quilts purvailed Durn my gizzard of two acres roon that ar house warn't jis one solid quilt, all out a-sunnin, an to be seed. They dazzled the eyes, skeered the hosses, gin wimen the heart-burn, an perdominated

"To'ards sundown the he's begun tu drap in Yearnis needil-drivin cummenced tu lose groun, threads broke ofen, thimbils got los', an 'quilts needed anuther roll Gigglin, winkin, whisperin, smoofin ove har, an' gals aticklin one anuther, wer a-gainin every inch ove groun what the needls los'. Did yu ever notis, George, at all sushul getherins, when the he's begin tu gather, that the young she's begin tu tickil one anuther an' the ole naids swell thar tails, roach up thar backs, an' sharpen thar nails ontu the bed-posts an' door jams, an' spit an' groan sorter like cats a-courtin? Dus hit mean rale rath, ur is hit a dare tu the he's, sorter kivered up wif the outside signs ove danger? I honestly bleve that the young shes' ticklin means, 'Cum an' take this job ofen our hans' But that swellin I jis' don't onderstan, dus yu' Hit looks skeery, an' I never tetch one ove em when they am in the swellin way I may be mistaken'd bout the ticklin bisiness too, hit may be dun like a teller chaws poplar bark when he haint got eny terbacker, sorter better nur nun make-shif I dus know one thing tu a certainty that is, when the he's take hold the ticklin quits, an' ef yu gits one ove the ole maids out tu hersef, hen she subsides an' is the smoofes, sleekes, saft thing ju ever seed, an' dam ef yu can't hear her purr, jis' es plain!

But then, George, gals an ole maids haint the things tu fool time away on Hits widders, by golly, what am the rale sensibil, steady-goin, never-skeerin, neverkickin, willin, sperrited, smoof pacers They cum clost up tu the hoss-block, standin still wif that purty silky tears playin, an' the naik-veins a-throbbin, an' waits fur the word, which ove course yu gives, arter yu finds yer teet well in the stirrup, an' away they moves like a cradil on cushioned rockers, ur a spring buggy runnin in damp san' A tetch ove the bridil, an' they knows yu wants em tu turn, an' they dus hit es willin es ef the idear wer than own 1 be dod rabbited ef a man can't propriate happiness by the skinful ef he is in contack wif sumbody's widder, an' is smart. Gin me a willin widder, the yeath over what they don't know, haint worth larnin. They hes all been tu Jamakey an' larnt how sugar's made, an' knows how tu sweeten wif hit, ' an' by golly, they is always ready tu use hit. All yu hes tu du is tu find the spoon, an' then drink cumfort till yer blind Nex tu good sperrits an' my laigs, I likes a twenty-five year ole widder, wif roun ankils, an' bright eyes, honestly an squarly lookin intu yurn, an sayin es plainly es a partrige sez Bob White, 'Don't be afraid ove me, I hes been thar, yu know hit ef yu hes eny sense, an' thar's no use in eny humbug, ole feller—cum ahead!"

"Ef yu onderstans widder nater, they ken save yu a power ove troubil, onsartinty, an' time, an' ef yu is interprisin yu gits mons rous well paid fur hit. The very soun 50 ove thar littil shoe-heels speak full trainin, an' hes a knowin click as they tap the floor; an the rustil ove thar dress sez, 'I dar yu tu ax me'

"When yu hes made up yer mind tu court one, jis go at hit like hit wer a job ove rail-maulin Ware yer workin close, use yer common, every-day moshuns an words, an' abuv all, fling away yer cinamint ile vial an' burn all yer love songs No use in tryin tu fool em, fur they sees plum thru yu, a durn'd sight plainer than they dus thru thar veils. No use in a pasted shut, she's been 40 thar. No use in borrowin a cavortin fat hoss, she's been thar No use in har-dye, she's been thar No use in cloves, tu kill whisky breff, she's been thar. No use in buyin clost curtains fur yer bed, fur she has been thar Widders am a speshul means, George, fur ripenin green men, killin off weak ones, an makin ternally happy the soun ones

"Well, es I sed afore I flew the track an' got ontu the widders The fellers begun tu ride up an' walk up, sorter slow, like they warn't in a hurry, the durn'd 'saitful 70 raskils, hitchin that critters tu enything they cud find One red-comb'd, long-spurr'd, dominecker feller, frum town, in a red an' white gridiron jackid an' patent leather gaiters, hitched his hoss, a wild, skeery, walleyed devil, inside the yard palins, tu a cherry tree lim' Thinks I, that hoss hes a skeer intu him big enuf tu run intu town, an' perhaps beyant hit, ef I kin only tetch hit off, so I sot intu thinkin

"One aind ove a long clothes-line, wif nine dimunt quilts ontu hit, wer tied to the same cherry tree that the 80 hoss wer I tuck my knife and socked hit thru every quilt, 'bout the middil, an' jis' below the rope, an' tied them that wif Lark, so they cudent slip. Then I went tu the back aind, an' ontied hit frum the pos', knottin in a hoe-handil, by the middil, tu keep the quilts frum slippin oft ef my bark strings failed, an' laid hit on the groun Then I went tu the tuther aind that wer 'bout ten foot tu spar, a-lyin on the groun arter tyin tu the tree I tuck hit atwix Wall-eye's hine laigs, an' tied hit fas' tu bof stirrups, an' then cut the cherry tree lim' 90

betwix his bridil an' the tree, almos' off Now, mine yu thar wer two ur three uther ropes full ove quilts atween me an' the hous', so I wer purty well hid frum thar I jis' tore off a palin frum the fence, an' tuck hit in bof hans, an' arter raisin hit 'way up vander. I fotch hit down, es hard es I cud. flatsided to'ards the groun, an' hit acksidentally happen'd tu hit Wall-eye, bout nine inches ahead ove the root ove his tail. Hit landed so hard that hit made my hans tingle, an' then busted intu splinters 10 The first thing I did, wer tu feel ove mysef, on the same spot whar hit hed hit the hoss. I cudent help duin hit tu save my life, an' I swar I felt sum ove Wall-eye's sensashun, jis' es plain. The fust thing he did, wer tu tare down the lim' wif a twenty foot jump, his head to'ards the hous' Thinks I, now yu hev dun hit, yu durn'd wall-eyed fool! tarin down that lim' wer the beginin ove all the troubil, an' the hoss did hit hissef, my conshuns felt clar es a mountin spring, an' I wer in a frame ove mine tu obsarve things es they happen'd, 20 an' they soon begun tu happen purty clost arter one anuther rite then, an' thar, an' tharabouts, clean ontu town, thru hit, an' still wer a-happenin, in the woods bevant that ni ontu eleven mile frum ole man Yardley's gate, an' four beyant town

"The fust line ove quilts he tried tu jump, but broke hit down, the nex one he ran onder, the rope cotch ontu the ho'n ove the saddil, broke at bof ainds, an' went along wif the hoss, the cherry tree lim' an' the fust line ove quilts, what I hed proverdensally tied fas' tu the 30 rope That's what I calls foresight, George Right furnint the frunt door he cum in contack wif ole Missis Yardley hersef, an' another ole 'oman, they wer a-holdin a nine dimunt quilt spread out, a-zaminin hit, an' apraisin hits purfeckshuns. The durn'd onmanerly, walleved fool run plum over Missis Yardley, frum ahine, stompt one hine foot through the quilt, takin hit along, a-kickin ontil he made hits corners snap like a whip. The gals screamed, the men hollered wo' an' the ole 'oman wer toted into the hous' limber es a wet 40 string, an' every word she sed wer, 'Oh my preshus nine dimunt quilt!"

"Wall-eye busted thru the palins, an' Dominicker sed 'im, made a mortal rush fur his bitts, wer too late fur them, but in good time fur the strings ove flyin quilts, got tangled amung em, an' the gridiron jackid patren wer los' tu my sight amung star an' Irish chain quilts. he went frum that quiltin at the rate ove thuty miles to the hour Nuffin lef on the lot ove the hole consarn, but a nine biler hat, a par ove gloves, an' the jack ove hearts

"What a onmanerly, suddin way ove leavin places sum folks hev got, enyhow.

"Thinks I, well, that fool hoss, tarin down that cherry tree lim, hes dun sum good, enyhow, hit hes put the old oman outen the way fur the balance ove the quiltin, and tuck Dominicker outen the way and outen danger, fur that gridiron jackid wud a-bred a scab on his nose afore midnite, hit wer morrily boun tu du hit.

"Two months arterwards, I tracked the route that hoss tuck in his kalamatus skeer, by quilt rags, tufts ove cotton, bunches ove har, (human an' hoss,) an' scraps ove a gridiron jackid stickin ontu the bushes, an' plum at the aind ove hit, whar all sign gin out, I foun a piece ove watch chain an' a hosses head. The places what know'd Dominicker, know'd 'im no more

"Well, arter they'd tuck the ole 'oman up stairs an camfired her tu sleep, things begun tu work agin. The widders broke the ice, an' arter a littil gigilin, goblin an' gabblin, the kissin begun. Smack'—'Thar, now a widder sed that Pop'—Oh, don't! Pfip'—Oh, vu quit! Ploth'—Go usay yu awkerd critter, yu kissed me in the eye!' anuther widder sed that Bop'. Now yu ar satisfied, I recon, big mouf! Vip'—'That haint fair! Spat'—Oh, lordy! May, cum pull Bill away, he's atanglin my har.' Thut'—I jis' d-a-r-e yu tu du thir agin!' a widder sed that, too. Hit sounded all 'roun tu room like poppin co'n in a hot skillet, an' wer pow tul sujestif

"Hit kep on ontil I be durn'd ef my bristils didn't begin tu rise an' sumthin like a cold buckshot wud run down the marrow in my back-bone bout every ten secons, an' then run up agin, tolerabil hot I kep a swallerin wif nuthin tu swaller, an' my face felt swell'd an yet I wer teard tu make a bulge. Thinks I, Ill ketch one out tu hersef torreckly, an' then I guess we'll rastil. Purty soon Sal Yardley started fur the smoke ous, so I jis gin my head a tew short shakes, let down one ove my wings a-trailin, an' sirkiled roun her wif a side twis' in my naik, steppin sidewise, an' a-fetchin up my hinmos' foot wif a sorter jerkin slide at every step Sez I, 'Too coo-took a-too' She onderstood hit, an stopt sorter spreadin her shoulders. An' jis' es I hed pouch'd out my mouf, an' wer a-reachin forrid wif hit, for the article hitsef, sunthin interfared wif me, hit did George, wer yu ever ontu yer hans an' knees, an' let a nell-tarin big, mad ram, wif a ten-yard run, but yu ve irins ly, jis' onst, right squar ontu the pint ove yer hack-bone?

No, you fool, why do you ask?"

Kize I wanted tu know ef vu cud hev a realizin' pushin ove my shock. Hits scarcely worth while tu try ... make yu onderstan the case by words only, onless yu her been tetched in that way Gr-eat golly! the fust thing I felt, I tuck hit tu be a back-ackshun yeathquake. in the fust thing I seed wer my chaw'r terbacker athin over Sal's head like a skeer'd bat. My mouf wer pouch'd out, ready fur the article hitsef, yu know, an' bit went outen the roun hole like the wad outen a popgun-thug! an' the fust thing I know'd, I wer a flyin over Sal's head too, an' a-gainin on the chaw'r terbacker tast I wer straitened out strait, toes hinemos', middil unger-nails foremos', an' the fust thing I hearn wer, 'Yu dam Shanghi!' Great Jerus-a-lam! I lit ontu my all fours in time tu but the yard gate ofen hits hinges, an' skeer loose sum more hosses-kep on in a four-footed gallop, clean acrost the lane afore I cud straiten up, an' yere I cotch up wif my chaw'r terbacker, stickin flat agin a fence-rail. I hed got so good a start that I thot hit a pity tu spile hit, so I jis' jump'd the fence an' tuck thru the orchurd I tell yu I dusted these yere close, fur I thot hit wer arter me

"Arter runnin a spell, I ventered tu feel roun back thar, fur sum signs ove what hed happened tu me. 30 George, arter two pow'ful hard tugs, I pull'd out the vamp an' sole ove one ove ole man Yardley's big brogans, what he hed los' amung my coat-tuils Dre'ful, dre'-ful! Arter I got hit away frum thar, my flesh went fas' asleep, frum abuv my kidneys tu my knees, about now, fur the fust time, the idear struck me, what hit wer that hed interfar'd wif me, an' los' me the kiss. Hit wer ole Yardley hed kicked me. I walked fui a month like I wer straddlin a thorn hedge. Sich a shock, at sich a time, an' on sich a place—jis' think ove hit' hit am tremenjus, 40 haint hit? The place feels num, right now."

"Well, Sut, how did the quilting come out?"

"How the hell du yu 'speck me tu know' I warn't thar env more"

Thomas Bangs Thorpe

1815 · 1878

Although he was the author of the most famous tall tale of the pre-Civil War Southwest, "The Big Bear of Arkansas," Thomas Bangs Thorpe was born in the East—in Westfield, Massachusetts, in 1815. He left Wesleyan University, in Middletown, Connecticut, in 1836, when ill health made it necessary for him to move to a milder climate, and settled down in Baton Rouge, Louisiana In Louisiana and other parts of what was then the Far West, Thorpe gathered material for both paintings and writings which won a fine reputation for him

Thorpe had a varied career He painted various frontier scenes and numerous portraits, among the most admired of which were one of Jenny I ind and one of his friend, Zachary Taylor He edited several newspapers and wrote a number of sketches which were widely reprinted He was in the army during the Mexican War After the war, he returned to the East—to New York, where he was an editor until his death in 1878

The Mysteries of the Backwoods, or Sketches of the Southwest including Character, Scenery and Rural Sports (1846) and The Hive of the Bee Hunter (1854) were Thorpe's best books—both of them collections of sketches detailing life in the backwoods. The Big Bear of Arkansas," this author's masterpiece, first appeared in a great publication of masculine humor of the day.

The Spirit of the Times, in 1841. Like many other pieces published in that journal, this narrative shows how the art of the oral tale gave shape and substance to narrative in print.

F J Meine, 'Thomas Bangs Thorpe,' Dictionary of American Biography, New York, 1535 • Walter Blair, Native American Humon (1800-1900), Cincinnati, 1937

The Big Bear of Arkansas

In 1839 John Neal, an Eastern critic and fiction writer quite prominent at the time, published the article "Story-Telling" in the New York Mirror "Of all the stories I meet with," he testified, "none are so delightful to me as those I over-hear on board a steam-boat or a stage-coach... live stories, brimful of energy and vivacity." Thorpes "Big Bear," published a couple of years later, conveyed much of the life and the gusto of a good yarn spun in the social hall of a steamboat.

If, as many good critics agree, the essence of humor is incongruity, Thorpe's narrative contains that essence. One notes the disparity, for instance, between the various worlds in the story—worlds which are identified with various groups and various scenes. Contrasted are the heterogeneous world of the steamboat, realistically portrayed in the "literary" words of the author, the fashionable world of New Orleans, satirically described in the homely words of Jim Doggett, and the comic, wildly fantastic world of Shirt-tail Bend in Arkansas, imaginatively revealed by Jim's poetical invention. Each of these worlds has its own elements of amusement, and the juxtaposition underlines and contrasts these elements.

As Jim—a fascinating character in his own right—tells his tall tale, he becomes more and more imaginative. The "creation state" of Arkansas, as he pictures it, is astonishing compared with any other part of America, and Shirt tail Bend is astonishing even for Arkansas. Ordinary bear hunts in Jim's section are truly extraordinary, but the greathurt here described is even more wonderful. And as the account of the Big Bear proceeds, even that monster takes on more and more of a supernatural aspect.

Just at the moment Jim's fancy soars into the empyrean, a homely detail—the loss of the valiant hunter's "inex pressibles"—contrasts his imaginative flight with mundane reality. But Jim, having started to soor, is carried along by his imaginings. At the end his yarn, which has started as a jest, has become so real to its creator that he is tremendously impressed by it.

A steamboat on the Mississippi frequently, in mak ing her regular trips, carries between places varyin from one to two thousand miles apart, and as these boats advertise to land pissengers and freight at 'all intermediate landings, the heterogeneous character of the passengers of one of these up-country boats can scarcely be imagined by one who has never seen it with his own eyes Starting from New Orleans in one of these boats, you will find yourself associated with men from every state in the Union, and from every portion of the globe, and a man of observation need not lack for amusement or instruction in such a crowd, if he will take the trouble to read the great book of character so tavourably opened before him. Here may be seen jostling together the wealthy Southern planter, and the pedlar of tin-ware from New England-the Northern merchant, and the Southern jockey-a venerable bishop and a desperate gambler,—the land speculator, and the nanest farmer—professional men of all creeds and characters—Wolvereens, Suckers, Hoosiers, Buckeyes, and Corn-crackers, beside a "plentiful sprinkling" of the half-horse and half-alligator species of men, who are peculiar to "old Mississippi," and who appear to gain a livelihood simply by going up and down the river. In the pursuit of pleasure or business, I have frequently round myself in such a crowd.

On one occasion, when in New Orleans, I had occasion to take a trip of a few miles up the Mississippi, ad I hurried on board the well-known "high-pressureand-beat-everything" steamboat Invincible, just as the last note of the last bell was sounding, and when the confusion and bustle that is natural to a boat's getting under way had subsided, I discovered that I was associated in as heterogeneous a crowd as was ever got rogether. As my trip was to be of a few hours' duration only, I made no endeavours to become acquainted with on fellow passengers, most of whom would be together many days Instead of this, I took out of my pocket the latest paper," and more critically than usual examined its contents, my fellow passengers at the same time disposed themselves in little groups. While I was thus busily employed in reading, and my companions were more busily employed in discussing such subjects as suited their humours best we were startled most unexpectedly by a loud Indian whoop, uttered in the social hall," that part of the cabin fitted off for a bar, then was to be heard a loud crowing, which would not have continued to have interested us-such sounds being quite common in that place of spirits-had not the hero of these windy accomplishments stuck his head into the cabin and hallooed out, "Hurra for the Big Bar of Arkansawi" and then might be heard a confused hum of voices, unintelligible, save in such broken sentences as horse" screamer, lightning is slow etc As might have been expected, this continued interruption attracted the attention of every one in the cabin, all conversation dropped and in the midst of this surprise the "Big Bar" walked into the cabin, took a chair, put his feet on the stove, and looking back over his shoulder, passed the general and familiar salute of Strangers, how are you?" He then expressed himself as much at home as if he had been at "the Forks of Cypress," and "perhaps a little more so" Some of the company at this familiarity looked a little angry, and some astonished, but in a moment every face was wreathed in a smile There was something about the intruder that won the heart on sight He appeared to be a man enjoying perfect health and contentment: his 50 eyes were as sparkling as diamonds, and good-natured to simplicity Then his perfect confidence in himself was irresistibly droll "Perhaps," said he, "gentlemen," running on without a person speaking, "perhaps you have been to New Orleans often, I never made the first visit before, and I don't intend to make another in a crow's life I am thrown away in that ar place, and useless, that ar a fact Some of the gentlemen thar called me green-well, perhaps I am, said I, but I am't so at bome; and if I ain't off my trail much, the heads of them 60 perlite chaps themselves wern't much the hardest, for according to my notion, they were real know-nothings. green as a pumpkin-vine—couldn't, in fairning, I'll bet, raise a crop of turnips, and as for shooting, they'd miss a barn if the door was swinging, and that, too, with the best rifle in the country. And then they talked to me bout hunting, and laughed at my calling the principal game in Arkansaw poker, and high-low-jack 'Perhaps,' said I, 'you prefer chickens and rolette', at this they laughed harder than ever, and asked me if I lived in the 70 woods, and didn't know what game was? At this I rather think I laughed 'Yes,' I roated, and says, 'Strangers, if you'd asked me how we got our meat in Arkansaw, I'd a told you at once, and given you a list of varmints that would make a caravan, beginning with the bar and ending off with the cat, that's meat though, not game' Game, indeed, that's what city folks call it, and with them it means chippen-birds and shite-pokes, maybe such trash live in my diggens, but I arn't noticed them yet, a bird any way is too trifling. I never did shoot so at but one, and I'd never forgiven myself for that, had it weighed less than forty pounds I wouldn't draw a rifle on any thing less than that, and when I meet with another wild turkey of the same weight I will drap him"

"A wild turkey weighing forty pounds!" exclaimed twenty voices in the cabin at once

"Yes, strangers, and wasn't it a whopper? You see,

² Wolvereens, Suckers See note, p. 322 • 2 Hoosiers, Buckeyes, Corn-crackers, natives, respectively, of Indiana, Ohio, and Kentucky 78 chippen-birds and shite-pokes, chipping sparrows and green berons the thing was so fat that it couldn't fly far, and when he fell out of the tree, after I shot him, on striking the ground he bust open behind, and the way the pound gobs of tallow rolled out of the opening was perfectly beautiful."

"Where did all that happen?" asked a cynical-looking Hoosier

"Happen' happened in Arkansaw where else could it have happened, but in the creation state, the finishing10 up country—a state where the sile runs down to the centre of the 'arth, and government gives you a title to every inch of it? Then its airs—just breathe them, and they will make you snort like a horse It's a state without a fault, it is."

"Excepting mosquitoes," cried the Hoosier

"Well, stranger, except them, for it ar a fact that they are rather enormous, and do push themselves in somewhat troublesome But, stranger, they never stick twice in the same place, and give them a fair chance for 20 a few months, and you will get as much above noticing them as an alligator They can't hurt my feelings, for they lay under the skin, and I never knew but one case of injury resulting from them, and that was to a Yankee, and they take worse to foreigners, anyhow, than they do to natives. But the way they used that fellow up! first they punched him until he swelled up and busted, then he su-per-a-ted, as the doctor called it, until he was as raw as beef, then he took the ager, owing to the warm weather, and finally he took a steamboat and left the 30 country He was the only man that ever took mosquitoes to heart that I know of But mosquitoes is natur and I never find fault with her. If they ar large, Aikansaw is large, her varmints ar large, her trees ar large, her rivers ar large, and a small mosquito would be of no more use in Arkansaw than preaching in a canebrake'

This knock-down argument in favour of big mosquitoes used the Hoosier up, and the logician started on a new track, to explain how numerous bear were in his "diggins," where he represented them to be "about as plenty as blackberries, and a little plentifuler."

Upon the utterance of this assertion, a timid little man near me inquired if the bear in Arkansaw ever attacked the settlers in numbers

"No," said our hero, warming with the subject, "no, stranger, for you see it ain't the natur of bar to go in droves, but the way they squander about in pairs and single ones is edifying And then the way I hunt them the old black rascals know the crack of my gun as well as they know a pig's squealing They grow thin in our parts, it frightens them so, and they do take the noise dreadfully, poor things That gun of mine is perfect epidemic among bar, if not watched closely, it will go off as quick on a warm scent as my dog Bowie-knite will and then that dog-whew! why the fellow thinks that the world is full of bar, he find them so easy Its lucky he don't talk as well as think, for with his natural modesty, if he should suddenly learn how much he is acknowledged to be ahead of all other dogs in the universe, he would be astonished to death in two minutes Strangers, the dog knows a bar's way as well as a horsetockey knows a woman's, he always barks at the right time, bites at the exact place, and whips without getting a scratch I never could tell whether he was made expressly to hunt bar, or whether bar was made expressly for him to hunt, any way, I believe they were ordained to go together as naturally as Squire Jones says a man and woman is, when he moralizes in marrying a couble In fact, Jones once said, said he, 'Marriage according to law is a civil contract of divine origin, it's common to all countries as well as Arkansaw, and people take to it as naturally as Jim Doggett's Bowie-knife takes to bar

"What season of the year do your hunts take place' inquired a gentlemanly foreigner, who, from some peculiarities of his baggage, I suspected to be an Englishman, on some hunting expedition, probably at the foot of the Rocky Mountains

"The season for bar hunting, stranger," said the man of Arkansaw, "is generally all the year round, and the hunts take place about as regular I read in history that varmints have their fat season, and their lean season That is not the case in Arkansaw, feeding as they do upon the spontenacious productions of the sile, they have one continued fat season the year round, though in winter things in this way is rather more greasy than in summer, I must admit For that reason bar with us run in warm weather, but in winter, they only waddle, Fat, fat' it's an enemy to speed, it tames everything that has plenty of it I have seen wild turkeys from its influence, as gentle as chickens Run a bar in this fat condition. and the way it improves the critter for eating is amazing, it sort of mixes the ile up with the meat, until you can't tell t'other from which I've done this often I recollect one perty morning in particular, of putting an old tellow on the stretch, and considering the weight he carried, he run well. But the dogs soon tired him down, and when I came up with him wasn't he in a beautiful sneat—I might say fever, and then to see his tongue sticking out of his mouth a feet and his sides sinking and opening like bellows, and his cheeks so fat he couldn't look cross. In this fix I blazed at him, and pitch me niked into a briar path if the steam didn't come out of the bullet-hole ten foot in a straight line. The rellow I reckon, was made on the high-pressure system, and the lead sort of bust his biler"

That column of steam was rather curious, or else the bear must have been warm," observed the foreigner, with a laugh

"Stranger, as you observe, that bar was WARM, and he blowing off of the steam show'd it, and also how nord the varmint had been run I have no doubt if he no kept on two miles farther his insides would have nen stewed, and I expect to meet with a varmint yet of extra bottom, who will run himself into a skinful of bar's grease it is possible, much onlikelier things have happened"

Whereabouts are these bears so abundant?" inquired the foreigner, with increasing interest

Why, stranger, they inhabit the neighbourhood of my settlement, one of the prettiest places on old Mississippi-a perfect location, and no mistake, a place that nid some defects until the river made the 'cut-off' at Shirt-tail bend,' and that remedied the evil, as it brought my cabin on the edge of the river—a great advantage in wet weather, I assure you, as you can now roll a barrel of whiskey into my yard in high water from a boat, as east as falling off a log It's a great improvement, as toting it by land in a jug, as I used to do, exaporated it too fast, and it became expensive. Just stop with me, stranger, a month or two, or a year if you like, and you will appreciate my place. I can give you plenty to eat, tor beside hog and hominy, you can have bar-ham, and e bar-sausages, and a mattrass of bar-skins to sleep on, and a wildcatskin, pulled off hull, stuffed with corn-shucks tor a pillow That bed would put you to sleep if you had the rheumatics in every joint in your body. I call that not bed a quietus. Then look at my land—the government ain't got another such a piece to dispose of Such timber, and such bottom land, why you can't preserve any thing natural you plant in it unless you pick it young, things that will grow out of shape so quick. I once planted in those diggins a few potatoes and beets, they took a fine start, and after that an ox team couldn't 50 have kept them from growing About that time I went off to old Kentuck on bisiness, and did not hear from them things in three months, when I accidentally stumbled on a fellow who had stopped at my place, with an idea of buying me out 'How did you like things?' said I 'Pretty well,' said he, 'the cabin is convenient, and the timber land is good, but that bottom land ain't worth the first red cent' 'Why' said I ''Cause,' said he "Cause what?" said I "Cause it's full of ccdar stumps and Indian mounds,' said he, 'an. I it can't be cleared.' 'Lord,' 60 said I, "Them ar "cedar stumps" is beets, and them ar "Indian mounds" at tater hills." As I expected, the crop was overgrown and useless, the sile is too rich, and planting in Arkaniaw is dangerous. I had a good-sized sow killed in that same bottom land. The old thief stole an ear of corn, and took it down where she slept at night to eat. Well, she left a grain or two on the ground, and lay down on them, before morning the corn shot up, and the percussion killed her dead. I don't plant any more, natur intended Arkansaw for a hunting 70 ground, and I go according to natur"

The questioner who thus elicited the description of our hero's settlement, seemed to be perfectly satisfied and said no more, but the "Big Bar of Arkansaw" rambled on from one thing to another with a volubility perfectly astonishing, occasionally disputing with those around him, particularly with a "live Sucker" from Illinois, who had the daring to say that our Arkansaw friend's stories "smelt rather tall"

In this manner the evening was spent, but conscious 80 that my own association with so singular a personage would probably end before morning, I asked him if he would not give me a description of some particular bear hunt, adding that I took great interest in such things, though I was no sportsman. The desire seemed to please him, and he squared himself round towards me, saying, that he could give me an idea of a bar hunt that was never beat in this world, or in any other His manner was so singular, that half of his stor consisted in his excellent way of telling it, the great peculiarity of which % was the happy manner he had of emphasizing the prominent parts of his conversation. As near as I can the dogs . . . got around him, and pulled him about . . '" recollect, I have italicized them, and given the story in his own words

"Stranger," said he, 'in bar hunts I am numerous, and which particular one, as you say, I shall tell, puzzles me. There was the old she devil I shot at the Hurricane last fall-then there was the old hog thief I popped over at the Bloody Crossing and then-Yes, I have it! I will give you an idea of a hunt, in which the greatest bar was killed that ever lived, none excepted, about an old 10 fellow that I hunted more or less for two or three years, and if that ain't a particular bar hunt, I ain't got one to tell. But in the first place, stranger, let me say, I am pleased with you, because you ain't ashamed to gain information by asking, and listening and that's what I say to Countess's pups every day when I'm home, and I have got great hopes of them ar pups, because they are continually noving about, and though they stick it sometimes in the wrong place, they gain experience any how, and may learn something useful to boot. Well, 20 as I was saying about this big bar, you see when I and some more first settled in our region, we were drivin to hunting naturally, we soon liked it, and after that we found it an easy matter to make the thing our business. One old chap who had pioneered 'afore us, gave us to understand that we had settled in the right place. He dwelt upon its merits until it was affecting, and showed us, to prove his assertions, more marks on the sassaftas trees than I ever saw on a tavern door 'lection time. 'Who keeps that ar reckoning?' said I. 'The bar,' said he 'What for?' said I. 'Can't tell,' said he, 'but so it is, at the bar bite the bark and wood too, at the highest point from the ground they can reach, and you can tell, by the marks,' said he, 'the length of the bar to an inch' 'Enough,' said I. 'Twe learned something here a'ready, and I'll put it in practice.'

"Well, stranger, just one month from that time I killed a bar, and told its exact length before I measured it, by those very marks, and when I did that, I swelled up considerable—I've been a prouder man ever since So I went on, larning something every day, until I was 4 reckoned a buster, and allowed to be decidedly the best bar hunter in my district, and that is a reputation as much harder to earn than to be reckoned first man in Congress, as an iron ramrod is harder than a toadstool Did the varmints grow over-cunning by being fooled with by green-horn hunters, and by this means get troublesome, they send for me as a matter of course and thus I do my own hunting, and most of my neighbours' I walk into the varmints though, and it has become about as much the same to me as drinking. It is told in two sentences—a bar is started, and he is killed The thing is somewhat monotonous now-I know just how much they will run, where they will tire, how much they will growl, and what a thundering time I will have in getting them home. I could give you this history of the chase with all particulars at the commencement, I know the signs so well-Stranger, I'm certain Once I met with a match though, and I will tell you about it. for a common hunt would not be worth relating is something a-purpose for me, that bar is mine, or I give up the hunting business' The very next morning what should I see but a number of buzzards hovering over my cornfield. 'The rascal has been there,' said I, for that sign is certain,' and, sure enough, on examining I found the bones of what had been as beautiful a hog the day before, as was ever raised by a Buckeye Then I tracked the critter out of the field to the woods, and all the marks he left behind, showed me that he was the bar.

"Well, stranger, the first fair chase I ever had with that big critter, I saw him no less than three distinct times at a distance the dogs run him over eighteen miles and broke down, my horse gave out, and I was as nearly used up as a man can be, made on my principle, with is patent. Before this adventure, such things were unknown to me as possible, but, strange as it was, that bar got me used to it before I was done with him, for he got so at last, that he would leave me on a long coase quite easy. How he did it, I never could understand. That a bar runs at all, is puzzling, but how this one could tire down and bust up a pack of hounds and a horse, that were used to overhauling everything they started after in no time, was past my understanding Well, stranger, that bar finally got so sassy, that he used to help himself to a hog off my premises whenever he winted one, the buzzards followed after what he left, and so between bar and buzzard I rather think I was at of pork.

Well, missing that bar so often took hold of my yeals, and I wasted away. The thing had been carried and far, and it reduced me in flesh faster than an ager I would see that bar in every thing I did, he hunted me and that, too, like a devil, which I began to think he was While in this fix, I made preparations to give him a list brush, and be done with it. Having completed every thing to my satisfaction, I started at sunrise, and to my treat joy, I discovered from the way the dogs run, that they were near him, finding his trail was nothing, for that had become as plain to the pack as a turnpike road On we went, and coming to an open country, what should I see but the bar very leisurely ascending a hill id the dogs close at his heels, either a match for him in need, or else he did not care to get out of their way-I don't know which But wasn't he a beauty, though? I loved him like a brother

"On he went, until he came to a tree, the limbs of which formed a crotch about six feet from the ground Into this crotch he got and seated himself, the dogs yelling all around it, and there he sat eyeing them as 50 quiet as a pond in low water. A green-horn friend of mine, in company reached shooting distance before me, and blazed away, hitting the critter in the centre of his forehead. The bar shook his head as the ball struck it, and then walked down from that tree as gently as a lady would from a carriage 'Twas a beautiful sight to see him do that—he was in such a rage that he seemed to be as little afraid of the dogs as if they had been sucking pigs, and the dogs warn't slow in making a ring around him at a respectful distance, I tell you, 60 even Bowie-knife, himself, stood off. Then the way his eyes flashed-why the fire of them would have singed a cat's hair, in fact that bar was in a wrath all over Only one pup came near him, and he was brushed out so totally with the bar's left paw, that he entirely disappeared, and that made the old dogs more cautious still. In the meantime, I came up, and taking deliberate aim as a man should do, at his side, just back of his foreleg, if my gun did not map, call me a coward, and I won't take it personal Yes, stranger, it snapped, and 70 I could not find a cap about my person. While in this predicament, I turned round to my fool friend-says I, 'Bill,' says I, 'you're an ass-you're a fool-you might as well have tried to kill that bar by barking the tree under his belly, as to have done it by hitting him in the head Your shot has made a tiger of him, and blast me, if a dog gets killed or wounded when they come to blows, I will stick my knife into your liver, I will-' my wrath was up I had lost my caps, my gun had snapped, the fellow with me had fired at the bar's head and I ex- 80 pected every moment to see him close in with the dogs, and kill a dozen of them at least. In this thing I was mistaken, for the bar leaped over the ring formed by the dogs, and giving a fierce growl, was off-the pack, of course, in full cry after him. The run this time was short, for coming to the edge of a lake the varmint jumped in, and swam to a little island in the lake, which it reached just a moment before the dogs 'I'll have him now,' said I, for I had found my caps in the lining of my coat-so, rolling a log into the lake, I 90 paddled myself across to the Island, just as the dogs had cornered the bar in a thicket I rushed up and fired-at the same time the critter leaped over the dogs and came within three feet of me, running like mad, he jumped into the lake, and tried to mount the log I had just deserted, but every time he got half his body on it, it would roll over and send him under, the dogs, too, got around him, and pulled him about, and finally Bowie-knife clenched with him, and they sunk into the lake together Stranger, about this time, I was excited, and I stripped off my coat, drew my knife, and intended to have taken a part with Bowie-knife myself, when the bar rose to the surface. But the varmint staid under-Bowie-knife came up alone, more dead than alive, and with the pack came ashore 'Thank God,' said I, 'the old villain has got his deserts at last.' Determined to have the body, I cut a grape-vine for a rope, and dove down where I could see the bar in the water, fastened my queer rope to his leg, and fished him, with great difficulty, ashore Stranger, may I be charved to death by young alligators, if the thing I looked at wasn't a 20 she bar, and not the old critter after all. The way matters got mixed on that island was onaccountably curious, and thinking of it made me more than ever convinced that I was hunting the devil himself. I went home that night and took to my bed-the thing was killing me. The entire team of Arkansaw in bathunting, acknowledged himself used up, and the fact sunk into my feelings like a snagged boat will in the Mississippi. I grew as cross as a bar with two cubs and a sore tail. The thing got out mong my neighbours, and I was asked how come 30 on that individu-al that never lost a bar when once started? and if that same individ-u-al didn't wear telescopes when he turned a she bar, of ordinary size, into an old he one, a little larger than a horse? Perhaps, said I, 'friends'-getting wrathy-'perhaps you want to call somebody a liar' 'Oh, no,' said they, 'we only heard such things as being rather common of late, but we don't believe one word of it, oh, no,'-and then they would ride off and laugh like so many byen is over a dead nigger. It was too much, and I determined to 40 catch that bar, go to Texas, or die,-and I made my preparations accordin'. I had the pack shut up and rested. I took my rifle to pieces and iled it. I put caps in every pocket about my person, for fear of the lining I then told my neighbours, that on Monday morningnaming the day-I would start THAT BAR, and bring him home with me, or they might divide my settlement among them, the owner having disappeared. Well stranger, on the morning previous to the great day of me hunting expedition, I went into the woods near my house taking my gun and Bowie-knife along, just from bubit, and there sitting down also from habit, what should I see, getting over my fence, but the bar' Yes the old varmint was within a hundred yards of me, and the way he walked over that fence-stranger, he loomed up like a black mist, he seemed so large, and he walked right towards me I raised myself, took deliberate aim and fired Instantly the varmint wheeled, gave a yell, and walked through the fence like a falling tree would through a cobweb. I started after, but was tripped up by my inexpressibles, which either from habit, or the excitement of the moment, were about my heels, and before I had really gathered myself up, I heard the old varmint groaning in a thicket near by, like a thousand sinners, and by the time I reached him he was a corpse Stranger, it took five niggers and myself to put that carcase on a mule's back, and old long-ears waddled under the load, as if he was foundered in every leg of his body, and with a common whopper of a bar, he would have trotted off, and enjoyed himself. Twould astonish you to know how big he was. I made hedspread of his skin and the way it used to cover my bar mattress and leave several feet on each side to tuck up, would have delighted you. It was in fact a creation bar, and if it had lived in Samson's time, and had mer him, in a fair fight, it would have licked him in the twinkling of a dice-box. But, strangers, I never like the way I hunted, and missed him. There is something curious about it, I could never understand,-and l never was satisfied at his giving in so easy at 1 % Perhaps, he had heard of my preparations to hunt him the next day, so he jist come in, like Capt Scott's coon to save his wind to grunt with in dying, but that ain t likely. My private opinion is, that that bar was an unhuntable bar, and died when his time come."

When the story was ended, our hero sat some minutes with his auditors in a grave silence, I saw there was mystery to him connected with the bear whose death

⁸¹ Capt Scott's coon Oral lore pictured Captain Scott as such a great hunter that when he appropried a raccoon, the animal shouted down to him. 'Don't shoot! I'm a comin down'. The same tall storwas told about Davy Crockett (see p. 321)

he had just related, that had evidently made a strong impression on his mind. It was also evident that there was some superstitious awe connected with the affair,—a feeling common with all "children of the wood," when they meet with any thing out of their everyday experience. He was the first one, however, to break the silence, and jumping up, he asked all present to

"liquor" before going to bed,—a thing which he did, with a number of companions, evidently to his heart's content.

Long before day, I was put ashore at my place of destination, and I can only follow with the reader, in imagination, our Arkansas friend, in his adventures at the "Forks of Cypress" on the Mississippi

LITERARY COMEDIANS: Browne, Shaw, Clark

Charles Farrar Browne (Artemus Ward)

1834 · 1867

Beginning as a printer's devil, Charles Farrar Browne, like Samuel L Clemens, drifted into humorous writing and lecturing and was, at the end of his life, fabulously well known He was born in Waterford, Maine, in 1834 As a young man, he was apprenticed to a printer in Lancaster, New Hampshire From there he went to other printing shops, first in New England, later in the Middle West In time he moved from his printer's case to the editorial desks of various newspapers

Browne was an editor of the Cleveland, Ohio, Plain Dealer in 1858 when some playful letters he composed stated him on his way to fame. Artemus Ward, the purported author of the letters, introduced himself as the illiterate, humorless owner of an itinerant waxworks and menagerie. From various towns he wrote requests for publicity or accounts of his adventures while traveling. After these pieces had won a large following for him, Browne went to New York to work on the comic magazine Vanity Fair. In 1861 he embarked on a highly remunerative career as a comic lecturer, and during the next several years he attracted large audiences in lecture halls everywhere in this country and, eventually, in Egyptian Hall in London. He died in England in 1867.

Browne, in contrast with such earlier comic authors as Seba Smith and William Tappan Thompson, became a full-time humorist. To keep his readers and his lecture audiences laughing, he perfected all sorts of tricks which amused-bad spellings and queer sentences, phrases, and words. Since the emphasis on laughable diction was so great, Browne tried less and less to depict a clear-cut character, and in time Artemus Ward was hard to distinguish from his creator. They stood for the same things and got laughs by employing the same devices. Browne was typical of a majority of the humorists of his day-professional funnymen, literary comedians who explorted the humor of diction rather than the humor of character. Although these humorists have lost some of their appeal because the taste for poor grammar and distorted spelling in humor has largely abated, their writings are interesting as social documents and as works foreshadowing much of the "free association humor" of such twentieth-century authors as Benchley, Thurber, and Perelman

PS—You scratch my back & lle scratch your back 1858-1862

I hav no politics Nary a one I'm not in the bisiness If I was I spose I should holler versiffrusly in the streets at nite and go home to Betsy Jane smellen of coal ile and gin, in the mornin I should go to the Poles arly I should stay there all day. I should see to it that my nabers was that I should git carriges to take the kripples, the infirm and the indignant thar I should be on guard agin frauds and sich. I should be on the look out for the infamus lise of the enemy, got up jest be4 elecshun for perlitical effeck. When all was over and my candydate was elected, I should move heving & arth-so to speak-until I got orfice, which if I didn't git a orfice I should turn round and abooze the Administration with all my mite and maine. But I'm not in the bisness. I'm in a far more respectful bisniss nor what pollertics is. I wouldn't giv two cents to be a Congresser The wass insult I ever received was when sertin citizens of Baldinsville axed me to run fur the Legislater Sez I, My frends, dostest think I'd stoop to that there?" They turned as white as a sheet. I spoke in my most orfullest tones, & they knowd I wasn't to be trifled with They slunked out of site to onct

There4, havin no politics, I made bold to visit Old Abe at his humstid in Springfield. I found the old feller in his parler, surrounded by a perfeck swarm of orfice seekers. Knowin he had been capting of a flat boat on the roarin Mississippy I thought I'd address him in sailor lingo, so sez I "Old Abe, ohoy! Let out yer mainsuls, reef hum the forecastle & throw yer jib-poop over board! Shiver my timbers, my harty!" [N B This is ginuine mariner langwidge. I know, becawa I've seen sailor plays acted out by them New York theater fellers.] Old Abe lookt up quite cross & sez, "Send in yer petition by & by I can't possibly look at it now. Indeed, I can't. It's onpossible sir."

"Mr Linkin, who do you spect I air?" sed I

"A orfice-seeker, to be sure?" sed he

"Wall, sir," sed I, "yous never more mistaken in your life You hain't gut a orfiss I'd take under no circumstances I'm A Ward Wax figgers is my perfeshin I'm the father of Twins, and they look like me—bath of them. I cum to pay a frendly visit to the President eleck of the United States If so be you wants to see me say so—if not, say so, & I'm orf like a jug handle":

"Mr Ward, sit down I am glad to see you, Sir."

"Repose in Abraham's Buzzum!" sed one of the orfice seekers, his idee bein to git orf a goak at my expense.

"Wall." sez I, "ef all you fellers repose in that there buzzum thare'll be mity poor nussin for sum of you'" whereupon Old Abe buttoned his weskit clear up and bjusht like a maidin of sweet 16 Jest at this pint of the conversation another swarm of the orfice-seekers arrove S cum pilin into the parler Sum wanted post orfices, sum wanted collectorships sum wantid furrin missions, 12 and all wanted sumthin I thought Old Abe would go crazy He hadn't more than had time to shake hands with 'em, before another tremenjis crowd cum porein onto his premises His house and dooryard was now perfeckly overflowed with orfice seekers, all clameruss for a immelit interview with Old Abe One man from Ohio, who had about seven inches of corn whisky into him, mistook me for Old Abe and addrest me as "The Prahavrie Flower of the West!" Thinks I you want a offiss putty bad Another man with a gold heded cane and a : red nose told Old Abe he was "a seckind Washington & the Pride of the Boundliss West"

Sez I, "Square, you wouldn't take a small postoffis if you could git it, would you?"

Sez he. A patrit is abuy them things, sir!"

"There's a putty big crop of patrits this season, ain't there Squire?" sez I when another crowd of offiss seekers pored in The house, door-yard, barn & woodshed was now all full, and when another crowd cum I told 'em not to go away for wan't of room as the hog-pen was still empty. One patrit from a small town in Michygan went up on top the house, got into the chimney and slid down into the parler where Old Abe was endeverin to keep the hungry pack of orfice-seekers from chawin him up alive without benefit of clergy. The minit he reached the fire-place he jumpt up, brusht the soot out of his eyes, and yelled "Don't make eny pintment at the Spunkville postoffiss till you've read my papers. All the respectful men in our town is signers to that there dockyment!"

"Good God!" cride Old Abe, "they cum upon me from the skize—down the chimneys, and from the bowels of the yearth!" He hadn't more'n got them words out of his delikit mouth before two fat offiss-seekers from Wisconsin, in endeverin to crawl atween his legs for the purpuss of applyin for the toll-gate-ship at Milwawky, upsot the President eleck & he would hev gone sprawlin into the fire-place if I hadn't caught him in these arms. But I hadn't more'n stood him up strate before another man cum crashin down the chimney, his head strikin me vilently agin the inards and prostratin my voluptoous form onto the floor. 50 "Mr Linkin," shoutid the infatooated being, "my papers is signed by every clergyman in our town, and likewise the skoolmaster!"

Artemus Ward interviews President Lincoln.

Sez I, "you egrejis ass," gittin up & brushin the dust from my eyes, "I'll sign your papers with this bunch of bones, if you don't be a little more keerful how you make my bread basket a depot in the futer. How do you like that air perfumery?" sez I, shuving my fist under his nose. "Them's the kind of papers I'll giv you! Them's the paper's you want!"

"But I workt hard for the ticket, I toiled night and day! The patrit should be rewarded!"

"Virtoo," sed I, holdin' the infatooated man by the coat-collar, "Virtoo, sir, is its own reward. Look at me!" He did look at me, and qualed be4 my gase "The fact is," I continued, lookin' round on the hungry crowd, "there is scacely a offiss for every ile lamp carrid round durin' this campane. I wish thare was I wish thare was furrin missions to be filled on varis lonely Islands where eppydemics rage incessantly, and if I was in Old Abe's place I'd send every mother's son of you to them What air you here for?" I continnered, warmin up considerable, "can't you giv Abe a minit's peace? Don't you see he's worrid most to death! Go home, you miserable men, go home & till the sile! If in five minits from this time," sez I pullin' out my new sixteen dollar 20 huntin cased watch, and brandishin' it before their eyes, "Ef in five minits from this time a single sole of you remains on these here premises, I'll go out to my cage near by, and let my Boy Constructor loose! & ef he gits amung you, you'll think old Solferino has cum again and no mistake!" You ought to hev seen them scamper, Mr Fair They run orf as tho Satun his self was arter them with a red hot ten pronged pitchfork. In five minits the premises was clear

"How kin I ever repay you, Mr Ward, for your kındness?" sed Old Abe, advancın and shakın me warmly by the hand "How kın I ever repay you, sır?"

"By givin the whole country a good, sound administration By poerin' ile upon the troubled waturs. North and South By pursooin' a patriotic, firm, and just course, and then if any State wants to secede, let 'em Sesesh'"

How 'bout my Cabinit, Mister Ward'" sed Abe

"Fill it up with Showmen sir! Showmen is devoid of politics. They hain't got any principles! They know how to cater for the public. They know what the public wants, North & South Showmen, sir, is honest men. Ef you doubt their literary ability, look at their posters, and see small bills! Ef you want a Cabinit as is a Cabinit fill it up with showmen but don't call on me. The moral wax figger perfeshun musn't be permitted to go down while there's a drop of blood in these vains! A Linkin, I wish you well! Ef Powers or Walcutt wus to pick out a model for a beautiful man, I scarcely think they'd sculp you, but ef you do the fair thing by your country you'll make as putty a angel as any of us! A Linkin, use the talents which Nature has put into you judishusly and firmly, and all will be well. A Linkin, adoo!"

He shook me cordyully by the hand—we exchanged picters, so we could gaze upon each others' liniments when far away from one another—he at the hellum of the ship of State, and I at the hellum of the show bizniss—admittance only 15 cents

Henry Wheeler Shaw (Josh Billings)

1818 · 1885

"He was Aesop and Ben Franklin, condensed and abridged So Bill Arp, a contemporary of Henry Wheeler Shaw, described Shaw's creation, Josh Billings Believing that "you have got to be wise before you can be witty, Shaw adapted to the days of the literary comedian the materials and techniques of earlier aphorists and moralizers. Americans, long fond of horse sense spiced with humor, naturally found such a writer most appealing Shaw was born in Lanesboro, Massachusetts, April 21, 1818 He prepared for college at Lenox Academy, and then attended Hamilton College for about two years before he was expelled for a prank. At seventeen he migrated to the West, where he traveled widely, stopping, i now and then to do odd jobs. He was, at various times, a farmer, a coal operator, and a proprietor of an Ohio River steamboat before he returned to the East and settled down to be a real estate operator and an auctioneer in Poughkeepsie, New York. In the late 1850's, hen some of his comic writings for newspapers were idely reprinted, he got off to a start as a successful unnyman. He moved to New York City and remained here the rest of his life.

Lectures and the publication of his work in newspapers, magazines, and books—Josh Billings, His Sayings (1865), Josh Billings on Ice and Other Things (1868)—added to his fame Beginning in 1869, he published a innual series titled Josh Billings' Farmer's Allminist.

which sold more than a hundred thousand copies almost every year for a decade.

Billings was famous not for stories but for essays or single sentences packed with amusingly phrased common sense. His kinship with Poor Richard was obvious, but his cacography showed that his writing was also related to that of such a contemporary as Artemus Ward. In his hayfield cogitations on beasts and men, in addition to a flair for comic and well-ordered sentences, he had, as Max Eastman has observed, a gift for setting down "a series of verbal pictures" expressing his ideas. This talent for concreteness is evident in such a sentence as "Pride lives on itself, it is like a raccoon in the winter, kept fat by sucking its claws." It is also evident in the selections which follow

Essa on the Muel

The muel 12 haf hoss and haf Jackass, and then kums tu a full stop, natur diskovering her mistake

Tha weigh more, akordin tu their heft, than enny other kreetur, except a crowbar

Tha kant hear enny quicker, nor further than the hoss, yet their ears are big enuff for snow shoes

You kan trust them with enny one whose life aint worth enny more than the muels. The only wastu keep them in a paster, is tu turn them into a medder to uneing, and let them jump out.

Tha are reddy for use, just as soon as they will du tu

The haint got enny friends, and will live on huckle berry brush, with an ockasional chanse at Kanada thistels.

Tha are a modern invenshun, i don't think the Bible deludes tu them at tall

Tha sel for more money than carry other domestik animile. Yu kant tell their age by looking into their mouth, carry more than you kould a Mexican kannons. The never hav no dissease that a good club wont heal

If the ever die the must kum rite tu life agin, for inever herd noboddy see 'ded muel'

Tha are like sum men, verry korrupt at harte, ive to known them to be good muels for 6 months, just to git a good chanse to kick sumbody

I never owned one, nor never mean to, unless thate is a United Statts law passed, requiring it

The only reason why the are pashunt is behause that are ashamed by themselfs

I have seen eddikated muels in a sirkus

Tha kould kick, and bite, tremenjis I would not sa what I am forced tu sa again the muel, if his birth want an outrage, and man want tu blame for it

Enny man who is willing tu drive a muel, ought to be exempt by law from running for the legislatur

Tha are the strongest creeturs on earth, and heaviest ackording to their sise, I herd tell ov one who fell oph from the tow path, on the Eri kanawl, and sunk as soon as he touched bottom, but he kept rite on towing the boat to the nex stashun, breathing thru his ears, which stuck out ov the water about 2 feet 6 inches, i didn't see this did, but an auctioneer told me ov it, and i never knew an auctioneer to lie unless it was absolutely convenient

Hoss Sense

There is nothing that has bin diskovered yet, that iz as skarse as good Hoss sense, about 28 hoss power

I don't mean race hoss, nor trotting hoss sense, that kan run a mile in 1.28 and then brake down, nor trot in 2.13, and good for nothing afterwirds, only to brag on, but I mean the all-day hoss sense, that iz good for 8 miles an hour, from rooster crowing in the morning, until the cows cum home at night, klean tew the end oy the road

I hav seen fast sense, that was like sum hosses, who to could git so far in one day that it would take them two days tew git back, on a litter I don't mean this kind nuther.

Good hard-pan sense iz the thing that will wash well, wear well, iton out without wrinkling, and take starch without kracking

Menny people are hunting after uncommon sense, but they never find it a good deal, uncommon sense iz or the nature of genius, and all genius iz the gift of God, and kant be had like hens eggs, for the hunting

Good, old-fashioned common sense 12 one ov the hardest things in the world to out-wit, out-argy, or beat in enay way, it 12 az honest az a loaf ov good domestik bread, alwais in tune gither hot from the oven or 8 days old

Common sense kan be improved upon by edukashun —genius kan be too, sum, but not much

Edukashun gauls genius like a bad setting harness Common sense 12 like biled vittles, it is good r.ght from the pot, and it is good nex day warmed up

If every man waz a genius, mankind would be az bad oph az the heavens would be, with every star a comet, things would git hurt badly, and noboddy tew blame

Common sense iz instinkt, and instinkt don't make enny blunders mutch, no more than a rat duz, in coming out, or going intew a hole, he hits the hole the fust time and just fills it

Genius iz always in advance ov the times, and makes sum magnificent hits, but the world owes most ov ittributes to good hoss sense

Charles Heber Clark (Max Adeler)

1847 · 1915

William H Clark was an Episcopalian clergyman in Maryland when in 1847, his son Charles Heber Clark was born During the author's youth, the family did not prosper, because the father was an abolitionist and a Northern sympathizer preaching in the South Schooled at Georgetown, Washington, D C, at fifteen Charles became an office boy in a Philadelphia commission house in 1863, at eighteen, he joined the Union army to serve during the final two years of the Civil War After the war, Clark returned to Philadelphia and became a reporter on the Philadelphia Inquirer. He did well as a journalist, and spent the rest of his life working for various Philadelphia newspapers and magazines

His literary fame was chiefly as a humorist—the portrayer of life in the suburbs. Under the pen name Max Adeler, he wrote Out of the Hurly-Burly (1874), 13 hou Room (1876), Random Shots (1879), and several rather negligible works of serious fiction. In his final years having turned to what he considered higher pursuits, he did what he could to live down his reputation as a comic writer.

Like others of his period, Clark was a transitional figure between the old humor and the humor of today. His pictures of home life in some ways forecast. Clarence Day's Life with Father, and on occasion in his associative, self-deprecatory humor he foreshadowed such modern humorists as Robert Benchley and James. Thurber Yet in his writing, there are touches of narrative, bits of diction, methods of getting laughs, which show his relationship to the earlier humorists.

TROUBLE WITH COOLEY

I hardly think I shall get along so well with my neighbor on the other side, Cooley, is I do with Pitman

He is not only exceedingly ill-natured, but he inclines to be impertinent Several times he has volunteered advice respecting the management of my garden and grounds, and has displayed a disposition to be somewhat sarcastic when his plans did not meet with my approval I contrived, however, to avoid a breach of our amicable relations until the other day, when his conduct became absolutely unendurable

I observed in the last number of Ball's Journal of 19 Health some suggestions concerning a good method of exercising the lungs and expanding the cliest. They were to this effect.

"Training for a prize-fight, Adeler?"

"Step out into the purest air you can find; stand perfectly erect with the head up and the shoulders back, and then, fixing the lips as though you were going to whistle, draw the air, not through the nostrils, but through the lips, into the lungs When the chest is about half full, gradually raise the arms, keeping them extended with the palms of the hands down, as you suck in the air, so as to bring them over the head just as the lungs are quite full. Then drop the thumbs inward, and after gently forcing the arms backward and the chest open, reverse the process by which you draw your breath till the lungs are empty This process should be repeated three or four times immediately after bathing, and also several times through the day"

This seemed reasonable, and I determined to give it a trial. For that purpose I went out into the yard, and pinning the directions to a tree, I stood in front of them where I could see them. Just as I began, Cooley came out, and perceiving me, he placed his elbows upon the fence, rested his chin upon his arms and watched me with a very peculiar smile upon his face. I was exceedingly annoyed and somewhat embarrassed, but I was determined that he should not have the gratification of driving me away from my own ground. I made up my mind that I would continue the exercise without appearing to notice him. In a few moments, however he remarked

"Training for a prize-fight, Adeler?"

I made no reply, but continued the exercise When I had gone through the programme once, I began again As I arrived at that portion of it where the instructions direct the arrangement of the lips, Mr Cooley, by this time somewhat incensed at my silence, observed,

"Whistle us a tune, Adeler Give us something lively!"

As I paid no attention to this invitation, Cooley embraced the opportunity afforded by the upward motion of my arms, in accordance with the directions, to ask me if I was going to dive, and to offer to bring me out a tub in case I cherished such a design

Then I completed the exercise and went into the house without giving Cooley any reason to suppose that I was aware of his presence. The next day I performed the ceremony at the same place, at the same hour. On the third day Cooley evidently expected me, for as soon as I appeared he came up to the fence and assumed his old position. He had with him a couple of friends, whom he must have summoned for the express purpose of tormenting me. When I had gone through the movements once, Cooley said.

"See here, Adeler, I don't want to do you any harm but let me advise you as a friend to go to an asylum I have known much worse cases than yours to be cured It isn't kind to your family for you to remain at large You're afflicted with only a mild form now, but if you don't do something. You'll have a violent paroxism some day, and smash things. Now, take my advice, and put yourself under treatment."

Silence upon my part

"How would you take it now," inquired Cooley, in a tone indicative of yearning tenderness, "if I should get over the fence and chain you to the pump while I go for the doctor? I really think you are getting dangerous."

Mr Cooley," I said, "I wish you would attend to your own business I do not wish to quarrel with you, sir, but I will not have any interference on your part with my affairs. If it will make you any happier to learn what I am doing, I will tell you, seeing that you are so much interested in the matter, that I am exercising, under medical direction, for the benefit of my lungs

"Exercising for the benefit of his lungs!" moaned Cooley "His mind is entirely gone"

'Yes, sir,' I said, angrily, "I am exercising for the benefit of my lungs, according to the directions of Dr Ball, and I will thank you to keep your tongue quiet about it"

"He has them awfully bad," exclaimed Cooley, with a pathetic look. "There is no such man as Dr Ball, you know," he remarked, in a confidential tone, to one of his companions

"I wish you distinctly to understand that I will not olerate this impertinence much longer, sir," I exclaimed, indignantly "What right have you to interfere with me upon my own ground, you ruffian?"

"His intellect's completely shattered," said Cooley, with a mournful shake of his head, to his companions Poor Mrs Adeler! It will be a terrible blow for her and for the children My heart bleeds for them"

'Mr Cooley," I said, "I want no more of this I shall discontinue Dr Ball's exercise at this place for the present, but I will tell you before I go that I consider you an insolent, unendurable idiot, and I will repay you some day or other for your outrageous behavior to me"

"Sad, sad, indeed!" said Cooley to his friends "Strange how he clings to that fancy about a man named Ball, isn't it?"

One of Cooley's companions observed that the deranged were apt to get such notions in their heads, and he supplemented this statement with the remark, "This is a very interesting case—very

Then I went into the house, and from the window saw Cooley and his companions walk away laughing Not even the unpardonable insolence of Cooley can disguise the fact that the affair has a certain comic aspect, and when I became calmer, I confess that I appreciated this phase of the occurrence with some keenness, even though I happened to occupy an exceedingly unpleasant position as the victim of the joke But I shall be even with Cooley for this 1 will devise a scheme for tormenting him which will cause him to rue the day that he interfered with my pulmonary gymnastics Dr Ball's recipe, however, I think I will toss into the fire I will so expand my lungs by learning to sing or to play upon the flute. My family can then participate in my enjoyment A married man has no right to be selfish in his pleasures

PITMAN AS A POLITICIAN

Some of the friends of Judge Pitman induced him, just before the last election, to permit himself to be nominated for the State Legislature, and accordingly he was presented to the people of this community as a candidate Of course he was not selected because of his fitness for the position The party managers knew him to 60 be a very popular man, and as the success of the party is the only thing they care for, they chose Pitman as the person most likely to secure that result I cannot say that I disapproved of the selection For some reason, it appears to be entirely impossible for American citizens who live in any of the Middle States to find educated and intelligent men who are willing to represent them in the Legislatures Those bodies are composed for the most part of men whose solitary purpose is plunder They are legislators simply because it pays better to 70 blackmail railroad companies and to accept bribes from people who want votes for rascally measures than it does to pick pockets. They have the instincts and the principles of a pickpocket, but their ambition is greater They do not steal handkerchicfs and watches, because they can filch fabulous sums of money from the public treasury and from villains who want to do dirty work under the color of the law They know enough to enable them, with the assistance of party rings, to have themselves counted in at election-time, and to devise 80 new and dexterous schemes of dishonesty, but in other and rather more desirable of the qualifications of lawmakers they are deficient. They occupy the most important place in republican governments without knowing what republicanism means, and they create laws for the communities without having any knowledge of the science of law or the slightest acquaintance with the needs and requirements of the people for whom they act. The average American legislator is both ignorant and dishonest. Judge Pitman is ignorant, but he is honest, and as his election would secure at least a very important half of a fitting legislator, I supported him

My other neighbor, Cooley, was the chairman of the committee to whose care was consigned the management of the campaign in which Judge Pitman played so prominent a part, and Cooley conducted the business 10 with even an excess of enthusiasm. Just after the nomination of Pitman, Cooley called on him to say that a number of his friends had declared their intention to offer him a screnade. Cooley informed the judge that some refreshment must be given to the serenaders, but he, as the chairman of the committee, would attend to that, the judge need not make preparations of any kind Accordingly, on the following evening a brass band accompanied by a score or two politicians, entered Pitman's front yard, and for half in hour there was some 20 very good music. Then the judge came out upon the porch and made a better speech than I had expected to hear from him. He concluded by asking the company to enter his house. Cooley was there with a wagon-load of meat and drink, including, of course, a large quantity of rum of the most impressive kinds. The judge with the fear of the temperance society present in his mind, protested against the liquor, but Cooley demonstrated to him that he would be defeated and the party ruined it it was excluded, and so Pitman reluctantly permitted it 30 to be placed upon his table. Besides, as Cooley had been so very liberal in undertiking to make this provision at his own cost, the judge disliked to hutt his feelings by refusing to permit the use of that which Cooley evidently considered the most important portion of it

The guests remained at the banquet until four o'clock the next morning the politicians meanwhile making speeches and the band playing occasionally in the diningroom in a most uproarious manner. We could hear the noise at my house during the night, and sleep was possible only with the windows closed.

At four o'clock my door-bell rang violently, and upon descending to ascertain the cause of a visit at such an unseemly hour, I encountered Judge Pitman. He was nearly frantic with indignation.

"Adeler," he said, "them fellers is a-carryin' on scand'lous over yer at my house. They're all drunk as owls an' when I want 'em to go home, they laugh an' swear an' cheer an' smash the furniture an' bu'st things generally. Mrs. Pitman's 'bout skeered to death. Can't you come over an' help me clear them out?"

"Why don't you call a couple of policemen? You hunt up two or three officers while I dress myself, and we will see if we can't adjourn the meeting"

By the time I was ready Pitman arrived with one policeman, and we proceeded to his house As we entered the leader of the band was sitting upon the stairs, infamously drunk, with the handle of his umbrella in his mouth, vainly endeavoring to play a tune by fumbling his fingers among the ribs Mr Cooley was in a corner of the parlor supporting himself by the wall while he endeavored to discuss the question of the tariff with Pit man's plaster bust of Daniel Webster, and to correct Daniel's view of the local option law. Another politician was sitting upon the carpet crying because, so he informed us, his wife's maiden name was McCarthy, and just as the policeman was removing him a combat occurred between the bass drummer and a man from Wilmington, during which the drummer was hurled against the pier glass and then dragged out to bleed upon the rug. The house was finally cleared of the company just as the church clock struck six, and then Pitman went to bed with sentiments of complete disgust for politics and politicians

But he remained a candidate of the party. He had promised to run, and he determined to go through with the business.

"That serchade was rough enough without anythin wass said the judge to me a day or two afterward, but I did think Cooley was a-rubbin it in most too hard when he come over yesterday with a bill for the refreshments which he wanted me to pay

"Why I thought he agreed to supply the supper?

"So he did But now he says that of course he was only actin for me." The candidate he says, 'always foors all the balls." I'll foot this one, an then I'll foot Cooler if he ever brings them rufitans to my house again. I expect nothin else but the temperance society will shut down on me for that riot we had t'other night."

"I hope not, but I should think that affair would have made you sorry that you ever undertook this business No it does," replied the judge, "but I never back down when I go into a thing. I'm goin' to run for the Legislatur, and if I'm elected, I'm goin' to serve my country honestly until my time's up. Then I'm comin' home, an' goin' to stay home. And what's more, I'll stir up that Legislatur' while I'm in it. You mind me!"

The result of the contest was that the judge was elected by a large majority, and he will sit in the next Assembly. 1874

John Greenleaf Whittier

1807 · 1892

Even during the years when he had been active as an abolitionist (see pp 69-76). Whittier had written a good deal of verse and prose portraying the life and lore of his native district, Essex County in Massachusetts. His mind as Van Wyck Brooks has said, "was steeped in local associations, tales of witches, tales of the Indian wars, the gossip of wandering farm hands and gypsies. He had used such materials in Legendic of New England (1831), Mogg Megone (1836), Lays of My Home and Other Poems (1843), Margaret Smith's

Journals (1849), and Home Ballads. Poems and Lyrics (1860)

After the end of the Civil War, Whittier devoted more of his energies to writing regional poetry, publishing his most admired poem, Snow-Bound (1866) as well as The Tent of the Beach and Other Poems

Panel (I to r.) William Sydney Porter • Harriel Beccher Stowe, from an early daguerreotype • Francis Bret Harte

(1867), Among the Hills and Other Poems (1869), Ballads of New England (1870), and other less notable volumes. The extraordinary success of Snow-Bound both puzzled and delighted its author

In his poetic local color writing, Whittier belonged to the tradition represented before his birth by the poet of Scottish rural life, Robert Burns, and carried on today by Robert Frost His achievement was to record in simple verse the sort of life lived in New England before his day and during his lifetime. At times—particularly in his idyllic reminiscence, "The Barefoot Boy"—he was sentimental, but on many occasions he created authentic and detailed, though relatively uncomplicated, depictions of Yankee life which were and still are greatly enjoyed by many readers. The Prelude to "Among the Hills" and Snow-Bound, each with its own particular emphasis, complement one another to present an admirably rounded picture. Seemingly, these are artless creations, yet the selection and ordering of details as well as the simple phrasings are more artful than they may at first appear to be (For bibliographical note, see p. 70.)

Blessings on thec, little man, Barefoot boy, with cheek of tan! With thy turned-up pantaloons, And thy merry whistled tunes, With thy red lip, redder still Kissed by strawberries on the hill, With the sunshine on thy face, Through thy torn brim's jaunty grace, From my heart I give thee joy,-I was once a barefoot boy! Prince thou art,-the grown-up man Only is republican Let the million-dollated ride! Barefoot, trudging at his side, Thou hast more than he can buy In the reach of ear and eye,-Outward sunshine, inward joy Blessings on thee, barefoot boy!

O for boyhood's painless play, Sleep that wakes in laughing day. Health that mocks the doctor's rules, Knowledge never learned of schools, Of the wild bee's morning chase, Of the wild-flower's time and place, Flight of fowl and habitude Of the tenants of the wood, How the tortoise bears his shell, How the woodchuck digs his cell, And the ground-mole sinks his well, How the robin feeds her young, How the oriole's nest is hung. Where the whitest lilies blow. Where the freshest berries grow, Where the groundnut trails its vine, Where the wood-grape's clusters shine, Of the black wasp's cunning way, Mason of his walls of clay. And the architectural plans Of gray hornet artisans!-For, eschewing books and tasks, Nature answers all he asks, Hand in hand with her he walks. Face to face with her he talks, Part and parcel of her joy,-Blessings on the barefoot boy!

O for boyhood's time of June,
Crowding years in one brief moon,
When all things I heard or saw,
Me, their master, waited for
I was rich in flowers and trees,
Humming-birds and honey-bees,
For my sport the squirrel played,
Plied the snouted mole his spade,
For my taste the blackberry cone
Purpled over hedge and stone,
Laughed the brook for my delight
Through the day and through the night,
Whispering at the garden wall,

356 Whitter

Talked with me from fall to fall;
Mine the sand-rimmed pickerel pond,
Mine the walnut slopes beyond,
Mine. on bending orchard trees,
Apples of Hesperides'
Still as my horizon grew,
Larger grew my riches too,
All the world 1 saw or knew
Seemed a complex Chinese toy,
Fashioned for a barefoot boy'

O for festal dainties spread,
I ike my bowl of milk and bread,—
Pewter spoon and bowl of wood,
On the door-stone, gray and iude!
Oer me, like a regal tent,
Cloudy-ribbed, the sunset bent,
Purple-curtained, fringed with gold,
Looped in many a wind-swung fold,
While for music came the play
Of the pied frog's orchestra;
And, to light the noisy choir,
Lit the fly his lamp of fire
I was monarch pomp and joy
Waited on the barefoot boy!

Cheerily, then, my little man, Live and laugh, as boyhood can' Though the flinty slopes be hard, Stubble-speared the new-mown sward, Every morn shall lead thee through Fresh baptisms of the dew, Every evening from thy feet Shall the cool wind kiss the heat All too soon these feet must hide In the prison cells of pride, Lose the freedom of the sod. Like a colt's for work be shod, Made to tread the mills of toil, Up and down in ceaseless moil Happy if their track be found Never on forbidden ground, Happy if they sink not in Quick and treacherous sands of sin Ah! that thou couldst know thy joy, Ere it passes, barefoot boy!

Skipper Ireson's Ride

This poem, Whittier said in a letter of 1880, twenty-three years after its publication, "was founded solely on a fragment of rhyme which I heard from one of my early schoolmasters, a native of Marblehead. I supposed the story to which it referred dated back at least a century. I knew nothing of the participators, and the narrative of the ballad was pure fancy." The letter was addressed to Samuel Roads, Jr., who, in his History of Marblehead, had stated that Ireson's crew, rather than the Captain, actually had been responsible for the abandonment of the vessel. Whittier was indebted to James Russell Lowell, then editor of the Atlantic, for the suggestion that the quoted refrain be phrased in Cape Ann dialect.

Of all the rides since the birth of time,
Told in story or sung in rhyme,—
On Apuleius's Golden Ass,
Or one-eyed Calendar's horse of brass,
Witch astride of a human back,
Islam's prophet on Al-Borák,—
The strangest ride that ever was sped
Was Ireson's, out from Marblehead!
Old Floyd Ireson, for his hard heart,
Tarred and feathered and carried in a cart
By the women of Marblehead!

Body of turkey, head of owl,
Wings a-droop like a rained-on fowl,
Feathered and ruffled in every part,
Skipper Ireson stood in the cart
Scores of women, old and young,
Strong of muscle, and glib of tongue,
Pushed and pulled up the rocky lane,
Shouting and singing the shrill refrain

Wild-eyed, free-limbed, such as chase

Brief of skirt, with ankles bare.
Loose of kerchief and loose of hair,
With conch-shells blowing and fish-horns' twang,
Over and over the Maenads sang

Small pity for him'—He sailed away
From a leaking ship, in Chaleur Bay,—
Sailed away from a sinking wreck,
With his own town's-people on her deck!
"Lay by! lay by!" they called to him Back he answered, "Sink or swim!
Brag of your catch of fish again!"
And off he sailed through the fog and rain!

Through the street, on either side, Up flew windows, doors swung wide, Sharp-tongued spinsters, old wives gray, Treble lent the fish-horn's bray Sea-worn grandsires, cripple-bound, Hulks of old sailors run aground, Shook head, and fist, and hat, and cane,
And cracked with curses the hoarse refrain.

Sweetly along the Salem road
Bloom of orchard and lilac showed Little the wicked skipper knew
Of the fields so green and the sky so blue
Riding there in his sorry trim,
Like an Indian idol glum and grim,
Scarcely he seemed the sound to hear
Of voices shouting, far and near
"Here's Flud Oirson, fur his horrd horrt,

"Hear me, neighbors!" at last he cried,—
"What to me is this noisy ride?
What is the shame that clothes the skin
To the nameless horror that lives within?
Waking or sleeping, I see a wreck,
And hear a cry from a reeling deck!
Hate me and curse me,—I only dread
The hand of God and the face of the dead!"
Said old Floyd Ireson, for his hard heart,

Then the wife of the skipper lost at sea
Said, "God has touched him!—why should we?"
Said an old wife mourning her only son,
'Cut the rogue's tether and let him run'
So with soft relentings and rude excuse
Half scorn, half pity, they cut him loose,
And gave him a cloak to hide him in.
And left him alone with his shame and sin
Poor Floyd Ireson, for his hard heart,
Tarred and feathered and carried in a cart
By the women of Marblehead!

Telling the Bees

Samuel T Pickard, Whittier's biographer, notes that the description at the beginning of this poem contains many Jetails concerning the poet's own birthplace The approach, the 'gap in the old wall," "the stepping-stones," the garden and its daffodils, the red-barred gate, the poplars, the cattle-yard were all parts of the scene But the story is wholly imaginative Whittier's sister Mary was still living when the poem was written. The tale unfolded is of the returning lover who hears the chore-girl performing the Yankee ceremony of chanting to the bees the news of a death in the house. Only in the final lines does the lover discover that the one who has died is his heloved

Here is the place, right over the hill Runs the path I took You can see the gap in the old wall still, And the stepping-stones in the shallow brook.

There is the house, with the gate red-barred, And the poplars tall,

And the barn's brown length, and the cattle-yard, And the white horns tossing above the wall

There are the beehives ranged in the sun, And down by the brink

Of the brook are her poor flowers, weed o'errun, Pansy and daffodil, rose and pink

A year has gone, as the tortoise goes Heavy and slow,

And the same rose blows, and the same sun glows, And the same brook sings of a year ago

There's the same sweet clover-smell in the breeze, And the June sun warm Tangles his wings of fire in the trees, Setting, as then, over Fernside farm.

I mind me how with a lover's care From my Sunday coat I brushed off the burrs, and smoothed my hair, And cooled at the brookside my brow and throat.

Since we parted, a month had passed,-To love, a year,

Down through the beeches I looked at last On the little red gate and the well-sweep near.

I can see it all now,—the slantwise rain Of light through the leaves, The sundown's blaze on her window-pane, The bloom of her roses under the eaves

Just the same as a month before,-The house and the trees The barn's brown gable, the vine by the door,-Nothing changed but the hives of bees

Before them, under the garden wall, Forward and back,

Went drearily singing the chore-girl small, Draping each hive with a shred of black

Trembling I listened the summer sun Had the chill of snow,

For I knew she was telling the bees of one Gone on the journey we all must go!

Then I said to myself, "My Mary weeps For the dead to-day Haply her blind old grandsite sleeps The fret and the pain of his age away"

But her dog whined low, on the doorway sill, With his cane to his chin,

The old man sat, and the chore-girl still Sung to the bees stealing out and in

And the song she was singing ever since In my ear sounds on -"Stay at home, pretty bees, fly not hence"

Mistress Mary is dead and gone!"

A Winter Idyl

Of this poem, Whittier wrote a friend, "It is a winter idyl —a picture of an old-fashioned farmer's fireside in winter and if it were not mine I should call it pretty good." This memorial poem, written shortly after the death of two persons—his sister and his mother—whom the poet had loved very much, was a loving re-creation of the scenes and personalities of the poet's boyhood

The manuscript was completed and sent to the publisher October 3, 1865, but before it reached print in 1866, the poet had made a number of careful revisions Despite this care and his faith in the excellence of the poem, Whittier was astonished at the public reception Because it was a poem which all could understand and because it expressed sentiments shared by many Americans, it sold widely Whittier's first royalty check was for $10,000, and the poem continued to be popular for a number of years It is still generally considered the best poem of its kind ever written in America

Whittier wrote this note on the poem "The inmates of the family at the Whittier homestead who are referred were my father, mother, my brother and two sisters, and my uncle and aunt, both unmarried In addition, there was the district school-master, who boarded with us. The 'not unfeared, half-welcome guest' was Harriet Livermore ... a young woman of fine natural ability, enthusiastic, eccentric, with slight control over her violent temper. which sometimes made her religious profession doubtful .. She early embraced the doctrine of the Second Advent. and felt it her duty to proclaim the Loid's speedy coming

To the Memory of the Household It Describes. This Poem Is Dedicated by the Author

the Celestial Fire drives away dark spirits, so also this our Fire of VV ood doth the same."-

"Announced by all the trumpets of the sky, Arrives the snow; and, driving o'er the fields. Seems nowhere to alight; the whited air Hides hills and woods, the river and the heaven, And veils the farm-house at the guiden's end The sled and traveller stopped, the courier's feet Delayed, all friends shut out, the housemates sit Around the radiant fireplace, enclosed In a tumultuous privacy of storm "-

The sun that brief December day Rose cheerless over hills of gray, And, darkly circled, gave at noon A sadder light than waning moon Slow tracing down the thickening sky Its mute and ominous prophecy, A portent seeming less than threat, It sank from sight before it set A chill no coat, however stout, Of homespun stuff could quite shut out, A hard, dull bitterness of cold, That checked, mid-vein, the circling race Of life-blood in the sharpened face, The coming of the snow-storm told The wind blew east, we heard the roar Of Ocean on his wintry shore, And felt the strong pulse throbbing there Beat with low rhythm our inland au

Meanwhile we did our nightly chores,-Brought in the wood from out of doors, Littered the stalls, and from the mows Raked down the herd's-grass for the cows Heard the horse whinnying for his corn, And, sharply clashing horn on horn, Impatient down the stanchion rows The cattle shake their walnut bows.

15 wind blew east, from the east. The home was about fifteen miles west of the ocean • 22 herd's-grass, timothy • 26 walnut bows were fastened around the necks of the cows and affixed to the stanchions While, peering from his early perch Upon the scaffold's pole of birch, The cock his crested helmet bent And down his querulous challenge sent

Unwarmed by any sunset light The gray day darkened into night. A night made hoary with the swarm And whirl-dance of the blinding storm, As zigzag wavering to and fro Crossed and recrossed the wingéd snow And ere the early bedtime came The white drift piled the window-frame, And through the glass the clothes-line posts Looked in like tall and sheeted ghosts

So all night long the storm roared on The morning broke without a sun, In tiny spherule traced with lines Of Nature's geometric signs, In starry flake, and pellicle, All day the hoary meteor fell, And, when the second morning shone. We looked upon a world unknown, On nothing we could call our own Around the glistening wonder bent The blue walls of the firmament, No cloud above, no earth below,-A universe of sky and snow! The old familiar sights of ours Took marvellous shapes, strange domes and towers Rose up where sty or corn-crib stood, Or garden-wall, or belt of wood, A smooth white mound the brush-pile showed, A fenceless drift what once was road, The bridle-post an old man sat With loose-flung coat and high cocked hat, The well-curb had a Chinese roof; And even the long sweep, high aloof, In its slant splendor, seemed to tell Of Pisa's leaning miracle

A prompt, decisive man, no breath Our father wasted "Boys, a path!" Well pleased, (for when did farmer boy Count such a summons less than 10y?)

Our buskins on our feet we drew, With mittened hands, and caps drawn low, To guard our necks and ears from snow, We cut the solid whiteness through And, where the drift was deepest, made A tunnel walled and overlaid With dazzling crystal we had read Of rare Aladdin's wondrous cave, And to our own his name we gave, With many a wish the luck were ours To test his lamp's supernal powers We reached the barn with meiry din, And roused the prisoned brutes within The old horse thrust his long head out, And grave with wonder gazed about, The cock his lusty greeting said, And forth his speckled harem led, The oxen lashed their tails, and hooked, And mild reproach of hunger looked, The hornéd patriarch of the sheep, Like Egypt's Amun roused from sleep, Shook his sage head with gesture mute, And emphasized with stamp of foot

All day the gusty north-wind bore The loosening drift its breath before, Low circling round its southern zone, The sun through dazzling snow-mist shone No church-bell lent its Christian tone To the savage air, no social smoke Curled over woods of snow-hung oak 100 A solitude made more intense By dreary-voicéd elements, The shricking of the mindless wind, The moaning tree-boughs swaying blind, And on the glass the unmeaning beat Of ghostly finger-tips of sleet. Beyond the circle of our hearth No welcome sound of toil or mirth Unbound the spell, and testified Of human life and thought outside We minded that the sharpest ear

The buried brooklet could not hear, The music of whose liquid lip Had been to us companionship, And, in our lonely life, had grown To have an almost human tone

As night drew on, and, from the crest Of wooded knolls that ridged the west, The sun, a snow-blown traveller, sank From sight beneath the smothering bank We piled, with care, our nightly stack Of wood against the chimney-back,-The oaken log, green, huge, and thick, And on its top the stout back-stick, The knotty forestick laid apart, And filled between with curious art The tagged brush, then, hovering near We watched the first red blaze appear, Heard the sharp crackle caught the gleam On whitewashed wall and sagging beam Until the old, rude-furnished room Burst, flower-like, into rosy bloom While radiant with a mimic flame Ourside the sparkling drift became, And through the bare-boughed lilac-tree Our own warm hearth seemed blazing free The crane and pendent trammels showed, The Turks' heads on the andirons glowed, While childish fancy, prompt to tell The meaning of the miracle Whispered the old rhyme "Under the tree If hen the outdoors burns merrily. There the witches are miking tea"

The moon above the eastern wood
Shone at its full, the hill-range stood Transfigured in the silver flood,
Its blown snows flashing cold and keen
Dead white, save where some sharp ravine
Took shadow, or the sombre green
Of hemlocks turned to pitchy black
Against the whiteness at their back
For such a world and such a night
Most fitting that unwarming light,
Which only seemed where'er it fell
To make the coldness visible

Shut in from all the world without, We sat the clean-winged hearth about. Content to let the north-wind roar In baffled rage at pane and door. While the red logs before us beat The frost-line back with tropic heat. And ever, when a louder blast Shook beam and rafter as it passed, The merrier up its roaring draught The great throat of the chimney laughed, The house-dog on his paws outspread Laid to the fire his drowsy head, The cat's dark silhouette on the wall A couchant tiger's seemed to fall. And, for the winter fireside meet Between the andirons' straddling feet The mug of cider simmered slow, The apples sputtered in a row. And, close at hand, the basket stood With nuts from brown October's wood

What matter how the night behaved? What matter how the north-wind raved? Blow high, blow low, not all its snow Could quench our hearth-fire's ruddy glow O Time and Change'-with hair as grav As was my sire's that winter day How strange it seems, with so much gone Of life and love, to still live on' Ah, brother! only I and thou Are left of all that circle now,-The dear home faces whereupon That fitful firelight paled and shone Henceforward, listen as we will, The voices of that hearth are still. Look where we may, the wide earth o'er Those lighted faces smile no more

We sit beneath their orchard trees, We hear, like them, the hum of bees And rustle of the bladed corn. We turn the pages that they read,

We tread the paths their feet have worn

Next, the dear aunt, whose smile of cheer And voice in dreams I see and hear.-The sweetest woman ever Fate Perverse denied a household mate. Who, lonely, homeless, not the less Found peace in love's unselfishness, And welcome wheresoe'er she went, A calm and gracious element, Whose presence seemed the sweet income And womanly atmosphere of home,-Called up her girlhood memories. The huskings and the apple-bees, The sleigh-rides and the summer sails, Weaving through all the poor details And homespun warp of circumstance A golden woot-thread of 10mance For well she kept her genial mood And simple faith of maidenhood, Before her still a cloud-land lay, The mirage loomed across her way, The morning dew, that dried so soon With others glistened at her noon, Through years of toil and soil and care, From glossy tress to thin gray hair, All unprofaned she held apart The virgin fancies of the heart Be shame to him of woman born Who hath for such but thought of scorn

There, too, our elder sister plied Her evening task the stand beside, A full, rich nature, free to trust, Truthful and almost sternly just, Impulsive, earnest, prompt to act, And make her generous thought a fact, Keeping with many a light disguise The secret of self-sacrifice O heart sore-tried! thou hast the best That Heaven itself could give thee,-rest, Rest from all bitter thoughts and things! How many a poor one's blessing went With thee beneath the low green tent Whose curtain never outward swings!

As one who held herself a part Of all she saw, and let her heart Against the household bosom lean, Upon the motley-braided mat Our youngest and our dearest sat, Lifting her large, sweet, asking eyes, Now bathed within the fadeless green And holy peace of Paradise 400 Oh, looking from some heavenly hill, Or from the shade of saintly palms, Or silver reach of river calms, Do those large eyes behold me still? With me one little year ago -The chill weight of the winter snow For months upon her grave has lain, And now, when summer south-winds blow And buer and harebell bloom again, I tread the pleasant paths we trod, 410 I see the violet-sprinkled sod Whereon she leaned, too frail and weak The hillside flowers she loved to seek, Yet following me where'er I went With dark eyes full of love's content The birds are glad, the brier-rose fills The air with sweetness, all the hills Stretch green to June's unclouded sky, But still I wait with ear and eye For something gone which should be nigh, 420 A loss in all familiar things, In flower that blooms, and bird that sings And yet, dear heart' remembering thee, Am I not richer than of old? Safe in thy immortality. What change can reach the wealth I hold? What chance can mar the pearl and gold Thy love hath left in trust with me? And while in life's late afternoon, Where cool and long the shadows grow, 430 I walk to meet the night that soon Shall shape and shadow overflow, I cannot feel that thou art far,

And little seemed at best the odds Twixt Yankee pedlers and old gods Where Pindus-born Araxes took The guise of any grist-mill brook,

And dread Olympus at his will Became a huckleberry hill

Flashed back from lustrous eyes the light

Since then what old cathedral town Has missed her pilgrim staff and gown, What convent-gate has held its lock Against the challenge of her knock! Through Smyrna's plague-hushed thoroughfares, Up sea-set Malta's rocky stairs, Gray olive slopes of hills that hem Thy tombs and shrines, Jerusalem, Or startling on her desert throne The crazy Oueen of Lebanon With claims fantastic as her own, Her tireless feet have held their way, And still, unrestful, bowed, and gray, She watches under Eastern skies, With hope each day renewed and fresh, The Lord's quick coming in the flesh, Whereof she dreams and prophesies!

Where'er her troubled path may be, The Lord's sweet pity with her go! The outward wayward life we see, The hidden springs we may not know. Nor is it given us to discern What threads the fatal sisters spun, Through what ancestral years has run 570 The sorrow with the woman born, What forged her cruel chain of moods, What set her feet in solitudes. SNOW-BOUND.

A WINTER IDYL.

BY

JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER.

BOSTONTICKNOR AND HIELDS.
1866.

Title page of the first edition, 1866.

Within our beds awhile we heard
The wind that round the gables roared,
With now and then a ruder shock.
Which made our very bedsteads rock.
We heard the loosened clapboards tost,

The board-nails snapping in the frost,
And on us, through the unplastered wall,
Felt the light sifted snow-flakes fall
But sleep stole on, as sleep will do
When hearts are light and life is new;
Faint and more faint the murmurs grew,
Till in the summer-land of dreams
They softened to the sound of streams,
Low stir of leaves, and dip of oars,
And lapsing waves on quiet shores.

610

Next morn we wakened with the shout
Of merry voices high and clear,
And saw the teamsters drawing near
To break the drifted highways out
Down the long hillside treading slow
We saw the half-buried oxen go,
Shaking the snow from heads uptost,
Their straining nostrils white with frost.
Before our door the straggling train
Drew up, an added team to gain
The elders threshed their hands a-cold,
Passed, with the cider-mug, their jokes

630

Passed, with the cider-mug, their jokes
From lip to lip, the younger folks
Down the loose snow-banks, wrestling, rolled,
Then toiled again the cavalcade
O'er windy hill, through clogged ravine,

And woodland paths that wound between Low drooping pine-boughs winter-weighed From every barn a team afoot.
At every house a new recruit.
Where, drawn by Nature's subtlest law Haply the watchful young men saw Sweet doorway pictures of the curls And curious eyes of merry girls.
Lifting their hands in mock defence Against the snow-ball's compliments, And reading in each missive tost The charm with Eden never lost

We heard once more the sleigh-bells' sound,
And, following where the teamsters led,
The wise old Doctor went his round,
Just pausing at our door to say.
In the brief autocratic way
Of one who, prompt at Duty's call,
Was free to urge her claim on all,

That some poor neighbor sick abed
At night our mother's aid would need
For. one in generous thought and deed,
What mattered in the sufferer's sight
The Quaker matton's inward light,
The Doctor's mail of Calvin's creed?
All hearts confess the saints elect
Who, twain in faith, in love agree,
And melt not in an acid sect
The Christian pearl of charity!

So days went on a week had passed Since the great world was heard from last The Almanac we studied o'er. Read and reread our little store Of books and pamphlets, scarce a score, One harmless novel, mostly hid From younger eyes, a book forbid, and poetry, (or good or bad, i single book was all we had,) Where Ellwood's meek, drab-skirted Muse, A stranger to the heathen Nine, Sang, with a somewhat nasal whine, The wars of David and the Jews At last the floundering carrier bore The village paper to our door Lo' broadening outward as we read, To warmer zones the horizon spread, In panoramic length unrolled We saw the marvels that it told Before us passed the painted Creeks, And daft McGregor on his raids In Costa Rica's everglades And up Taygetos winding slow Rode Ypsilanti's Mainote Greeks, A Turk's head at each saddle-bow! Welcome to us its week-old news, Its corner for the rustic Muse, Its monthly gauge of snow and rain, Its record, mingling in a breath The wedding knell and dirge of death, Jest, anecdote, and love-lorn tale, The latest culprit sent to jail, Its hue and cry of stolen and lost, Its vendue sales and goods at cost,

And traffic calling loud for gain.

We felt the stir of hall and street,
The pulse of life that round us beat;
The chill embargo of the snow
Was melted in the genial glow;
Wide swung again our ice-locked door,
And all the world was ours once more!

Clasp, Angel of the backward look And folded wings of ashen gray And voice of echoes far away. The brazen covers of thy book; The weard palimpsest old and vast, Wherein thou hid'st the spectral past, Where, closely mingling pale and glow The characters of joy and woe; The monographs of outlived years, Or smile-illumed or dim with tears, Green hills of life that slope to death, And haunts of home, whose vistaed trees Shade off to mournful cypresses With the white amaranths underneath Even while I look, I can but heed The restless sands' incessant fall, Importunate hours that hours succeed, Each clamorous with its own sharp need, And duty keeping pace with all Shut down and clasp the heavy lids, I hear again the voice that bids The dreamer leave his dream midway

Yet, haply, in some lull of life, Some Truce of God which breaks its strife, The worldling's eyes shall gather dew, Dreaming in throngful city ways

For larger hopes and graver fears

Life greatens in these later years,

The century's aloe flowers to-day'

Of winter joys his boyhood knew, And dear and early friends—the tew Who yet remain—shall pause to view

These Flemish pictures of old days, Sit with me by the homestead hearth, And stretch the hands of memory forth

To warm them at the wood-fire's blaze! And thanks untraced to lips unknown Shall greet me like the odors blown From unseen meadows newly mown, Or lifes floating in some pond, Wood-fringed the wayside gaze beyond. Among the Hills

In its first form, entitled 'The Wife an Idyl of Bearcamp Water, this poem appeared in the Atlantic, January 1868 Before the volume Among the Hills and Other Poems appeared in December of the same year, Whittier made numerous changes Says Pickard "The inspiration . . . came to him in the summer of 1867. It is a tender and romantic love-story in verse, idealizing New England farm life, with a prelude which furnishes the darker shades needed to make the picture a faithful reproduction of the rural scenes he intended to portray . In its original form there were sixty-four lines in the Prelude, and it did not deal with the prosaic and disagreeable side of farm life, as does the Prelude in its present form, which consists of one hundred and fifty-six lines tenor of the Prelude is changed, so as to make it a new . The ballad proper enlarges upon the sweet story originally told, making three hundred and forty-four lines instead of one hundred and sixty-eight, as at first "

Modern readers may find the poem itself rather too sweet for their taste. The Prelude, however, is clearly a forerunner of modern poems and stories which emphasize the drabness and the flinty quality of life on New England farms.

Along the roadside, like the flowers of gold That tawny Incas for their gardens wrought, Heavy with sunshine droops the golden-rod, And the red pennons of the cardinal-flowers Hang motionless upon their upright staves. The sky is hot and hazy, and the wind, Wing-weary with its long flight from the south, Unfelt, yet, closely scanned, you maple leaf With faintest motion, as one stirs in dreams, Confesses it The locust by the wall Stabs the noon-silence with his sharp alarm A single hay-cart down the dusty road Creaks slowly, with its driver fast asleep On the load's top Against the neighboring hill, Huddled along the stone wall's shady side, The sheep show white, as if a snowdrift still Defied the dog-stat Through the open door A drowsy smell of flowers-gray heliotrope, And white sweet clover, and shy mignonette-Comes faintly in, and silent chorus lends To the pervading symphony of peace

No time is this for hands long overworn
To task their strength, and (unto Him be praise
Who giveth quietness!) the stress and strain
Of years that did the work of centuries
Have ceased, and we can draw our breath once more Freely and full. So, as yon harvesters
Make glad their nooning underneath the elms
With tale and riddle and old snatch of song.
I lay aside grave themes, and idly turn
The leaves of memory's sketch-book, dreaming o'er Old summer pictures of the quiet hills.
And human life, as quiet, at their feet

And yet not idly all A farmer's son, Proud of field-lore and haivest craft, and feeling All their fine possibilities, how rich And restful even poverty and toil

Become when beauty, harmony, and love Sit at their humble hearth as angels sat As evening in the patriarch's tent, when man 40 Mikes labor noble, and his farmer's frock The symbol of a Christian chivalry Tender and just and generous to her Who clothes with grace all duty, still, I know Too well the picture has another side.-How wearily the grind of toil goes on Where love is wanting, how the eye and ear And heart are starved amidst the plenitude Of nature, and how hard and colorless Is life without an atmosphere I look Across the lapse of half a century, And call to mind old homesteads, where no flower Told that the spring had come, but evil weeds, Nightshade and rough-leaved burdock in the place Of the sweet doorway greeting of the rose and honeysuckle, where the house walls seemed Blistering in sun, without a tree or vine To cast the tremulous shadow of its leaves Across the curtainless windows from whose panes Fluttered the signal rags of shiftlessness, Within, the cluttered kitchen-floor, unwashed (Broom-clean I think they called it), the best room Stifling with cellar damp, shut from the air In hot midsummer, bookless, pictureless Save the inevitable sampler hung Over the fireplace, or a mourning piece, A green-haired woman, peony-cheeked, beneath Impossible willows, the wide-throated hearth Bristling with faded pine-boughs half concealing The piled-up rubbish at the chimney's back, And, in sad keeping with all things about them, Shrill, querulous women, sour and sullen men, Untidy, loveless, old before their time, With scarce a human interest save their own Monotonous round of small economies. Or the poor scandal of the neighborhood, Blind to the beauty everywhere revealed, Treading the May-flowers with regardless feet, For them the song-sparrow and the bobolink Sang not, nor winds made music in the leaves, For them in vain October's holocaust Burned, gold and crimson, over all the hills, The sacramental mystery of the woods Church-goers, fearful of the unseen Powers,

But grumbling over pulpit-tax and pew-rent, Saving, as shrewd economists, their souls And winter pork with the least possible outlay Of salt and sanctity, in daily life Showing as little actual comprehension Of Christian charity and love and duty, As if the Sermon on the Mount had been Out dated like a last year's almanac Rich in broad woodlands and in half-tilled fields, And yet so pinched and bare and comfortless, The veriest straggler limping on his founds, The sun and air his sole inheritance, Laughed at a poverty that paid its taxes, And hugged his rags in self-complacency!

Not such should be the homesteads of a land Where whose wisely wills and acts may dwell 100 As king and lawgiver, in broad-acred state, With beauty, art, taste, culture, books, to make His hours of leisure richer than a life Of fourscore to the barons of old time. Our yeoman should be equal to his home Set in the fair, green valleys, purple walled, A man to match his mountains, not to creep Dwarfed and abased below them I would fain In this light way (of which I needs must own With the knife-grinder of whom Canning sings, 110 "Story, God bless you! I have none to tell you!") Invite the eye to see and the heart to feel The beauty and the joy within their reach,-Home, and home loves, and the beatitudes Of nature free to all Haply in years That wait to take the places of our own Heard where some breezy balcony looks down On happy homes, or where the lake in the moon Sleeps dreaming of the mountains, fair as Ruth, 120 In the old Hebrew pastoral, at the feet Of Boaz, even this simple lay of mine May seem the burden of a prophecy, Finding its late fulfillment in a change Slow as the oak's growth lifting manhood up Through broader culture, finer manners, love, And reverence, to the level of the hills tent, probably a reference to Genesis 18 • 39 angels sings, in 'The Friend of Humanity and the 110 knife-grinder Knife-Grinder,' a parody written by George Canning

O Golden Age, whose light is of the dawn And not of sunset, forward, not behind, Flood the new heavens and earth, and with thee bring All the old virtues, whatsoever things 130 Are pure and honest and of good repute, But add thereto whatever bard has sung Or seer has told of when in trance and dream They saw the Happy Isles of prophecy' Let Justice hold her scale, and Truth divide Between the right and wrong, but give the heart The freedom of its fair inheritance, Let the poor prisoner, cramped and starved so long, At Nature's table feast his ear and eye With joy and wonder, let all harmonies 140 Of sound, form, color, motion, wait upon The princely guest, whether in soft attire Of leisure clad, or the coarse frock of toil, And, lending life to the dead form of faith. Give human nature reverence for the sake Of One who bore it, making it divine With the ineffable tenderness of God. Let common need, the brotherhood of prayer, The heirship of an unknown destiny, The unsolved mystery round about us, make 150 A man more precious than the gold of Ophir Sacred, inviolate, unto whom all things Should minister, as outward types and signs Of the eternal beauty which fulfils The one great purpose of creation, Love, The sole necessity of Earth and Heaven!

AMONG THE HILLS

1.60

For weeks the clouds had raked the hills And vexed the vales with raining. And all the woods were sad with mist. And all the brooks complaining

At last, a sudden night-storm tore.
The mountain veils asunder.
And swept the valleys clean before.
The besom of the thunder.

Through Sandwich notch the west-wind sang Good morrow to the cotter, And once again Chocorua's horn Of shadow pierced the water Above his broad lake Ossipee, Once more the sunshine wearing, Stooped, tracing on that silver shield His grim armorial bearing

Clear drawn against the hard blue sky
The peaks had winter's keenness,
And, close on autumn's frost, the vales
Had more than June's fresh greenness

Again the sodden forest floors
With golden lights were checkered,
Once more rejoicing leaves in wind
And sunshine danced and flickered

It was as if the summer's late
Atoning for its sadness
Had borrowed every season's charm
To end its days in gladness

I call to mind those banded vales
Of shadow and of shining,
Through which, my hostess at my side,
I drove in day's declining

We held our sideling way above
The river's whitening shallows,
By homesteads old, with wide-flung barns
Swept through and through by swallows—

By maple orchards, belts of pine And larches climbing darkly The mountain slopes, and over all, The great peaks rising starkly

You should have seen that long hill-range
With gaps of brightness riven,—
How through each pass and hollow streamed
The purpling lights of heaven,—

Rivers of gold-mist flowing down From far celestial fountains.—

Not fair alone in curve and line. But something more and better. The secret charm eluding art, Its spirit, not its letter,-

An inborn grace that nothing lacked Of culture or appliance,-The warmth of genial courtesy, The calm of self-reliance

Before her queenly womanhood How dared our hostess utter The paltry errand of her need To buy her fresh-churned butter?

She led the way with housewife pride, Her goodly store disclosing, Full tenderly the golden balls With practised hands disposing

Then, while along the western hills We watched the changeful glory Of sunset, on our homeward way, I heard her simple story

The early crickets sang, the stream Plashed through my friend's narration Her rustic patois of the hills Lost in my free translation

"More wise," she said, "than those who swarm Our hills in middle summer. She came, when June's first roses blow, To greet the early comer

From school and ball and rout she came, The city's fair pale daughter, To drink the wine of mountain air Beside the Bearcamp Water

"Her step grew firmer on the hills That watch our homesteads over,

"Beside her, from the summer heat		A music as of thrushes
To share her grateful screening,
With forehead bared, the farmer stood,		"The plaything of your summer sport,
Upon his pitchfork leaning		The spells you weave around me
		You cannot at your will undo,
"Framed in its damp, dark locks, his face		Nor leave me as you found me

"'Some fair, sweet girl with skilful hand		Without a word of pleading	340
And cheerful heart for treasure,
Who never played with ivory keys,		"She looked up in his face of pain
Or danced the polka's measure		So archly, yet so tender
		'And if I lend you mine, she said,
"He bent his black brows to a frown,		'Will you forgive the lender?
He set his white teeth tightly
"Tis well," he said, for one like you		"'Nor frock nor tan can hide the man,
To choose for me so lightly		And see you not, my farmer,
		How weak and fond a woman waits
"You think, because my life is rude		Behind this silken armor?

I tell you love has naught to do		"I love you on that love alone,
With meetness or unmeetness		And not my worth, presuming,	350

Will you not trust for summer fruit The tree in May-day blooming?

Alone the hangbird overhead. His hair-swung cradle straining, Looked down to see love's miracle.-The giving that is gaining

And so the farmer found a wife, His mother found a daughter There looks no happier home than hers On pleasant Bearcamp Water flowers spring to blossom where she walks The careful ways of duty, Our hard, stiff lines of life with her Are flowing curves of beauty

Our homes are cheesser for her sake, Our door-yards brighter blooming, And all about the social air Is sweeter for her coming

Unspoken homilies of peace Her daily life is preaching, The still refreshment of the dew Is her unconscious teaching

And never tenderer hand than hers Unknits the brow of ailing, Her garments to the sick man's ear Have music in their trailing

And when, in pleasant harvest moons, The youthful huskers gather, Or sleighdrives on the mountain ways Defy the winter weather,-

In sugar-camps, when south and warm The winds of March are blowing And sweetly from its thawing veins The maple's blood is flowing,-

In summer, where some lilied pond Its virgin zone is bearing, Or where the ruddy autumn fire Lights up the apple-paring,-

"The coarseness of a ruder time Her finer mirth displaces, A subtler sense of pleasure fills Each rustic sport she graces

"Her presence lends its warmth and health To all who come before it If woman lost us Eden, such As she alone restore it

'For larger life and wiser aims The farmer is her debtor. Who holds to his another's heart Must needs be worse or better

"Through her his civic service shows A puter-toned ambition, No double consciousness divides The man and politician

"In party's doubtful ways he trusts Her instincts to determine. At the loud polls, the thought of her Recalls Christ's Mountain Sermon

"He owns her logic of the heart, And wisdom of unreason, Supplying, while he doubts and weighs, The needed word in season

"He sees with pride her richer thought, Her fancy's freer ranges, And love thus deepened to respect Is proof against all changes

"And if she walks at ease in ways His feet are slow to travel, And if she reads with cultured eyes What his may scarce unravel,

"Still clearer, for her keener sight Of beauty and of wonder, He learns the meaning of the hills He dwelt from childhood under

"And higher, warmed with summer lights, Or winter-crowned and hoary,

The ridged horizon lifts for him Its inner veils of glory

'He has his own free, bookless lore, The lessons nature taught him The wisdom which the woods and hills And toiling men have brought him

"The steady force of will whereby Her flexile grace seems sweeter, The sturdy counterpoise which makes Her woman's life completer

'A latent fire of soul which lacks
No breath of love to fan it,
And wir that, like his native brooks,
Plays over solid granic

"How dwarfed against his manliness She sees the poor pretension. The wants, the aims, the follies, born Of fashion and convention!

"How life behind its accidents Stands strong and self-sustaining. The human fact transcending all The losing and the gaining

"And so, in grateful interchange
Of teacher and of hearer.
Their lives their true distinctness keep While daily drawing nearer

"And if the husband or the wife In home's strong light discovers Such slight defaults as fuled to meet The blinded eyes of lovers.

"Why need we care to ask?—who dreams Without their thorns of roses. Or wonders that the truest steel The readiest spark discloses?

"For still in mutual sufferance lies The secret of true living Love scarce is love that never knows The sweetness of forgiving "We send the Squire to General Court, He takes his young wife thither, No prouder man election day Rides through the sweet June weather

'He sees with eyes of manly trust All hearts to her inclining. Not less for him his household light That others share its shining"

Thus, while my hostess spake, there grew Before me, warmer tinted And outlined with a tenderer grace, The picture that she hinted

The sunset smouldered as we drove Beneath the deep hill-shadows Below us wreaths of white fog walked Like ghosts the haunted meadows

Sounding the summer night, the stars
Dropped down their golden plummets,
The pale arc of the Northern lights
Rose o'er the mountain summits,—

Until, at last, beneath its bridge,
W'e heard the Bearcamp flowing
And saw across the mapled lawn
The welcome home-lights glowing,—

And, musing on the tale I heard,
T were well, thought I, if often
To jugged farm-life came the gift
To harmonize and soften,—

If more and more we found the troth
Of fact and fancy plighted,
And culture's charm and labor's strength
In rural homes united,—

The simple life, the homely hearth,
With beauty's sphere surrounding,
And blessing roll where toil abounds
With graces more abounding

The Meeting

Ina first printed version of this poem appeared in the Atlantic Monthly, February 1868 When the poem, as it is here printed, was prepared for publication in the book Among the Hills (1868), Whittier inserted a number of lines Says Whitman Bennett: "The man who seriously wishes to understand Whittier's philosophic attachment to Quakerism should read, line by line, 'The Meeting'... and get the information at the source"

The elder tolks shook hands at last, Down seat by seat the signal passed to simple ways like ours unused, Half solemnized and half amused, With long-drawn breath and shrug, my guest His sense of glad relief expressed Ourside the hills lay warm in sun, The cattle in the meadow-run Stood half-leg deep, a single bird The green repose above us stirred What part or lot have you,' he said, In these dull rites of drowsy-head? Is silence worship? Seek it where It soothes with dreams the summer air, Not in this close and rude-benched hall, But where soft lights and shadows fall, And all the slow, sleep-walking hours Glide soundless over grass and flowers' From time and place and form apart, Its holy ground the human heart, Nor ritual-bound nor templeward Walks the free spirit of the Lord' Our common Master did not pen His followers up from other men, His service liberty indeed, He built no church, he framed no creed, But while the saintly Pharisee Made broader his phylactery, As from the synagogue was seen The dusty-sandalled Nazarene Through ripening cornfields lead the way

Upon the awful Sabbath day
His sermons were the healthful talk
That shorter made the mountain-walk,
His wayside texts were flowers and birds,
Where mingled with His gracious words
The rustle of the tamarisk-tree
And ripple-wash of Galilee

"Thy words are well, O friend," I said, "Unmeasured and unlimited, With noiseless slide of stone to stone, The mystic Church of God has grown Invisible and silent stands The temple never made with hands, Unheard the voices still and small Of its unseen confessional He needs no special place of prayer Whose hearing ear is everywhere, He brings not back the childish days That ringed the earth with stones of praise, Roofed Karnak's hall of gods, and laid The plinths of Philae's colonnade Still less He owns the selfish good And sickly growth of solitude,-The worthless grace that, out of sight, Flowers in the desert anchorite, Dissevered from the suffering whole, Love hath no power to save a soul Not out of Self, the origin And native air and soil of sin, The living waters spring and flow, The trees with leaves of healing grow

"Dream not, O friend, because I seek
This quiet shelter twice a week,
I better deem its pine-laid floor
Than breezy hill or sea-sung shore,
But nature is not solitude
She crowds us with her thronging wood,

51 Karnak's hall, the great temple of Ammon on the east bank of the Nile, some three hundred and fifty miles from Carro • 52 Philae's colonnade Philae is a small island in the upper Egyptian Nile. Her many hands reach out to us,
Her many tongues are garrulous,
Perpetual riddles of surprise
She offers to our ears and eyes,
She will not leave our senses still,
But drags them captive at her will
And, making carth too great for heaven,
She hides the Giver in the given

"And so, I find it well to come
For deeper rest to this still room.
For here the habit of the soul
Feels less the outer world's control
The strength of mutual purpose pleads
More earnestly our common needs.
And from the silence multiplied
By these still forms on either side,
The world that time and sense have known
Falls off and leaves us God alone

"Yet tarely through the charmed repose Unmixed the stream of motive flows, A flavor of its many springs, The tints of earth and sky it brings, In the still waters needs must be Some shade of human sympathy. And here, in its accustomed place I look on memory's dearest face. The blind by-sitter guesseth not What shadow baums that vacant spot, No cyes save mine alone can sec The love wherewith it welcomes met And still, with those alone my kin, In doubt and weakness, want and sin, I bow my head, my heart I bare As when that face was living there. And strive (too oft, alas! in vain) The peace of simple trust to gain, Fold fancy's restless wings, and lay The idols of my heart away

"Welcome the silence all unbroken, Nor less the words of fitness spoken,— Such golden words as hers for whom Our autumn flowers have just made room, Whose hopeful utterance through and through The freshness of the morning blew, Who loved not less the earth that light Fell on it from the heavens in sight, But saw in all fair forms more fair The Eternal beauty mirrored there. Whose eighty years but added grace And saintlier meaning to her face,-The look of one who bore away Glad tidings from the hills of day, While all our hearts went forth to meet The coming of her beautiful feet! Or haply hers, whose pilgrim tread Is in the paths where Jesus led. Who dreams her childhood's Sabbath dream By Jordan's willow-shaded stream, And, of the hymns of hope and faith, Sung by the monks of Nazareth, Hears pious echoes, in the call To prayer, from Moslem minarets fall, Repeating where His works were wrought The lesson that her Master taught, Of whom an elder Sibyl gave The prophecies of Cumae's cave!

"I ask no organ's soulless breath To drone the themes of life and death, No altar candle-lit by day. No ornate wordsman's rhetoric-play. No cool philosophy to teach Its bland audacities of speech To double-tasked idolators Themselves their gods and worshippers, No pulpit hammered by the fist Of loud-asserting dogmatist, Who borrows from the hand of love The smoking thunderbolts of Jove I know how well the fathers taught What work the later schoolmen wrought, I reverence old-time faith and men. But God is near us now as then. His force of love is still unspent

His hate of sin as imminent: And still the measure of our needs Ourgrows the cramping bounds of creeds: The manna gathered yesterday A ready savors of decay. Doubts to the world's child-heart unknown Ouestion us now from star and stone. Too little or too much we know, And sight is swift and faith is slow, The power is lost to self-deceive With shallow forms of make-believe We walk at high noon, and the bells Call to a thousand oracles, But the sound deafens, and the light Is stronger than our dazzled sight, The letters of the sacred Book Glimmer and swim beneath our look. Still struggles in the Age's breast With deepening agony of quest The old entreaty 'Art thou He, Or look we for the Christ to be?'

"God should be most where man is least So, where is neither church nor priest, And never rag of form or creed It clothe the nakedness of need,-Where farmer-folk in silence meet,-I turn my bell-unsummoned feet, I lay the critic's glass aside, With deepening agony of quest And, lowest-seated, testify To the oneness of humanity, Confess the universal want, And share whatever Heaven may grant He findeth not who seeks his own, The soul is lost that's saved alone Not on one favored forehead fell Of old the fire-tongued miracle, But flamed o'er all the thronging host The baptism of the Holy Ghost, Heart answers heart in one desire The blending lines of prayer aspire, Where, in my name, meet two or three,' Our Lord hath said, 'I there will be!' So sometimes comes to soul and sense The feeling which is evidence

That very near about us lies The realm of spiritual mysteries The sphere of the supernal powers 208 Impinges on this world of ours The low and dark horizon lifts, To light the scenic terror shifts, The breath of a diviner air Blows down the answer of a prayer That all our sorrow, pain, and doubt A great compassion clasps about, And law and goodness, love and torce, Are wedded fast beyond divorce When duty leaves to love its task, The beggar Self forgets to ask, With smile of trust and folded hands, The passive soul in waiting stands To teel, as flowers the sun and dew. The One true Life its own renew

"So, to the calmly gathered thought The innermost of truth is taught, The mystery dimly understood, That love of God is love of good, And, chiefly, its divinest trace In Him of Nazareth's holy face, That to be saved is only this,-Salvation from our selfishness. From more than elemental fire, The soul's unsanctified desire, From sin itself, and not the pain That warns us of its chafing chain, That worship's deeper meaning lies In mercy, and not sacrifice. Not proud humilities of sense And posturing of penitence, But love's unforced obedience, That Book and Church and Day are given For man, not God,-for earth, not heaven,-The blessed means to holiest ends, Not masters, but benignant friends, 190 That the dear Christ dwells not afar, The king of some remoter star,

Harriet Beecher Stowe

1811 · 1896

Litchfield, Connecticut, was the birthplace of Hairiet Beecher, and the first twenty-one years of her life were spent in New England. Her father was a rigid Calvinist, and six of her brothers were eventually to become ministers, one of them the famous pulpit orator, Henry Ward Beecher. At fourteen, after an education in private religious schools, Harriet became a teacher.

When she was twenty-one, she moved with her family to Cincinnati, where her father served as the first president of Lane Theological Seminary, and for a time Harriet taught in the seminary. At twenty-four, she married Calvin Stowe, a member of the faculty. In 1850 the Stowe family moved East, and there Stowe taught in Bowdoin and in Andover.

From childhood, Mrs Stowe escaped some of the grimness of her pious surroundings by imagining interesting adventures for herself. The imaginative faculty thus developed was of service to her when, in Cincinnati, she composed stories to be read to a literary club. The sale of some of these stories launched her upon her writing career. Financial returns became very important additions to the meager income of Piofessor Stowe, an income insufficient to provide for a rapidly growing family. Somehow, in intervals between caring for her large family and keeping a big house, she found time to write numerous stories and sketches.

Shortly after going to Bowdoin, Mrs Stowe wrote Uncle Tom Cabin for serial publication, in 1851, in The National Era, an abolitionist publication Published as a book in 1852, this novel was sensationally success ful, not only as a book but also in dramatic form (see p. 78). It did so much to advance the cause of abolition that later, when its housewifely author was presented to President Lincoln, he said quizzically, "So this is the little woman who wrote the book which caused the great war!" Mrs Stowe followed it with Dred (1856), another abolitionistic work.

Less sensational, but probably of more lasting value than these novels, was a series of books dealing with life in prewar New England, important contributions to the local color movement—The Minister's Wooing (1859), Oldrown Folks (1869), Sam Lawson's Fireside Stories (later known as Oldrown Fireside Stories) (1871), and Poganue People (1878)

In writing these later books, said Mrs Stowe, "I have tried to make my mind as still and passive as a looking-glass, or a mountain lake, and then to give you merely the images reflected there. I desire that you should see the characteristic persons of those times, and hear them talk." Firetide Stories was a collection of stories unfolded by that admirable Yankee, Sam Lawson to entertain two childish listeners. For these narratives, Mrs. Stowe drew largely upon not only her own memories but also those of her husband, "an inimitable mimic and story-teller". That discerning critic, William Dean Howells, in Synther's Monthly, April 1872, called Sam Lawson the best drawn Yankee in print," and saw his tales as brilliant re-creations of a whole Yankee village world

And in addition to being authentic, the yarns are charming and comic—the mature creations of a great author.

CAPTAIN KIDDS MONEY

One of our most favorite legendary resorts was the old

Sam Lawson preferred it on many accounts. It was quiet and retired, that is to say, at such a distance from his own house, that he could not hear if Hepsy called ever so loudly, and farther off than it would be convenient for that industrious and painstaking woman to tollow him. Then there was the soft fragrant cushion of hay, on which his length of limb could be easily bestowed.

Our barn had an upper loft with a swinging outer door that commanded a view of the old mill, the watertall, and the distant windings of the river, with its grassy green banks, its graceful elm draperies, and its white flocks of water-lilies, and then on this Saturday atternoon we had Sam all to ourselves. It was a drowsy, dreamy October day, when the hens were lazily "craw, crawing," in a soft, conversational undertone with each other, as they scratched and picked the hay-seed under the barn windows Below in the barn black Caesar sat quietly hatchelling flax, sometimes gurgling and giggling to himself with an overflow of that interior jollity with which he seemed to be always full. The African in New England was a curious contrast to everybody around him in the joy and satisfaction that he seemed to feel in the mere fact of being alive Every white person was glad or sorry for some appreciable cause in the past, present, or future which was capable of being definitely stated, but black Caesar was in an eternal giggle and frizzle and simmer of enjoyment for which to could give no earthly reason, he was an "embodied joy," like Shelley's skylark

'Jest hear him,' said Sam Lawson, looking pensively over the haymow, and strewing hayseed down on his wool "How that 'ere critter seems to tickel and laugh all the while bout nothin' Lordy massy, he don't seem never to consider that this life's a dream, an empty show"

"Look here, Sam" we broke in, anxious to cut short a threatened stream of morality, "you promised to tell us 40 about Captain Kidd, and how you dug for his money"

"Did I, now? Wal, boys, that 'arc history o' Kidd's is a warnin' to fellers. Why, Kidd had pious parents and Bible and sanctuary privileges when he was a boy, and yet come to be hanged. It's all in this ere song I'm a-goin' to sing ye. Lordy massy! I wish I had my bass-viol now. Caesar," he said, calling down from his perch, "can't you strike the pitch o' Cap'n Kidd' on your fiddle?"

Caesar's fiddle was never far from him. It was, in 19 fact, tucked away in a nice little nook just over the manger, and he often caught an interval from his work to scrape a dancing-tune on it, keeping time with his heels, to our great delight.

A most wailing minor-keyed tune was doled forth, which seemed quite refreshing to Sam's pathetic vein, as he sang in his most lugubrious tones —

'My name was Robert Kidd As I sailed, as I sailed, My name was Robert Kidd, God's laws I did forbid And so wickedly I did, As I sailed, as I sailed

"Now ye see, boys, he's a-goin' to tell how he abused his religious privileges, just hear now -

> 'My father taught me well, As I sailed, as I sailed, My father taught me well To shun the gates of hell, But vet I did rebel, As I sailed, as I sailed

'He put a Bible in my hand, As I sailed, as I sailed, He put a Bible in my hand, And I sunk it in the sand Before I left the strand, As I sailed, as I sailed'

10

30

"Did ye ever hear o' such a haidened, contrary critter, boys? It's awful to think on Wal, ye see that 'are's the way fellers allers begin the ways o' sin, by turning their backs on the Bible and the advice o pious parents. Now hear what he come to -

Then I murdered William More. As I sailed, as I sailed, I murdered William More. And left him in his gore, Not many leagues from shore, As I sailed, as I sailed

> To execution dock I must go I must go To execution dock While thousands round me flock, To see me on the block, I must go, I must go

"There was a good deal more on 't," said Sam, pausing, "but I don't seem to remember it but it's real solemn and affectin

"Who was Capt Kidd, Sam?" said I

"Wal, he was an officer in the British navy, and he got to bein a pirate used to take ships and sink em, and murder the tolks, and so they say he got no end o' money,-gold and silver and precious stones as many 40 as the wise men in the East. But ye see, what good did it all do him? He couldn't use it, and darsn't keep it, so he used to bury it in spots round here and there in the awfullest heathen way ye ever heard of. Why, they say he allers used to kill one or two men or women or children of his prisoners, and bury with it, so that their sperits might keep watch on it ef anybody was to die arter it That 'are thing has been tried and tried, but no man nor mother's son on 'em ever got a cent that dug 'T was tried here 'n Oldtown, and they come pretty nigh gettin' on 't, but it gin 'em the slip. Ye see boys, it's the Devil's money, and he holds a pretty tight grip on 't"

"Well, how was it about digging for it? Tell us, did you do it? Were you there? Did you see it? And why couldn't they get it?" we both asked eagerly and in one breath

"Why, Lordy massy! boys, your questions tumbles over each other thick as martins out o' a martin-box Now, you jest be moderate and let alone, and I'll tell you all about it from the beginnin' to the end. I didn't railly have no hand in 't, though I was knowin' to 't, as I be to most things that goes on round here, but my conscience wouldn't railly a let me start on no sich undertakın'

"Wal, the one that fust sot the thing a-goin' was old Mother Hokum, that used to live up in that tumble down shed by the cranberry-pond up beyond the spring pastur'. They had a putty bad name, them Hokums How they got a livin' nobody knew, for they didn't seem to pay no attention to raisin' nothin' but childun, but the deuce knows, there was plenty o' them Their old hut was like a rabbit-pen there was a tow head to every crack and cranny 'Member what old Caesar said once when the word come to the store that old Hokum had got twins 'S pose de Lord knows best says Caesar, but I thought dere was Hokums enough afore' Wal, even poor workin' industrious folks like me finds it's hard gettin' along when there's so many mouths to feed. Lordy massy! there don't never seem to be no end on 't, and so it ain't wonderful, come to think on 't, ef folks like them Hokums gets tempted to help along in ways that ain't quite right. Anyhow tolks did use to think that old Hokum was too sort o familiar with their wood-piles 'long in the night, though they couldn't never prove it on him; and when Mother Hokum come to houses round to wash, folks use sometimes to miss pieces, here and there though they never could find em on her, then they was allers a gettin' in debt here and a gettin' in debt there. Why, they got to owin two dollars to Joe Gidger for butcher's meat, cause Hokum he promised so fair to pay, but he couldn't never get it out o' him 'Member once Joe walked clear up to the cranberry-pond arter that 'are rwo dollars, but Mother Hokum she see him a-comin' jest as he come past the jumper-bush on the corner She says to Hokum, 'Get into bed, old man, quick, and let me tell the story,' says she So she covered him up, and when Gidger come in she come up to him and says she, 'Why, Mr Gidger, I'm jest ashamed to see ye why Mr Hokum was jest a-comin' down to pay ye that are money last week, but ye see he was took down with the small-pox'-Joe didn't hear no more he just turned round, and streaked it out that are door with his coattails flyin' out straight ahind him, and old Mother Hokum she jest stood at the window holdin' her sides and laughin' fit to split, to see him run. That 'are's jest a simple of the ways them Hokums cut up

W.il, you see, boys, there's a queer kind o' rock down on the bank o' the river, that looks sort o like a gravestone. The biggest part on 't is sunk down under ground, and its pretty well growed over with blackberry-vines, but, when you scratch the bushes away, they used to make out some queer marks on that 'are rock. They was sort o' lines and crosses, and folks would have it that them was Kidd's private marks, and that there was one o' the places where he hid his money.

Wal, there's no sayin' fairly how it come to be thought so, but fellers used to say so, and they used sometimes to talk it over to the tahvern, and kind o' wonder whether or no, if they should dig, they wouldn't come to suthin'

Wal old Mother Hokum she heard on 't, and she was sort o' enterprisin' old crittur, fact was, she had to be 'cause the young Hokums was jest like bag-worms, the more they growed the more they eat, and I expect she found it pretty hard to fill their mouths, and so she said of there was anything under that 'are rock, they'd 's good's have it as the Devil, and so she didn't give old Hokum no peace o' his life, but he must see what there was there

'Wal, I was with 'em the night they was a-talkin' on 't up Ye see, Hokum he got thirty-seven cents' worth o' lemons and sperit I see him goin' by as I was out a splittin' kindlin's, and says he 'Toddy

Whitney and Harry Wiggin's comin' up, and we're goin to have a little suthin' hot, says he, and he kind o' showed me the lemons and sperit. And I told him I guessed I would go long. Wal, I kind o' wanted to 50 see what they d be up to, ye know.

"Wal, come to find out, they was a talkin about Cap'n Kidd's treasures, and layin out how they should get it and a settin one another on with gret stories about it

Sam Lawson

"Twe heard that there was whole chists full o' gold guineas, says one

"'And I've heard o' gold bracclets and ear-rings and finger-rings all sparklin' with diamonds,' says another

"'Maybe it's old silver plate from some o' them old 60 West Indian grandees,' says another

"'Wal, whatever it is,' says Mother Hokum, 'I want to be into it,' says she

"'Wal Sam, won't you jine" says they

"'Wal, boys, says I I kind o' don't feel jest like j'inin' I sort o' am't clear about the rights on 't seems to me it's mighty like goin' to the Devil for money'

"'Wal,' says Mother Hokum, 'what if 'tis' Money's money, get it how ye will, and the Devil's money'll buy as much meat as any 1'd go to the Devil if he gave good money'

"'Wal, I guess I wouldn't,' says I. 'Don't you 'member the sermon Parson Lothrop preached about hastin' to be rich, last sabba' day.'

"Parson Lothrop be hanged!" says she "Wal, now, says she, 'I like to see a parson with his silk stockin's and great gold-headed cane, a lollopin' on his carriage behind his fat, prancin' hosses, comin' to meetin' to preach to us poor folks not to want to be rich! How'd he like it to have forty-leven children, and nothin' to put onto 'em or into 'em, I wonder? Guess if Lady Lothrop had to rub and scrub, and wear her fingers to the bone as I do, she'd want to be rich, and I guess the parson, if he couldn't get a bellyful for a week, would 20 be for diggin' up Kidd's money, or doing 'most anything else to make the pot bile."

"'Wal,' says I, 'I'll kind o' go with ye, boys, and sort o' see how things turn out, but I guess I won't take no shere in 't,' says I

'Wal, they got it all planned out They was to wait till the full moon, and then they was to get Primus King to go with 'em and help do the diggin'. Ye see, Hokum and Toddy Whitney and Wiggin are all putty softly fellers, and hate dreffully to work, and I tell you the Kidd money ain't to be got without a pretty tough piece o' diggin'. Why, it's jest like diggin' a well to get at it. Now, Primus King was the master hand for diggin' wells, and so they said they diget him by givin' on him a shere.

"Harry Wiggin he didn't want no nigger a sherin in it he said, but Toddy and Hokum they said that when there was such stiff diggin' to be done, they did not care if they did go in with a nigger

"Wal, Wiggin he said he hadn't no objection to to havin' the nigger do the diggin', it was sherin' the profits he objected to

"'Wal,' said Hokum, 'you can't get him without, says he 'Primus knows too much,' says he you can't fool him 'Finally they 'greed that they was to give Primus twenty dollars, and shere the treasure mong themselves

"Come to talk to Primus, he wouldn't stick in a spade, unless they'd pay him aforehand. Ye see, Primus was up to 'em, he knowed about Gidger, and there wa'n't none on 'em that was particular good pay, and so they all jest hed to rake and scrape, and pay him down the twenty dollars among 'em. and they 'greed for the fust full moon, at twelve o'clock at night, the 9th of October

"Wal, ye see, I had to tell Hepsy I was goin' out to watch Wal, so I was, but not jest in the way she took it, but Lordy massy! a feller has to tell his wife suthin' to keep her quiet, ye know, 'specially Hepsy

'Wal, wal, of all the moonlight nights that ever I did see, I never did see one equal to that Why, you could see the color o' everything I 'member I could see how the huckleberry-bushes on the rock was red as blood when the moonlight shone through 'em, cause the leaves you see, had begun to turn

"Goin' on our way we got to talkin' about the sperits
"I ain't afraid on 'em,' says Hokum 'What harm can a sperit do me² says he 'I don't care ef there's a dozen on 'em,' and he took a swig at his bottle

"'Oh' there am't no sperits, says Harry Wiggin 'That 'are talk's all nonsense,' and he took a swig at his bottle

"'Wal,' savs Toddy, 'I don't know 'bout that ere Me and Ike Sanders has seen the sperits in the Cap'n Brown house We thought we'd jest have a peek into the window one night, and there was a whole flock o' black colts without no head on come rushin' on us and knocked us flat

"I expect you'd been at the tahvern,' says Hokum

Wal, yes, we had, but them was sperits, we want drunk, now, we was jest as sober as ever we was

"'Wal, they won't get away my money,' says Primus for I put it safe away in Dinah's teapor afore I come out,' and then he showed all his ivories from ear to ear 'I think all this are's sort o' foolishness,' says Primus

"Wal, says I, boys, I aint a-goin to have no part or lot in this ere matter, but I ll jest lay it off to you how it's to be done. Ef Kidd's money is under this rock there's (perit) that watch it, and you mustn't give 'em no advantage. There mustn't be a word spoke from the time ye get sight o' the treasure till ye get it safe up on to hirm ground, says I. 'Ef ye do, it'll vanish right out o sight. I've talked with them that has dug down to it and seen it, but they allers lost it, 'cause they d'call out.

and say suthin'; and the minute they spoke, away it went.'

"Wal, so they marked off the ground, and Primus he begun to dig, and the rest kind o' sot around It was so still it was kind o' solemn Ye see, it was past twelve eclock, and every critter in Oldtown was asleep, and there was two whipporwills on the great Cap'n Brown clim-trees, that kep' a answerin' each other back and forward sort o' solitary like, and then every once in a while there'd come a sort o' strange whisper up among the elmtree leaves, jest as if there was talkin goin' on, and every time Primus struck his spade into the ground it sounded sort o' holler, jest as tf he'd been a-diggin' a grave. It's kind o melancholy,' says I, 'to think o' them poor critters that had to be killed and buried jest to keep this 'ere treasure What awful thing'll be brought to light in the Judgment day! Them poor critters they loved to live and hated to die as much as any on us, but no, they hed to die jest to satisfy that critter's wicked will I've heard them as thought they could tell the Cap'n Kidd places by layin' their ear to the ground at midnight, and they d hear groans and wailin's "

Why, Sam1 were there really people who could tell where Kidd's money was?" I here interposed

"Oh, sartin! why, yis There was Shebna Bascom, he was one Shebna could always tell what was under the earth He'd cut a hazel-stock, and hold it in his hand when folks was wantin' to know where to dig wells, and that 'are stick would jest turn in his hands, and p'int down till it would fairly grind the bark off, and ef you dug in that place you was sure to find a spring Oh, yis Shebna he's told many where the Kidd money was, and been with 'em when they dug for it, but the pester on 't was they allers lost it, 'cause they would some on 'em speak afore they thought"

"But, Sam, what about this digging? Let's know what came of it," said we, as Sam appeared to lose his way in his story

"Wal ye see, they dug down about five feet, when Primus he struck his spade smack on something that c chinked like iron

"Wal, then Hokum and Toddy Whitney was into the nole in a minute, they made Primus get out, and they took the spade, 'cause they wanted to be sure to come on it themselves

"Wal, they begun, and they dug and he scraped, and sure enough they come to a gret iron pot as big as your granny's dinner-pot, with an iron bale to it.

"Wal, then they put down a rope, and he put the rope through the handle, then Hokum and Toddy they clambered upon the bank, and all on 'em began to draw up jest 50 as still and silent as could be They drawed and drawed, till they jest got it even with the ground, when Toddy spoke out all in a tremble, There, says he, 'ue've got it!' And the minit he spoke they was both struck by suthm' that knocked em clean over, and the rope give a crack like a pistol-shot, and broke short off, and the pot went down, down, and they heard it goin', jink, jink, Jink, and it went way down into the earth, and the ground closed over it, and then they heard the screechin'est laugh ye ever did hear"

"I want to know, Sam, did you see that pot?" I exclaimed at this part of the story.

"Wal, no, I didn't Ye see, I jest happened to drop asleep while they was diggin', I was so kind o' tired, and I did n t wake up till it was all over

"I was waked up, 'cause there was consid'able of a scuffle, for Hokum was so mad at Toddy for speakin', that he was a-fistin' on him, and old Primus he jest hawhawed and laughed Wal, I got my money safe, anyhow,' says he

"'Wal, come to,' says I - 'Tain't no use cryin' for spilt milk you've jest got to turn in now and fill up this 'ere hole, else the selectmen'll be down on ye'

"'Wal,' says Primus, 'I did n't engage to fill up no holes,' and he put his space on his shoulder and trudged off

"Wal, it was putty hard work, fillin' in that hole, but Hokum and Toddy and Wiggin had to do it, 'cause they did n't want to have everybody a-laughin' at 'em, and I kind o' tried to set it home to 'em, showin' on 'em that 80 'twas all for the best

"'Ef you'd 'a' been left to get that 'ere money, there'd 'a' come a cuss with it,' says I 'It shows the vanity o' hastin' to be rich'

"'Oh, you shet up!' says Hokum, says he 'You never hasted to anything, says he Ye see, he was riled, that's why he spoke so"

"Sam," said we, after inaturely reflecting over the story, "what do you suppose was it. that pot?"

"Lordy massy, boys' ye never will be done askin' ques- 90 tions Why, how should I know?"

"The writer of the epic of the gold rush," Francis Bret Harte, lived in California only during the period from 1854 to 1871. The rest of his life he lived in the East or abroad. Yet his stay in California gave him his most important material for poetry and for fiction which won remarkable popularity for him.

Harte was born in Albany, New York, August 25, 1836. He had a rather sketchy education. After his widowed mother moved the family to San Francisco, he joined them—in 1851—on the Pacific Coast. There he taught school, worked in the mines for a short time, served as a Wells Fargo Express messenger, and eventually became a printer. Developing his skill as a writer, he in time worked into various editorial jobs on some of the California magazines.

In 1868 he published "The Luck of Roaring Camp" in the newly founded Overland Monthly, of which he was editor. When the issue containing the story reached the East, the story was an immediate sensational success. Other stories in the same vein augmented Harte's popularity, and a poem, "Plain Language from Truthful James," was another extraordinary hit, read and quoted by everyone. In 1871, with an impressive contract from the Allantic Monthly in his pocket, Harte started East, leaving the Far West permanently. His journey across the continent was a triumphant progress, and he was hailed in the East as a new genius.

The part of his life which came after this journey was pretty much of an anticlimax. A few more stories—"The Outcasts of Poker Flat," and "Tennessee's Partner," and "How Santa Claus Came to Simpson's Bar," for instance—and some of his many poems were up to the early standard, but his work became repetitious, and, in the end, not much more than the working out of a formula. In 1878 he went abroad on a consular appointment to Germany. From 1888 until his death in 1902 he lived in England.

Harte believed that his art derived from that of American humor, and much of the comedy he mingles with pathos is obviously related to the humorous writings of pre-Civil War humorists. From the same group he evidently learned much about the picturing in fiction of the teeming life of a frontier section. From Dickens his favorite author, he also apparently learned a great deal—particularly a way of merging his background into a story and a way of making characters memorable by giving them grotesque or unexpected traits. From post war humorists, he borrowed various tricks of phrasing His fame derived in part from the skill with which he blended these elements in his stories, in part from the interest the public had in the picturesque life of the latest American frontier.

An element in Harte's writings which also helped their popularity was a novel twist which he used again and again in the time-worn plot of sacrifice. In earlier sentimental stories, sweet and gracious characters habitually had made touching sacrifices in behalt of weak or wicked characters. Harte reversed the rôle of the rougher characters, and showed prostitutes, gamblers, or other besmirched men and women of the mining camps bravely making sacrifices. In "The Luck of Roaring Camp" the old formula of "innocent character saves ignoble characters."

ter" is reversed when the rough Kentuck sacrifices his life to rescue little Tom Luck In "Tennessee's Partner" the person for whom the sacrifice is made is, of course, a typical rascal of the old-fashioned sort, but the partner who is the hero shows the tenderness which lurks beneath a tough exterior

Harte's great success is important in American literary history because of the impetus it gave to local color writing, which in time was to acquaint the public with life in most of the other sections of the country. The unconventional morality—for the time—of his fiction prepared the way for characterizations and scenes in later fiction which increasingly departed from prudish standards

The Luck of Roaring Camp

There was commotion in Roaring Camp It could not have been a fight, for in 1850 that was not novel enough to have called together the entire settlement. The ditches and claims were not only deserted, but 'Tuttle's grocery' had contributed its gamblers, who, it will be remembered, calmly continued their game the day that French Pete and Kanaka Joe shot each other to death over the bar in the front room. The whole camp was collected before a rude cabin on the outer edge of the clearing. Conversation was carried on in a low tone, but the name of a woman was frequently repeated. It was a name familiar enough in the camp,—"Cherokee Sal."

Perhaps the less said of her the better. She was a coarse, and it is to be feared, a very sinful woman. But at that time she was the only woman in Roaring Camp, and was just then lying in sore extremity, when she most needed the ministration of her own sex. Dissolute, abandoned, and irreclaimable, she was yet suffering a martyrdom hard enough to bear even when veiled by sympathizing womanhood, but now terrible in her loneliness. The primal curse had come to her in that original isolation which must have made the punishment of the first transgression so dreadful. It was, perhaps, part of the expiation of her sin, that, at a moment when she most lacked her sex's intuitive tenderness and care, she met only the half-contemptuous faces of her masculine associates. Yet a few of the spectators were, I think, touched by her sufficings. Sandy Tipton thought it was "rough on Sal," and, in the contemplation of her so condition, for a moment rose superior to the fact that he had an ace and two bowers in his sleeve

It will be seen, also, that the situation was novel Deaths were by no means uncommon in Roaring Camp, but a birth was a new thing People had been dismissed the camp effectively, finally, and with no possibility of return, but this was the first time that anybody had been introduced ab initio. Hence the excitement

"You go in there, Stumpy," said a prominent citizen known as "Kentuck," addressing one of the loungers 40 "Go in there, and see what you kin do You've had experience in them things."

Perhaps there was a fitness in the selection Stumpy, in other climes, had been the putative head of two families, in fact, it was owing to some legal informality in these proceedings that Roaring Camp—a city of refuge—was indebted to his company. The crowd approved the choice, and Stumpy was wise enough to how to the majority. The door closed upon the extempore surgeon and midwife, and Roaring Camp sat down outside, smoked its pipe, and awaited the issue.

The assemblage numbered about a hundred men One or two of these were actual fugitives from justice, some were criminal, and all were reckless Physically, they exhibited no indication of their past lives and character The greatest scamp had a Raphael face, with a profusion of blond hair, Oakhurst, a gambler, had the melancholy air and intellectual abstraction of a Hamlet, the coolest and most courageous man was scarcely over five feet in height, with a soft voice and an embarrassed, timid manner. The term 'roughs' applied to them was a distinction rather than a definition. Perhaps in the minor details of fingers, toes, ears, etc., the camp may have been deficient, but these slight omissions did not detract from their aggregate force. The strongest man had but three fingers on his right hand, the best shot had but one eye.

Such was the physical aspect of the men that were dispersed around the cabin. The camp lay in a triangular valley, between two hills and a river. The only outlet was a steep trail over the summit of a hill that faced the cabin, now illuminated by the rising moon. The suffering woman might have seen it from the rude bunk whereon she lay,—seen it winding like a silver thread 20 until it was lost in the stars above.

A fire of withered pine boughs added sociability to the gathering. By degrees the natural levity of Roaring Camp returned. Bets were freely offered and taken regarding the result. Three to five that "Sal would get through with it", even, that the child would survive, side bets as to the sex and complexion of the coming stranger. In the midst of an excited discussion an exclamation came from those nearest the door, and the crackling of the pines, the swift rush of the river, and the crackling of the fire rose a sharp, querulous cry—a cry unlike anything heard before in the camp. The pines stopped moaning, the river ceased to rush, and the fire to crackle. It seemed as if Nature had stopped to listen too.

The camp rose to its feet as one man! It was proposed to explode a barrel of gun-powder, but, in consideration of the situation of the mother, better counsels prevailed, and only a few revolvers were discharged, for, whether owing to the rude surgery of the camp, or some other reason, Cherokee Sal was sinking fast. Within an hour she had climbed, as it were, that rugged road that led to the stars, and so passed out of Roating Camp, its sin and shame forever. I do not think that the announcement disturbed them much, except in speculation as to the fate of the child. "Can he live now?" was asked of Stumpy The answer was doubtful The only other being of Cherokee Sal's sex and maternal condition in the settlement was an ass There was some conjecture as to fitness, but the experiment was tried. It was less problematical than the ancient treatment of Romulus and Remus, and apparently as successful

When these details were completed, which exhausted another hour, the door was opened, and the anxious crowd, who had already formed themselves into a queue entered in single file. Beside the low bunk or shelf on which the figure of the mother was starkly outlined below the blankets, stood a pine table. On this a candle-box was placed, and within it, swathed in staring red flannel, lay the last arrival at Roaring Camp Beside the candle-box was placed a hat. Its use was soon indicated Gentlemen," said Stumpy, with a singular mixture of authority and ex officio complacency—"Gentlemen will please pass in at the front door, round the table, and out at the back door. Them as wishes to contribute anything toward the orphan will find a hat handy" The first man entered with his hat on, he un covered however, as he looked about him, and so, unconsciously, set an example to the next. In such communities good and bad actions are catching. As the procession filed in, comments were audible,-criticisms addres ed, perhaps rather to Stumpy, in the character of showman —"Is that him? 'Mighty small specimen "Hasn't more n got the color. 'Ain't bigger not a der ringer." The contributions were as characteristic. A silver tobacco box, a doubloon, a navy revolver, silver mounted, a gold specimen, a very beautifully embroi dered lady's handkerchief (from Oakhurst the gambler), a diamond breastpin a diamond ring (suggested by the pin, with the remark from the giver that he ? "saw that pin and went two diamonds better"), a slung shot, a Bible (contributor not detected), a golden spur, a silver teaspoon (the initials, I regret to say, were not the giver's), a pair of surgeon's shears, a lancet, a Bank of England note for £5, and about $200 in loose gold and silver coin. During these proceedings Stumpy maintained a silence as impassive as the dead on his left-a gravity as inscrutable as that of the newly-born on his right. Only one incident occurred to break the monotony of the curious procession. As Kentuck bent over the candle-box half curiously, the child turned, and in a spasm of pain, caught at his groping finger, and held it fast for a moment. Kentuck looked foolish and embarrassed Something like a blush tried to assert itself in his weather-beaten cheek "The d—d little cuss!" he said, as he extricated his finger, with, perhaps, more tenderness and care than he might have been deemed capable of showing He held that finger a little apart from its fellows as he went out, and examined it curiously The examination provoked the same original remark in regard to the child In fact, he seemed to enjoy repeating it "He rastled with my finger," he remarked to Tipton, holding up the member, "the d—d little cuss!"

It was four o'clock before the camp sought repose. A light burnt in the cabin where the watchers sat, for Stumpy did not go to bed that night. Nor did Kentuck. He drank quite freely and related with great gusto his experience, invariably ending with his characteristic condemnation of the newcomer It seemed to relieve him of any unjust implication of sentiment, and Kentuck had the weaknesses of the nobler sex. When every- α body else had gone to bed, he walked down to the river, and whistled reflectingly. Then he walked up the gulch, past the cabin, still whistling with demonstrative unconcern At a large redwood tree he paused and retraced his steps, and again passed the cabin Halfway down to the river's bank he again paused, and then returned and knocked at the door. It was opened by Stumpy "How goes it?" said Kentuck, looking past Stumpy toward the candle-box 'All serene," replied Stumpy "Anything up?" "Nothing" There was a pause 30 —an embarrassing one—Stumpy still holding the door Then Kentuck had recourse to his finger, which he held up to Stumpy "Rastled with it,-the d-d little cuss," he said, and retired

The next day Cherokee Sal had such rude sepulture as Roaring Camp afforded. After her body had been committed to the hillside, there was a formal meeting of the camp to discuss what should be done with her infant. A resolution to adopt it was unanimous and enthusiastic But an animated discussion in regard to the manner and feasibility of providing for its wants at once sprung up. It was remarkable that the argument pattook of none of those fierce personalities with which discussions were usually conducted at Roaring Camp Tipton proposed that they should send the child to Red Dog—a distance of forty miles—where female attention could be procured. But the unlucky suggestion met with fierce and unanimous opposition. It was evident that no plan which entailed parting from their new acquisition would for a moment be entertained. "Besides," said Tom Ryder, "them fellows at Red Dog so would swap it, and ring in somebody else on us." A disbelief in the honesty of other camps prevailed at Roaring Camp as in other places

The introduction of a female nurse in the camp also met with objection. It was argued that no decent woman could be prevailed to accept Roaring Camp as her home, and the speaker urged that "they didn't want any more of the other kind. This unkind allusion to the defunct mother, harsh as it may seem, was the first spasm of propriety—the first symptom of the camp's regeneration 46 Stumpy advanced nothing Perhaps he felt a certain delicacy in interfering with the selection of a possible successor in office. But when questioned, he averred stoutly that he and "Jinny"-the mammal before alluded to-could manage to rear the child. There was something original, independent, and heroic about the plan that pleased the camp Stumpy was retained Certain articles were sent for to Sacramento "Mind," said the treasurer, as he pressed a bag of gold-dust into the expressman's hand, "the best that can be got-lace, 70 you know, and filigree-work and frills,-d-n the cost!

Strange to say, the child thrived Perhaps the invigorating climate of the mountain camp was compensation for material deficiencies. Nature took the foundling to her broader breast. In that rare atmosphere of the Sierra foothills—that an pungent with balsamic odor, that ethereal cordial, at once bracing and exhibitanting, he may have found food and nourishment, or a subtle chemistry that transmuted asses' milk to lime and phosphorus. Stumpy inclined to the belief that it was the latter and good nursing. "Me and that ass," he would say, 'has been father and mother to him! Don't you,' he would add, apostrophizing the helpless bundle before him, "never go back on us."

By the time he was a month old, the necessity of giving him a name became apparent. He had generally been known as "the Kid," Stumpy's boy," "the Cayote" (an allusion to his vocal powers) and even by Kentuck's endearing diminutive o. "the d—d little cuss". But these were felt to be vague and unsatisfactory, and were at last dismissed under another influence. Gamblers and adventures are generally superstitious, and Oak-hurst one day declared that the baby had brought "the luck" to Roaring Camp It was certain that of late they had been successful "Luck" was the name agreed upon, with the prefix of Tommy for greater convenience. No allusion was made to the mother, and the father was unknown "It's better," said the philosophical Oakhurst, "to take a fresh deal all round Call him Luck, and start him fair" A day was accordingly set apart for the christening What was meant by this ceremony the 10 reader may imagine, who has already gathered some idea of the reckless irreverence of Roaring Camp The master of ceremonies was one "Boston," a noted wag, and the occasion seemed to promise the greatest facetiousness. This ingenious satirist had spent two days in preparing a burlesque of the church service, with pointed local allusions. The choir was properly trained, and Sandy Tipton was to stand godfather. But after the procession had marched to the grove with music and banners, and the child had been deposited before a 20 mock alrar, Stumpy stepped before the expectant crowd "It ain't my style to spoil fun, boys," said the little man, stoutly, eveing the faces around him, "but it strikes me that this thing ain c exactly on the squar. It's playing it pretty low down on this yer baby to ring in fun on him that he ain't goin' to understand. And ef there's going to be any god-fathers round, I'd like to see who's got any better rights than me." A silence followed Stumpy's speech. To the credit of all humorists be it said that the first man to acknowledge its justice was the satirist, thus 30 stopped of his fun "But," said Stumpy, quickly, following up his advantage, "we're here for a christening, and well have it I proclaim you Thomas Luck, according to the laws of the United States and the State of California, so help me God." It was the first time that the name of the Deity had been uttered otherwise but profanely in the camp. The form of christening was perhaps even more ludicrous than the satirist had conceived, but strangely enough, nobody saw it and nobody laughed "Tommy' was christened as seriously as he 40 would have been under a Christian roof, and cried and was comforted in as orthodox fashion

And so the work of regeneration began in Roaring Camp. Almost imperceptibly a change came over the settlement. The cabin assigned to "Tommy Luck"—or "The Luck," as he was more frequently called—first showed signs of improvement. It was kept scrupulously clean and whitewashed. Then it was boarded, clothed and papered. The rosewood cradle-packed eightv miles by mule-had, in Stumpy's way of putting it "sorrer killed the rest of the furniture" So the rehabilita. tion of the cabin became a necessity. The men who were in the habit of lounging in at Stumpy's to see "how The Luck got on" seemed to appreciate the change, and in self-defense, the rival establishment of "Tuttle's grocery" bestirred itself, and imported a carpet and mirrors The reflections of the latter on the appearance of Roaring Camp tended to produce stricter habits of personal cleanliness Again Stumpy imposed a kind of quarantine upon those who aspired to the honor and privilege of holding "The Luck" It was a : cruel mortification to Kentuck-who, in the carelessness of a large nature and the habits of frontier life, had begun to regard all garments as a second cuticle, which tike a snake's, only sloughed off through decay-to be debarred this privilege from certain prudential reasons Yet such was the subtle influence of innovation that he thereafter appeared regularly every afternoon in a clean shirt, and face still shining from his ablutions Nor were moral and social sanitary laws neglected "Tommy," who was supposed to spend his whole existence in a persistent attempt to repose, must not be disturbed by noise. The shouting and yelling which had gained the camp its infelicitous title were not permitted within hearing distance of Stumpy's The men conversed in whispers, or smoked with Indian gravity Profanity was tacitly given up in these sacred precincts and throughout the camp a popular form of expletive known as "D-n the luck!" and "Curse the luck!" was abandoned, as having a new personal bearing. Vocal music was not interdicted, being supposed to have a soothing, tranquilizing quality, and one song, sung by 'Man-o'-War Jack,' an English sailor from Her Majesty's Australian colonies, was quite popular as a lullaby. It was a lugubrious recital of the exploits of "the Arethusa Seventy-four," in a muffled minor, ending with a prolonged dying fall at the burden of each verse, "On b-o-o-ard of the Arethusa" It was a fine sight to see Lack holding The Luck, rocking from side to side as if with the motion of a ship, and crooning forth this naval ditty. Either through the peculiar rocking of -Jack or the length of his song-it contained ninety stanzas, and was continued with conscientious deliberadesired effect. At such times the men would lie at full length under the trees, in the soft summer twilight, smoking their pipes and drinking in the melodious utterances. An indistinct idea that this was pastoral happiness pervaded the camp "This 'ere kind o' think," said the Cockney Simmons, meditatively reclining on his elbow, "is 'evingly" It reminded him of Greenwich

On the long summer days The Luck was usually cara ned to the gulch, from whence the golden store of Roaring Camp was taken There, on a blanket spread over pine boughs, he would lie while the men were working in the ditches below Latterly, there was a rude attempt to decorate this bower with flowers and sweet-smelling shrubs, and generally some one would bring him a cluster of wild honey-suckles, azaleas, or the painted blossoms of Las Mariposas. The men had suddenly awakened to the fact that there were beauty and significance in these trifles, which they had so long . trodden carelessly beneath their feet. A flake of glittering mica, a fragment of variegated quartz, a bright pebble from the bed of the creek, became beautiful to eyes thus cleared and strengthened, and were invariably put aside for "The Luck" It was wonderful how many treasures the woods and hillsides yielded that "would do tor Tommy" Surrounded by playthings such as never child out of fairyland had before, it is to be hoped that Tommy was content He appeared to be serenely happy, albeit there was an infantine gravity about him, a contemplative light in his round gray eyes, that sometimes worried Stumpy He was always tractable and quiet, and it is recorded that once, having crept beyond his corral"—a hedge of tessellated pine boughs, which surrounded his bed-he dropped over the bank on his head in the soft earth, and remained with his mottled legs in the air in that position for at least five minutes with unflinching gravity. He was extricated without a murmur I hesitate to record the many other instances of his sagacity, which rest, unfortunately, upon the statements of prejudiced friends. Some of them were not without a tinge of superstition 'I crep' up the bank just now," said Kentuck one day, in a breathless state of excitement, "and dern my skin if he wasn't a talking to a jaybird as was a-sittin on his lap. There they was, just as free and sociable as anything you please, a-jawin at each other just like two cherrybums" Howbeit, on his back, blinking him the birds sarig, the flowers bloomed Nature was his nurse and playfellow. The for him she would let slip between the leaves golden shafts of sunlight that fell just within his grasp; she would send wandering breezes to visit him with the balm of bay and resinous gums, to him the tall redwoods nodded familiarly and sleepily, the bumblebees buzzed, and the rooks cawed a slumbrous accompani-

Such was the golden summer of Roaring Camp They were "flush times"-and the Luck was with them The claims had yielded enormously. The camp was jealous 60 of its privileges and looked suspiciously on strangers. No encouragement was given to immigration, and, to make their seclusion more perfect, the land on either side of the mountain wall that surrounded the camp they duly pre-empted. This and a reputation for singular proficiency with the revolver, kept the reserve of Roaring Camp inviolate. The expressman—their only connecting link with the surrounding world-sometimes told wonderful stones of the camp. He would say, "They've a street up there in 'Roaring,' that would lay 70 over any street up there in Red Dog. They've got vines and flowers round their houses and they wash themselves twice a day. But they're mighty rough on strangers, and they worship an Ingin baby

With the prosperity of the camp came a desire for further improvement. It was proposed to build a hotel in the following spring, and to invite one or two decent families to reside there for the sake of "The Luck," who might perhaps profit by female companionship. The sacrifice that this concession to the sex cost these men, who were fiercely skeptical in regard to its general virtue and usefulness, can only be accounted for by their affection for Tommy. A few still held out But the resolve could not be carried into effect for three months, and the minority meekly yielded in the hope that something might turn up to prevent it. And it did

The winter of '51 will long be remembered in the foothills. The snow lay deep on the sierras, and every mountain creek became a river, and every river a lake. Each gorge and gulch was transformed into a tumultuous watercourse that descended the hillsides, tearing down giant trees and scattering its drift and debris along the plain Red Dog had been twice under water, and Roaring Camp had been forewarned "Water put the gold into them gulches," said Stumpy, "it's been here once and will be here again!" And that night the North Fork suddenly leaped over its banks, and swept up the triangular valley of Roaring Camp

In the confusion of rushing water, crashing trees, and crackling timber, and the darkness which seemed to flow with the water and blot out the fair valley, but in little could be done to collect the scattered camp. When the morning broke, the cabin of Stumpy nearest the river-bank was gone. Higher up the gulch they found the body of its unlucky owner, but the pride—the hope—the joy—the Luck—of Roaring Camp had disappeared. They were returning with sad hearts, when a shout from the bank recalled them.

It was a rehef-boat from down the river. They had picked up, they said, a man attu an manager hausted, about two miles below. Did anybody know them, and did they belong here?

It needed but a glance to show them Kentuck lying there, cruelly crushed and bruised, but still holding The Luck of Roaring Camp in his arms. As they bent over the strangely assorted pair, they saw that the child was cold and pulseless "He is dead," said one. Kentuck opened his eyes "Dead?" he repeated feebly. "Yes, my man, and you are dying too." A smile lit the eyes of the expiring Kentuck 'Dying!" he repeated, "he's ataking me with him—tell the boys I've got the Luck with me now", and the strong man, clinging to the frail babe as a drowning man is said to cling to a straw, drifted away into the shadowy river that flows forever to the unknown sea

Tennessee's Partner

do not think that we ever knew his real name. Our ignorance of it certainly never gave us any social inconvenience, for at Saudy Bar in 1854 most men were christened ancw. Sometimes these appellatives were derived from some distinctiveness of dress, as in the case of "Dungaree Jack," or from some peculiarity of habit, as shown in "Saleratus Bill," so called from an undue proportion of that chemical in his daily bread, or from some unlucky slip, as exhibited in The Iron Pirate," a mild, 10 inoffensive man, who carned that baleful title by his unfortunate mispronunciation of the term "iron pyrites" Perhaps this may have been the beginning of a rude heraldry, and I am constrained to think that it was be cause a man's real name in that day rested solely upon his own unsupported statement "Call yourself Clifford, do you?' said Boston, addressing a timid newcomer with infinite scorn, "hell is full of such Cliffords'." He then introduced the unfortunate man, whose name happened to be really Clifford, as "Jaybird Charley,"—an unhal lowed inspiration of the moment that clung to him a ever after

But to return to Tennessee's Partner, whom we never knew by any other than this relative title. That he had ever existed as a separate and distinct individuality we only learned later It seems that in 1853 he left Poker Flat to go to San Francisco, ostensibly to procure a wife He never got any farther than Stockton At that place he was attracted by a young person who waited upon the table at the hotel where he took his meals. One morning he said something to her which caused her to smile not unkindly, to somewhat coquettishly break a plate of toast over his upturned, serious, simple face, and to retreat to the kitchen. He followed her, and emerged a few moments later, covered with more toast and victory That day week they were married by a justice of the peace, and returned to Poker Flat I am aware that something more might be made of this episode, but I prefer to tell it as it was current at Sandy Bar,-in the gulches and bar-rooms,-where all sentiment was modified by a strong sense of humor

Of their married felicity but little is known, perhaps for the reason that Tennessee, then living with his partner, one day took occasion to say something to the bride on his own account, at which, it is said, she smiled not they went to house-keeping without the aid of a justice of the peace Tennessee's Partner took the loss of his wife simply and seriously, as was his fashion. But to everybody's surprise, when Tennessee one day returned from Marysville, without his partner's wife,—she having smiled and retreated with somebody else,—Tennessee's Partner was the first man to shake his hand and greet him with affection. The boys who had gathered in the canon to see the shooting were naturally indignant. Their indignation might have found vent in sarcasm but for a certain look in Tennessee's Partner's eyes that indicated a lack of humorous appreciation. In fact, he was a grave man, with a steady application to practical detail which was unpleasant in a difficulty Meanwhile a popular feeling against Tennessee had grown up on the Bar He was known to be a gambler, ne was suspected to be a thief In these suspicions Tenressee's Partner was equally compromised, his continued intimacy with Tennessee after the affair above quoted could only be accounted for on the hypothesis of a copartnership of crime At last Tennessee's guilt became dagrant. One day he overtook a stranger on his way to Red Dog The stranger afterward related that Tennessee beguiled the time with interesting anecdote and reminiscence, but illogically concluded the interview in the following words. "And now, young man, I'll trouble you tor your knife, your pistols, and your money You see vour weppings might get you into trouble at Red Dog, and your money's a temptation to the evilly disposed. I think you said your address was San Francisco I shall endeavor to call." It may be stated here that Tennessee had a fine flow of humor, which no business preoccupation could wholly subdue

This exploit was his last Red Dog and Sandy Bar made common cause against the highwayman Tennessee was hunted in very much the same fashion as his prototype, the grizzly. As the toils closed around him, he inade a desperate dash through the Bar, emptying his revolver at the crowd before the Aicade Saloon, and so on up Grizzly Canon, but at its farther extremity he was stopped by a small man on a gray horse. The men looked at each other a moment in silence. Both were fearless, both self-possessed and independent, and both types of a civilization that in the seventeenth century would

autetly

"Two bowers and an ace," said the stranger as quietly, showing two revolvers and a bowie-knife.

"That takes me," returned Tennessee; and, with this gambler's epigram, he threw away his useless pistol and rode back with his captor

It was a warm night The cool breeze which usually sprang up with the going down of the sun behind the chaparral-crested mountain was that evening withheld from Sandy Bar. The little canon was stifling with heated resinous odors, and the decaying driftwood on 60 the Bar sent forth faint sickening exhalations. The feverishness of day and its fierce passions still filled the camp Lights moved restlessly along the bank of the river, striking no paswering reflection from its tawny current Against the blackness of the pines the windows of the old loft above the express-office stood out staringly bright, and through their curtainless panes the loungers below could see the forms of those who were even then deciding the fate of Tennessee. And above all this, etched on the dark firmament, rose the Sierra, remote /u and passionless, crowned with remoter passionless stars

The trial of Tennessee was conducted as fairly as was consistent with a judge and jury who felt thems lvcs to some extent obliged to justify, in their verdict, the previous irregularities of arrest and indictment. The law of Sandy Bar was implacable, but not vengeful. The excitement and personal feeling of the chase were over, with Tennessee safe in their hands, they were ready to listen patiently to any defense, which they were already satisfied was insufficient. There being no doubt in their 80 own minds, they were willing to give the prisoner the benefit of any that might exist. Secure in the hypothesis that he ought to be hanged on general principles, they indulged him with more latitude of defense than his reckless hardthood seemed to ask. The Judge appeared to be more anxious than the prisoner, who, otherwise unconcerned, evidently took a grim pleasure in the responsibility he had created "I don't take any hand in this yer game," had been his invariable but good-humored reply to all questions The Judge-who was also 40 his captor-for a moment vaguely regretted that he had not shot him "on sight" that morning, but presently dismissed this human weakness as unworthy of the judicial mind Nevertheless, when there was a tap at the door, and it was said that Tennessee's Partner was there on behalf of the prisoner, he was admitted at once without question Perhaps the younger members of the jury, to whom the proceedings were becoming irksomely thoughtful, hailed him as a relief

For he was not, certainly, an imposing figure Short and stout, with a square face, sunburned into a preter-10 natural redness, clad in a loose duck "jumper" and trousers streaked and splashed with red soil, his aspect under any circumstances would have been quaint, and was now even ridiculous As he stooped to deposit at his feet a heavy carpetbag he was carrying, it became obvious, from partially developed legends and inscriptions, that the material with which his trousers had been patched had been originally intended for a less ambitious covering Yet he advanced with great gravity, and after shaking the hand of each person in the room with labored 20 cordiality, he wiped his serious perplexed face on a red bandana handkerchief, a shade lighter than his complexion, laid his powerful hand upon the table to steady himself, and thus addressed the Judge -

"I was passin' by," he began, by way of apology, "and I thought I'd just step in and see how things was gettin' on with Tennessee thar,—my pardner—It's a hot night I disremember any sich weather before on the Bar."

He paused a moment, but nobody volunteering any other meteorological recollection, he again had recourse 30 to his pocket-handkerchief, and for some moments mopped his face diligently

"Have you anything to say on behalf of the prisoner?" said the Judge finally

"Thet's it," said Tennessee's Partner, in a tone of relief "I come yar as Tennessee's pardner,—knowing him nigh on four year, off and on, wet and dry, in luck and out o' luck. His ways ain't aller my ways, but that ain't any p'ints in that young man, that ain't any liveliness as he's been up to, as I don't know. And you sez to me, sez you,—confidential-like, and between man and man,—sez you, 'Do you know anything in his behalf?' and I sez to you, sez I,—confidential-like, as between man and man,—'What should a man know of his pardner?'"

"Is this all you have to say?" asked the Judge impatiently, feeling, perhaps, that a dangerous sympathy of humor was beginning to humanize the court

"Thet's so," continued Tennessee's Partner. "It ain't for me to say anything agin' him. And now, what's the case? Here's Tennessee wants money, wants it bad, and does n't like to ask it of his old pardner. Well, what does Tennessee do? He lays for a stranger, and he fetches that stranger, and you lays for bim, and you fetches bim, and the honors is easy. And I put it to you, bein' a fa'r-minded man, and to you, gentlemen all, as fa'r-minded men, ef this is n't so."

"Prisoner," said the Judge, interrupting, "have you any questions to ask this man?"

"No! no!" continued Tennessee's Partner hastily "I play this yer hand alone To come down to the bedrock, its just this Tennessee, thar, has played it pietty rough and expensive-like on a stranger, and on this ver camp And now, what's the fair thing? Some would say more, some would say less Here's seventeen hundred dollars in coarse gold and a watch,—it's about all my pile,—and call it square!" And before a hand could be raised to prevent him he had emptied the contents of the carpetbag upon the table

For a moment his life was in jeopardy One or two men sprang to their feet, several hands groped for hidden weapons, and a suggestion to "throw him from the window" was only overridden by a gesture from the Judge Tennessee laughed And apparently oblivious of the excitement, Tennessee's Partner improved the opportunity to mop his face again with his handkerchief

When order was restored, and the man was made to understand by the use of forcible figures and rhetoric that Tennessee's offense could not be condoned by money, his face took a more serious and sanguinary hue, and those who were nearest to him noticed that his rough hand trembled slightly on the table. He hesitated a moment as he slowly returned the gold to the carpetbag, as if he had not yet entirely caught the elevated sense of justice which swayed the tribunal, and was perplexed with the belief that he had not offered enough. Then he turned to the Judge, and saying. "This yer is a lone hand, played alone, and without my pardner," he bowed to the jury and was about to withdraw, when the Judge called him back.—

"If you have anything to say to Tennessee, you had better say it now"

For the first time that evening the eyes of the prisoner and his strange advocate met. Tennessee smiled, showed his white teeth, and saying, "Euchred, old man" held out his hand. Tennessee's Partner took it in his own, and saying, "I just dropped in as I was passin' to see how things was gettin' on," let the hand passively fall, and adding that "it was a warm night," again mopped his face with his handkerchief, and without another word withdrew

The two men never again met each other alive For the unparalleled insult of a bribe offered to Judge Lynch—who, whether bigoted, weak, or narrow, was at least incorruptible—firmly fixed in the mind of that mythical personage any wavering determination of Tennessee's fate, and at the break of day he was marched, closely guarded, to meet it at the top of Marley's Hill

How he met it, how cool he was, how he refused to say anything, how perfect were the arrangements of the committee, were all duly reported, with the addition of a warning moral and example to all future evil-doers, in the "Red Dog Clarion," by its editor, who was present, and to whose vigorous English I cheerfully refer the reader But the beauty of that midsummer morning, the blessed amity of earth and air and sky, the awakened life of the free woods and hills, the joyous renewal and promise of Nature, and above all, the infinite serenity that thrilled through each, was not reported, as not being a part of the social lesson. And yet, when the weak and foolish deed was done, and a life, with its possibilities and responsibilities had passed out of the misshapen thing that dangled between earth and sky, the birds sang, the flowers bloomed, the sun shone, as cheerily as before, and possibly the "Red Dog Clarion" was right

Tennessee's Partner was not in the group that surrounded the ominous tree But as they turned to disperse, attention was drawn to the singular appearance of a motionless donkey-cart halted at the side of the road As they approached, they at once recognized the venerable "Jenny" and the two-wheeled cart as the property of Tennessee's Partner, used by him in carrying dirt from his claim, and a few paces distant the owner of the equipage himself, sitting under the buckeye-tree, wiping the perspiration from his glowing face. In answer to an inquiry, he said he had come for the body of the "diseased," "if it was all the same to the committee" He did n't wish to "hurry anything", he could 'wait" He was not working that day, and when the gentlemen were done with the "diseased," he would take him "Ef thar is any present," he added, in his simple, serious way, "as would care to jine in the fun'l, they kin come" Perhaps it was from a sense of humor, which I have already intimated was a feature of Sandy Bar,—perhaps it was from something even better than that, but two thirds of the loungers accepted the invitation at once.

It was noon when the body of Tennessee was delivered into the hands of his partner As the cart drew up to the fatal tree, we noticed that it contained a rough oblong box,-apparently made from a section of sluicing,-and half filled with bark and the tassels of pine The cart was further decorated with slips of willow and made fragrant with buckeye-blossoms. When the body was deposited in the box, Tennessee's Partner drew over it a piece of tarred canvas, and gravely mounting the 60 narrow seat in front, with his feet upon the shafts, urged the little donkey forward The equipage moved slowly on, at that decorous pace which was habitual with Jenny even under less solemn circumstances The men-half curiously, half jestingly, but all good-humoredly-strolled along beside the cart, some in advance, some a little in the rear of the homely catafalque. But whether from the narrowing of the 10ad or some present sense of decorum, as the cart passed on, the company fell to the rear in couples, keeping step, and otherwise assuming 70 the external show of a formal procession. Jack Folinsbee, who had at the outset played a funeral march in dumb show upon an imaginary trombone, desisted from a lack of sympathy and appreciation,-not having, perhaps, your true humorist's capacity to be content with the enjoyment of his own fun

The way led through Grizzly Canon, by this time clothed in funereal drapery and shadows. The redwoods, burying their moccasined feet in the red soil, stood in Indian file along the track, trailing an uncouth so benediction from their bending boughs upon the passing bier. A hare, surprised into helpless inactivity, sat upright and pulsating in the ferns by the roadside as the cortege went by Squirrels hastened to gain a secure outlook from higher boughs, and the blue-jays, spreading their wings, fluttered before them like outriders, until the outskirts of Sandy Bar were reached, and the solitary cabin of Tennessee's Partner.

Viewed under more favorable circumstances, it would not have been a cheerful place. The unpicturesque site, 50 the rude and unlovely outlines, the unsavory details, which distinguish the nest-building of the California miner were all here with the dreariness of decay superadded. A few paces from the cabin there was a rough inclosure which, in the brief days of Tennessee's Partner's matrimonial felicity, had been used as a garden, but was now overgrown with fern. As we approached it, we were surprised to find that what we had taken for a recent attempt at cultivation was the broken soil about an open grave.

The cart was halted before the inclosure, and rejecting the offers of assistance with the same air of simple self-reliance he had displayed throughout, Tennessee's 10 Partner lifted the rough coffin on his back, and deposited it unaided within the shallow grave. He then nailed down the board which served as a lid, and mounting the little mound of earth beside it, took off his hat and slowly mopped his face with his handkerchief. This the crowd feli was a preliminary to speech, and they disposed themselves variously on stumps and boulders and sat expectant.

"When a man,' began Tennessee's Partner slowly, "has been running free all day, what's the natural thing 20 for him to do? Why, to come home. And if he ain't in a condition to go home, what can his best friend do? Why, bring him home. And here's Tennessee has been running free, and we brings him home from his wandering" He paused and picked up a fragment of quartz, rubbed it thoughtfully on his sleeve, and went on 'It ain t the first time that I ve packed him on my back, as you see'd me now. It aim't the first time that I brought him to this ver cabin when he could not help himself, it ain't the first time that I and Jinny have 30 waited for him on you hill, and picked him up and so fetched him home, when he could n't speak and did n't know me. And now that it's the last time why '-he paused and rubbed the quartz gently on his sleeve-"you see it's sort of rough on his pardner. And now, gentlemen," he added abruptly, picking up his longhandled shovel, "the fun'ls over, and my thanks, and Tennessee's thanks, to you for your trouble."

Resisting any proffers of assistance, he began to fill in the grave turning his back upon the crowd, that after a few moments' hesitation gradually withdrew as they crossed the little ridge that hid Sandy Bar from view, some, looking back, thought they could see Tennessee's Partner, his work done, sitting upon the grave, his shovel between his knees, and his face buried in his red bandana handkerchief. But it was argued by others that you could n't tell his face from his handkerchief at that distance, and this point remained undecided.

In the reaction that followed the feverish excitement of that day, Tennessee's Partner was not forgotten A secret investigation had cleared him of any complicity in Tennessee's guilt, and left only a suspicion of his general samity. Sandy Bar made a point of calling on him, and proffering various uncouth but well-meant kindnesses. But from that day his rude health and great strength seemed visibly to decline, and when the rainy season fairly set in, and the tiny grass blades were beginning to peep from the rocky mound above. Tennessee's grave, he took to his bed

One night when the pines beside the cabin were swaying in the storm and trailing their slender fingers over the roof, and the roar and rush of the swollen river were heard below, Tennessee's Partner lifted his head from the pillow, saying. It is time to go for Tennessee, I must put Jinny in the cart,' and would have risen from his bed but for the restraint of all attendant Struggling, he still pursued his singular fancy "There, now, steady, Jinny-steady, old girl How dark it is' Look out for the ruts,-and look ou for him, too, old gal. Sometimes, you know, when hes blind drunk, he drops down right in the trail. Keep on straight up to the pine on the top of the hill. That I told you so'-that he is,-coming this way, too,-ali by hunself sober and his face a-shining Tennessee Pardner!

And so they met

Plan Language from Truthful James

Written in 1870 and published in September of the same year, this poem, known to many as "The Heathen Chinee," had a success comparable with that of The Luck Newspapers in every part of the country printed it, it was issued as a broadside, song versions were published, and several lithograph illustrations found ready buyers. According to George R. Stewait, "It was said that President Grant had intended to take up the Chinese problem in his message to Congress, but refrained after the poem had made the whole matter the occasion of hilarity."

Harte was rather distressed by the fame of the poem, partly because he felt that some people, failing to perceive its irony, used it to justify a prejudice against the Chinese, partly because he thought it was a bad poem. Today it seems a rather pleasant bit of nonsense, amusing because of the story it tells and because of the galloping meter. The metrics, Harte said, were influenced by Swinburne's Atalanta in Calydon.

Which I wish to remark,
And my language is plain,
That for ways that are dark
And for tricks that are vain.
The heathen Chinee is peculiar,
Which the same I would rise to explain

Ah Sin was his name,
And I shall not deny,
In regard to the same.
What the name might imply.
But his smile it was pensive and childlike,
As I frequent remarked to Bill Nye

It was August the third,
And quite soft was the skies,
Which it might be inferred
That Ah Sin was likewise.
Yet he played it that day upon William
And me in a way I despise

Which we had a small game,
And Ah Sin took a hand,
It was Euchre The same
He did not understand,
But he smiled as he sat by the table,
With the smile that was childlike and bland.

Yet the cards they were stocked
In a way that I grieve,
And my feelings were shocked
At the state of Nye's sleeve,
Which was stuffed full of aces and bowers,
And the same with intent to deceive

But the hands that were played By that heathen Chinee, And the points that he made, Were quite frightful to see,—
Till at last he put down a right bower
Which the same Nye had dealt unto me.

Then I looked up at Nye,
And he gazed upon me,
And he rose with a sigh,
And said "Can this be?
We are ruined by Chinese cheap labor," —
And he went for that heathen Chinese.

In the scene that ensued
I did not take a hand,
But the floor it was strewed
Like the leaves on the strand
With the cards that Ah Sin had been hiding,
In the game "he did not understand"

In his sleeves which were long,
He had twenty-four jacks,—
Which was coming it strong,
Yet I state but the facts,

50

And we found on his nails, which were taper, What is frequent in tapers,—that's wax

Which is why I remark, And my language is plain, That for ways that are dark
And for tricks that are vain,
The heathen Chinee is peculiar,—
Which the same I am free to maintain

Edward Eggleston

1837 · 1902

Edward Eggleston, "the first of the Hoosiers" in literature, wrote poxels which greatly increased the number of novel-readers in America and which had an important influence in turning the American novel toward realism

Eggleston was born in Vevay, Indiana, in 1837. He attended the public schools there but was prevented by ill health from going to college. Brought up a devout Methodist, he soon became a "circuit rider," preaching at ten widely separated stations on a four weeks' circuit in southern Indiana. His health broke under the strain of such strenuous employment, and he spent some nine years in Minnesota as Bible agent and pastor of small churches. He gave up the ministry in 1866 and turned to writing for religious papers, some of his most famous stories first appeared in such papers, and his writing always retained some of the marks of the Sunday School juvenile He made a reputation with The Hoosier Schoolmaster (1871), and added to that reputation with The Circuit Rider (1874), Roxy (1878), a story of married life in Indiana, and The Graysons (1888), in which young Lincoln appears briefly.

After 1870 Eggleston lived in the East, in Brooklyn and New York, and at Joshua's Rock on Lake George About 1890, or earlier, his interest shifted from fiction to history (the change was not radical, for he had always thought of his fiction as a kind of history), and he projected too ambitiously a comprehensive account of the growth of American civilization, two volumes of which he completed. As president of the American Historical Association in 1900, he expressed the view (less generally recognized then than now) that the best history is a record, not of a people's politics and wars, but of its culture. In a very real sense, his novels were such a history of the Indiana country in the early days.

His most authentic and valuable social record is probably found in The Circuit Rider. He knew the subject from his own experience. There are crudities of style, but perhaps such a narrative would not greatly profit by the finished treatment of a sophisticated artist. Eggleston saw the Middlewestern frontier of the early nineteenth century as a chaos of contrasts of corn-shuckings and camp meetings, of wild revels and wilder revivals, of highwaymen and preachers, of abandoned wickedness and austere piety. The dominating figure in this primitive society, he thought was the Methodist circuit rider. "More than anyone else," he said, "the early circuit preachers brought order out of this chaos. In no other class was the real heroic element so finely displayed."

The Circuit Rider

CHAPTER XX

The Circuit Rider tells the story of the spread of Methodism in southern Ohio in the early nineteenth century (the events of the book occur in the years from 1809 to 1812). The Methodists were opposed by the more conservative sects, particularly by the Presbyterians, who objected to the hysteria of camp meetings. They were opposed also by the lawless element in the outlying districts—the Methodist circuit rider had to fight as well as preach.

Morton Goodwin, the hero of Eggleston's story, so completely loses social caste by being converted to Methodism and becoming a circuit rider that Patty Lumsden, of a proud Virginia family (her mother, before migrating from Virginia to Ohio, had belonged to the Episcopal Church), breaks off their engagement. Toward the end of the book, Patty herself becomes a Methodist and the lovers, of course, are happily married.

Eggleston is at his best in his description of the Methodist meetings. One kind of meeting was the annual conference, where ministers assembled from all over the district and, after a season of religious devotion, received their appointments for the following year from the presiding bishop. The selection given here describes such a meeting, among those attending are Morton Goodwin, the fighting parson, and young Kike, his sick, pietistic friend. The author shows a warm admiration for these religious pioneers. Writing in 1878—to him a time of irreligion and sophistication—he speaks up for the simple virtues of the Western pioneer folk and for the religion of the early Methodists. Whatever its limitations as a novel, The Circuit Rider is an invaluable contribution to our religious and social history.

More than two years have passed since Morton made his great sacrifice You may see him now riding up to the Hickory Ridge Church—a "newed-log" country meetinghouse He is dressed in homespun clothes. At the risk of compromising him forever, I must confess that his coat is straight-breasted-shad-bellied as the profane call it-and his best hat a white one with a broad brim. The face is still fresh, despite the conflicts and hardships of one year's travel in the mountains of Eastern Kentucky, and the sickness and exposure of another year in the malar- 10 ious cane-brakes of Western Tennessee Perils of Indians, perils of floods, perils of alligators, perils of bad foods, perils of cold beds, perils of robbers, perils of rowdies, perils of fevers, and the weariness of five thousand miles of horseback riding in a year, with five or six hundred preachings in the same time, and the care of numberless scattered churches in the wilderness have conspired to give sedateness to his countenance. And yet there is a youthfulness about the sun-browned cheeks, and a lingering expression of that sort of humor which Western 10 people call "mischief" about the eyes, that match but grotesquely with white hat and shad-bellied coat

He has been a preacher almost ever since he became a Methodist How did he get his theological education? It used to be said that Methodist preachers were educated by the old ones telling the young ones all they knew, but besides this oral instruction Morton carried in his saddle-bags John Wesley's simple, solid sermons, Charles Wesley's hymns, and a Bible Having little of the theory and system of theology, he was free to take lessons in the 30 larger school of life and practical observation. For the rest, the free criticism to which he was subject from other preachers, and the contact with a few families of refinement, had obliterated his dialect. Naturally a gentleman at heart, he had, from the few stately gentlemen that he met quickly learned to be a gentleman in manners He is regarded as a young man of great promise by the older brethren, his clear voice is very charming, his strong and manly speech and his tender feeling are very inspiring, and on his two circuits he has reported extraor- 40 dinary revivals. Some of the old men sagely predict that "he's got bishop-timber in him," but no such ambitious dreams disturb his sleep. He has not "gone into a decline" on account of Patty A healthy nature will bear heavy blows. But there is a pain, somewhere—everywhere—in his being, when he thinks of the girl who stood just above him in the spelling-class, and who looked so divine when she was spinning her two dozen cuts a day. He does not like this regretful feeling. He prays to be forgiven for it. He acknowledges in class-meeting and in love-feast that he is too much like Lot's wife—he finds his heart prone to look back toward the objects he once loved. Often in riding through the stillness of a deep forest—and the primeval forest is to him the peculiar abode of the Almighty—his noble voice rings out fervently and even pathetically with that stanza.

² great sacrifice. The reference is to Morton's conversion to Methodism and the consequent loss of Pathy (see headnote) • 6 shad-bellied, slender and sloping away in the abdomen • 28 John Wesley (1703-1791), was the founder of Methodism in England (1738) • 28 Charles Wesley (1707-1788), English Methodist preacher and hymn writer, was one of John Wesley's brothers

"The dearest idol I have known,
Whate'er that idol be,
Help me to tear it from thy throne
And worship only Thee!"

No man can enjoy a joke with more zest than he, and none can tell a story more effectively in a generation of preachers who are all good story-tellers. He loves his work, its dangers and difficulties satisfy the ambition of his boyhood, and he has had no misgivings, except when once or twice he has revisited his patents in the Hissawachee Bottom. Then the longing to see Patty has seized him and he has been fain to hurry away, praying to be delivered from every snare of the enemy.

He is not the only man in a straight-breasted coat who is approaching the country meeting-house. It is conference-time, and the greetings are hearty and familiar. Everybody is glad to see everybody, and, after a year of separation, nobody can afford to stand on ceremony with anybody else. Morton has hardly alighted before half a dozen preachers have rushed up to him and taken him by the hand. A tall brother, with a grotesque twitch in his face, cries out.

"How do you do, Brother Goodwin? Glad to see the alligators haven't finished you!"

To which Morton returns a laughing reply, but suddenly he sees, standing back of the rest and waiting his turn, a young man with a solemn, sallow face, pinched by sickness and exposure, and bordered by the straight black hair that falls on each side of it. He wears over his clothes a blanket with arm-holes cut through, and seems to be perpetually awaiting an ague-chill. Seeing him, Morton pushes the rest aside, and catches the wan hand in both of his own with a cry "Kike, God bless you! How are you, dear old fellow? You look sick"

Kike smiled faintly, and Morton threw his arm over his shoulder and looked in his face "I am sick, Mort Cast down, but not destroyed, you know I hope I am si ready to be offered up."

"Not a bit of it You've got to get better Offered up/ Why, you aren't fit to offer to an alligator Where are you staying?"

'Out there" Kike pointed to the tents of a camp meeting barely visible through the trees. The people in the neighborhood of the Hickory Ridge Church, being unable to entertain the Conference in their homes, had resorted to the device of getting up a camp-meeting lt was easier to take care of the preachers out of doors than a in Morton shook his head as he walked with Kike to the thin canvas tent under which he had been assigned to sleep. The white spot on the end of Kike's nose and the blue lines under his finger-nails told plainly of the on-coming chill, and Morton hurried away to find some better shelter for him than under this thin sheet But this was hard to do. The few brethren in the neighbor hood had already filled their cabins full of guests, mostly in infirm health, and Kike, being one of the younger men, renowned only for his piety and his revivals, had not been thought of for a place elsewhere than on the camp-ground Finding it impossible to get a more comfortable resting place for his friend, Morton turned to seek for a physician. The only doctor in the neighbor hood was a Presbyterian minister, retired from the min istry on account of his impaired health. To him Morton went to ask for medicine for Kike

"Dr Morgan, there is a preacher sick down at the camp-ground, said Morton, "and—"

"And you want me to see him," said the doctor in an alert, anticipative fashion, seizing his "pill-bags" and donning his hat

When the two rode up to the tent in which Kike was lodged they found a prayer-meeting of a very exciting kind going on in the tent adjoining. There were cries and groans and amens and hallelujahs commingled in a way.

6 cuts, lengths of yarn • 7 class-meeting love-feast, meetings in which the Methodists told their "experiences" • 8 Lot's wife laoked back upon Sodoni and Gomorrah and became a pillar of solt See Genesis 19 26 • 50 Cast destroyed, verbatim from II Corinthians 4.9

quite intelligible to the experienced ear of Morton, but

'A bad place for a sick man, sir," he said to Morton, with great positiveness.

T know it is, doctor," said Morton; "and I've done my best to get him out of it, but I cannot. See how thin this tent-cover is."

'And the malaria of these woods is awful Camp meetings, sir, are always bad. And this fuss is enough to drive a patient crazy."

Morron thought the doctor prejudiced, but he said nothing. They had now reached the corner of the tent where Kike lay on a straw pallet, holding his hands to his head. The noise from the prayer-meeting was more than his weary brain would bear.

"Can you sit on my horse?" said the doctor, promptly proceeding to Lift Kike without even explaining to hira who he was, or where he proposed to take him

Morton helped to place Kike in the saddle but the poor fellow was shaking so that he could not sit there Morton then brought out Dolly—she was all his own now—and took the slight form of Kike in his arms, he riding on the croup, and the sick man in the saddle

"Where shall I ride to, doctor?"

"To my house," said the doctor, mounting his own horse and spurring off to have a bed made ready for Kike

As Morton rode up to the doctor's gate, the shaking kike roused a little and said, "She's the same fine old Dolly, Mort."

"A little more sober The long rides in the cane-brakes, and the responsibility of the Methodist itinerancy, have given her the gravity that belongs to the ministry."

Such a bed as Kike found in Dr Morgan's house! After the rude bear-skins upon which he had languished in the backwoods cabins, after the musty feather-beds in freezing lofts, and the pallets of leaves upon which he had shivered and scorched and fought fleas and mosquitoes, this clean white bed was like a foretaste of heaven. But Kike was almost too sick to be grateful. The poor frame had been kept up by will so long, that now that he was in a good bed and had Morton he felt that he could afford to be sick. What had been ague settled into that wearisome disease called bilious fever. Morton staid by him nearly all of the time, looking into the conference now and then to see the venerable Asbury in the chair, listening to a grand speech from Me-

Kendree, attending on the third day of the session, when, with the others who had been preaching two years on probation, he was called forward to answer the "questions" always propounded to "Candidates for admission to the conference" Kike only was missing from the list of those who were to have heard the bishop's exhortations, full of martial fire, and to have answered his questions in regard to their spiritual state. For above all gifts of speech or depths of learning, or acuteness of reasoning, the early Methodists esteemed devout affections, and no man was of account for the ministry who was not "groaning to be made perfect in this life." The question stands in the discipline vet, but very many young men who assent to it groan after nothing so much as a city 60 church with full galleries.

Morton Goodwin.

The strange mystery in which appointments were involved could not but pique curiosity. Morton having had one year of mountains, and one year of cane-brakes, had come to wish for one year of a little more comfort, and a little better support. There is a romance about going threadbare and tattered in a good cause, but even the romance gets threadbare and tattered if it last too long, and one wishes for a little sober reality of warm clothes to relieve a romance, charming enough in itself, but dull when it grows monotonous.

The awful hour of appointments came on at last. The brave-hearted men sat down before the bishop, and before God, not knowing what was to be their fate. Morton could not guess where he was going. A miasmatic cane-to brake, or a deadly cypress swamp, might be his doom, or he might—but no, he would not hope that his lot might fall in Ohio. He was a young man, and a young man must take his chances. Morton found himself more anxious about Kike than about himself. Where would the bishop send the invalid? With Kike it might be a matter of life and death, and Kike would not hear to being left withour work. He meant, he said, to cease at once to work and live.

The brethren, still in sublime ignorance of their des-20 tiny, sang fervently that fiery hymn of Charles Wesley's

> "Jesus, the name high over all, In hell or earth or sky Angels and men before him fall, And devils fear and fly

"O that the world might taste and see, The riches of his grace, The arms of love that compass me Would all mankind embrace"

And when they reached the last stanzas there was the ring of soldiers ready for battle in their martial voices. That some of them would die from exposure, malaria, or accident during the next year was probable. Tears came to their eyes, and they involuntarily began to grasp the hands of those who stood next them as they approached the climax of the hymn, which the bishop read impressively, two lines at a time, for them to sing

"His only righteousness I show, His saving truth proclaim, 'Tis all my business here below To cry, 'Behold the Lamb'

"Happy if with my latest breath I may but gasp his name, Preach him to all and cry in death, 'Behold, behold the Lamb!'"

Then, with suffused eyes, they resumed their seats, and the venerable Asbury, with calmness and with a voice faltering with age, made them a brief address, tender and sympathetic at first, earnest as he proceeded, and full of ardor and courage at the close

"When the British Admiralty," he said, "wanted some : man to take Quebec they began with the oldest General first, asking him 'General, will you go and take Quebec?' To which he made reply, 'It is a very difficult enterprise You may stand aside, they said. One after another the Generals answered that they would, in some more or less indefinite manner, until the youngest man on the list was reached 'General Wolfe,' they said, 'will you go and take Quebec? 'I'll do it or die,' he replied." Here the bishop paused, looked round about upon them, and added, with a voice full of emotion, "He went, and did both We send you first to take the country allotted to you We went only men who are determined to do it or die! Some of you, dear brethren, will do both. If you fall, let us hear that you fell like Methodist preachers at your post face to the foe, and the shout of victory on your lips

The effect of this speech was beyond description. There were sobs, and cries of "Amen," "God grant it "Hallclutah!" from every part of the old log church. Every man was ready for the hardest place, if he must Gravely, as one who trembles at his responsibility, the bishop brought out his list. No man looked any more upon his fellow. Every one kept his eyes fixed upon the paper from which the bishop read the appointments until his own name was reached. Some showed pleasure when their names were called, some could not conceal a look of pain. When the reading had proceeded half was down the list, Morton heard, with a little start, the words slowly enounced as the bishop's eyes fell on him.

"Jenkinsville Circuit—Morton Goodwin"

Well, at least Jenkinsville was in Ohio But it was in the wickedest part of Ohio Morton half suspected that he was indebted to his muscle, his courage, and his quick wit for the appointment. The rowdies of Jenkinsville

The bishop had not dared to entrust a circuit to a man so sick as Kike was. He had, therefore, sent him as a second man" or "junior preacher" on a circuit in the wilderness of Michigan.

The last appointment having been announced, a simple benediction closed the services, and the brethren who had foregone houses and homes and fathers and mothers and wives and children for the kingdom of heaven's sake saddled their horses, called, one by one, at Dr Morgan's to say a brotherly "God bless you!" to the sick Kike, and rode away, each in his own direction, and all with a self-immolation to the cause rarely seen since the Middle-Age

They rode away, all but Kike, languishing yet with 20 fever, and Morton watching by his side

George Washington Cable

1844 · 1925

George Washington Cable's father came from an old slaveholding family in Virginia, his mother was a native of New England and a strict Puritan. There were thus conflicting strains in his inheritance, the influences of which can be traced in his life and writings.

Cable was born in New Orleans, where his father was a not too successful merchant. From the age of fourteen George helped, by miscellaneous jobs, to support the family left destitute by the death of his father. During the Civil War he served with a troop of Mississippi cavalry and was severely wounded. For more than ten vears after the war, he was clerk and bookkeeper for a cotton firm in New Orleans. During the clerking and bookkeeping years, however, he read much, delved into the old French and Spanish records of New Orleans, and 'because, as he said, it seemed a pity that such rich materials should go to waste) began to write. His first story, "'Sieur George," appeared in Scribner's Monthly in 1873. Other stories of romantic New Orleans followed and were collected in Old Creole Days (1879). He worked the Creole vein further in The Grandissimes (1880) and in Madame Delphine (1881) Despite the success of these and other similar books, Cable—his Puritan inheritance asserting itself—turned reformer, and in The Silent South (1885) zealously advocated reforms in racial relations. The book made him so unpopular in the South that he moved to Northampton, Massachusetts. His later works are of interest chiefly to the social historian.

Cable deserves to be remembered as the literary discoverer of New Orleans and as the facile recorder of his discoveries there. Like many other writers of local color fiction, he was a romantic realist and was inclined to play up picturesqueness and the moral ending the established standards of the genre seem to have required that a story be at once edifying and exotic. If Cable's edification is sometimes a little forced, his exoticism is at least based on fact. The New Orleans of the early nineteenth century was a colorful melange of races, and therefore of languages and of mores. With a sensitive, skillful talent, Cable caught, and preserved in several of his early pieces, this extraordinary life and color. At his best, he has, as Professor Pattee has said, a "Gallic brilliance" unique in American literature. The question of the complete accuracy of Cable's pictures may well be left to the historical specialist, for the pictures themselves have a verisimilitude quite sufficient for the purposes of good literature

Belles Demoiselles Plantation

A Creole is a white person who is descended from the French or Spanish settlers of Louisiana and the Gulf States, and who preserves their characteristic speech and culture. "The title [of Creole]," to quote Cable's own definition, "... came early to include any native of French or Spanish descent whose non-alliance with the slave race entitled him to social rank

"Belles Demoiselles Plantation" is discursive and almost platless (the dénouement seems reminiscent of "The Fall of the House of Usher") and the conclusion is too sentimental for modern taste. But the story is excellent in its rendering of locale and manners. With many deft touches Cable conveys the hauteur, the grace, the French gaiety of his Creole characters.

First printed in Scribner's Monthly, April 1874, the story was reprinted in Old Creole Days, 1879.

The original grantee was Count——, assume the name to be De Charleu, the old Creoles never forgive a public mention. He was the French king's commissary One day, called to France to explain the lucky accident of the commissariat having burned down with his account-books inside, he left his wife, a Choctaw Comptesse, behind.

Arrived at court, his excuses were accepted, and that tract granted him where afterwards stood Belles Demoiselles Plantation. A man cannot remember every thing In a fit of forgetfulness he married a French gentlewoman, rich and beautiful, and 'brought her out.' However, 'All's well that ends well', a famine had been in the colony, and the Choctaw Comptesse had starved, leaving nought but a half-caste orphan family lurking on the edge of the settlement, bearing our French gentlewoman's own new name, and being mentioned in Monsieur's will

And the new Comptesse—she tarried but a twelvemonth, left Monsieur a lovely son, and departed, led out 2 of this vain world by the swamp-fever

From this son sprang the proud Creole family of De Charleu It rose straight up, up, up, generation after generation, tall, branchless, slender, palm-like, and finally in the time of which I am to tell, flowered with all the rare beauty of a century-plant, in Artemise, Innocente, Felicité, the twins Marie and Martha, Leontine and little Septima, the seven beautiful daughters for whom their home had been fitly named Belles Demoiselles

The Count's grant had once been a long Pointe, round's which the Mississippi used to whirl, and seethe, and foam, that it was horrid to behold. Big whirlpools would open and wheel about in the savage eddies under the low bank and close up again, and others open, and spin, and disappear. Great circles of muddy surface would boil up from hundreds of feet below, and gloss over, and seem to float away,—sink, come back again under water, and with only a soft hiss surge up again, and again drift off,

Belles Demoiselles, beautiful young ladies • 12 brought . . . out, brought her from France to Louisiana • 14 starved, died of starvation (the etymological meaning of the word is 'to die'') and vanish. Every few minutes the loamy bank would tip down a great load of earth upon its besieger, and fall back a foot,—sometimes a yard,—and the writhing river would press after, until at last the Pointe was quite swallowed up, and the great river glided by in a majestic curve, and asked no more; the bank stood fast, the caving became a forgotten misfortune, and the diminished grant was a long, sweeping, willowy bend, rustling with miles of sugarcane

Coming up the Mississippi in the sailing craft of those early days, about the time one first could descry the white spires of the old St. Louis Cathedral, you would be pretty sure to spy, just over to your right under the levee, Belles Demoiselles Mansion, with its broad veranda and red painted cypress roof, peering over the embankment, like a bird in the nest, half hid by the avenue of willows which one of the departed De Charleus,—he that married a Marot,—had planted on the levee's crown

The house stood unusually near the river, facing eastward, and standing foursquare, with an immense veranda about its sides, and a flight of steps in front spreading broadly downward, as we open arms to a child. From the veranda nine miles of river were seen, and in their compass, near at hand, the shady garden full of rare and beautiful flowers, farther away broad fields of cane and rice, and the distant quarters of the slaves, and on the horizon everywhere a dark belt of cypress forest

The master was old Colonel De Charleu,-Jean Albert Henri Joseph De Charleu-Marot, and 'Colonel' by the s grace of the first American governor Monsieur,-he would not speak to any one who called him 'Colonel,'was a hoary-headed patriarch. His step was firm, his form erect, his intellect strong and clear, his countenance classic, serene, dignified, commanding, his manners courtly, his voice musical,—fascinating He had had his vices,-all his life, but had borne them, as his race do, with a serenity of conscience and a cleanness of mouth that left no outward blemish on the surface of the gentleman He had gambled in Royal Street, drunk hard in Orleans Street, run his adversary through in the duelling-ground at Slaughter-house Point, and danced and quarrelled at the St Philippe Street Theatre quadroon balls Even now, with all his courtesy and bounty, and a hospitality which seemed to be entertaining angels, he was bitter-proud and penurious, and deep down in his hard-finished heart loved nothing but himself, his name, and his motherless children But these!—their ravishing beauty was all but excuse enough for the unbounded idolatry of their father. Against these seven goddesses he never rebelled. Had they even required him to described to describe the described by the describ

I can hardly say

Old De Carlos was his extremely distant relative on the Choctaw side. With this single exception, the narrow thread-like line of descent from the Indian wife, diminished to a mere strand by injudicious alliances, and deaths in the gutters of old New Orleans, was extinct. The name, by Spanish contact, had become De Carlos, but this one surviving bearer of it was known to all, and known only, as Injin Charlie.

One thing I never knew a Creole to do He will not utterly go back on the ties of blood, no matter what sort of knots those ties may be For one reason, he is never ashamed of his or his father's sins, and for another.—he will tell you—he is 'all heart'

So the different heirs of the De Charleu estate had always strictly regarded the rights and interests of the De Carloses, especially their ownership of a block of dilapidated buildings in a part of the city, which had once been very poor property, but was beginning to be valuable 70 This block had much more than maintained the last De Carlos through a long and lazy lifetime, and, as his household consisted only of himself, and an aged and crippled Negress, the inference was irresistible that he had money. Old Charlie, though by alias an 'Injin,' was plainly a dark white man, about as old as Colonel De Charleu, sunk in the bliss of deep ignorance, shrewd, deaf, and, by repute at least, unmerciful

The Colonel and he always conversed in English This rare accomplishment, which the former had learned from 80 his Scotch wife,—the latter from up-river traders,—they found an admirable medium of communication, answering, better than French could, a similar purpose to that of the stick which we fasten to the bit of one horse and breast-gear of another, whereby each keeps his distance. Once in a while, too, by way of jest, English found its way among the ladies of Belles Demoiselles, always signifying that their sire was about to have business with old Charlie

¹² St Louis Cathedral in New Orleans was completed in 1794 • 30 first governor Louisiana was acquired from France in 1803

Now a long-standing wish to buy out Charlie troubled the Colonel. He had no desire to oust him unfairly, he was proud of being always fair, yet he did long to engross the whole estate under one title. Out of his luxurious idleness he had conceived this desire, and thought little of so slight an obstacle as being already somewhat in debt to old Charlie for money borrowed, and for which Belles Demoiselles was, of course, good, ten times over Lots, buildings, rents, all, might as well be his, he thought, to 10 give, keep, or destroy 'Had he but the old man's heritage. Ah! he might bring that into existence which his belles demoiselles had been begging for, "since many years;" a home,-and such a home,-in the gay city. Here he should tear down this row of cottages, and make his garden wall, there that long rope-walk should give place to vine-covered arbors, the bakery yonder should make way for a costly conservatory, that wine warehouse should come down, and the mansion go up. It should be the finest in the state. Men should never pass it, but they 20 should say—"the palace of the De Charleus, a family of grand descent, a people of elegance and bounty, a line as old as France, a fine old man, and seven daughters as beautiful as happy, whoever dare attempt to marry there must leave his own name behind him!"

The house should be of stones fitly set, brought down in ships from the land of "les Yankees," and it should have an airy belvedere, with a gilded image tip-toeing and shining on its peak, and from it you should see, far across the gleaming folds of the river, the red roof of Belles Demoiselles, the country-seat. At the big stone gate there should be a porter's lodge, and it should be a privilege even to see the ground.

Truly they were a family fine enough, and fancy-free enough to have fine wishes, yet happy enough where they were, to have had no wish but to live there always

To those, who, by whatever fortune, wandered into the garden of Belles Demoiselles some summer afternoon as the sky was reddening towards evening, it was lovely to see the family gathered out upon the tile pavement at 40 the foot of the broad front steps, gayly chatting and jesting, with that ripple of laughter that comes so pleasingly from a bevy of girls. The father would be found seated in their midst, the centre of attention and compliment, witness, arbiter, umpire, critic, by his beautiful children's unanimous appointment, but the single vassal, too, of seven absolute sovereigns.

Now they would draw their chairs near together in eager discussion of some new step in the dance, or the adjustment of some rich adornment. Now they would start about him with excited comments to see the eldest 50 fix a bunch of violets in his button-hole. Now the twins would move down a walk after some unusual flower, and be greeted on their return with the high pitched notes of delighted feminine surprise.

As evening came on they would draw more quietly about their paternal centre. Often their chairs were forsaken, and they grouped themselves on the lower steps, one above another, and surrendered themselves to the tender influences of the approaching night. At such an hour the passer on the river, already attracted by the dark figures of the broad-roofed mansion, and its woody garden standing against the glowing sunset, would hear the voices of the hidden group rise from the spot in the soft harmonies of an evening song, swelling clearer and clearer as the thrill of music warmed them into feeling and presently joined by the deeper tones of the father's voice, then, as the daylight passed quite away, all would be still and he would know that the beautiful home had gathered its nestlings under its wings.

And yet, for mere vagary, it pleased them not to be π pleased.

'Artı' called one sister to another in the broad hall one morning,—mock amazement in her distended eyes,—'something is goin' to took place'.'

'Comm-e-n-t?'—long-drawn perplexity.

'Papa is goin' to town!'

The news passed up stairs

'Inno!'—one to another meeting in a doorway,—'some thing is goin' to took place!'

'Qu'est-ce-que c'est'-vain attempt at gruffness

'Papa is goin' to town!'

The unusual tidings were true. It was afternoon of the same day that the Colonel tossed his horse's bridle to his groom, and stepped up to old Charlie, who was sitting on his bench under a China-tree, his head, as was his fashion, bound in a Madras handkerchief. The 'old man' was plainly under the effect of spirits, and smiled a deferential salutation without trusting himself to his feet

De house! What you ask for it?'

I don't believe,' said Charlie.

'I'll give you ten thousand dollah for it'

Ten t'ousand dollah for dis house? Oh, no, dat is no price. He is blame good old house,—dat old house. Old Charlie and the Colonel never swore in presence of each other.) 'Forty years dat old house didn't had to be paint! I easy can get fifty t'ousand dollah for dat old house.'

'What will you take?'

'Oh! I got enough already,-half drunk now.

'What will you take for the 'ouse'

'You want to buy her?'

'I don't know,'—(shrug),—'maybe,—if you sell it cheap.'

'She's a bully old house.'

There was a long silence. By and by old Charlie commenced—

'Old Injin Charlie is a low-down dog.'

C'est vras, our" retorted the Colonel in an undertone.

'He's got In in blood in him'

The Colonel nodded assent

But he's got some blame good blood, too, ain't it?'

The Colonel nodded impatiently

'Bien.' Old Charlie's Injin blood says, "sell de house, Charlie, you blame old fool!" Mair, old Charlie's good blood says, 'Charlie' if you sell dat old house, Charlie, you low-down old dog, Charlie, what de Compte De Charleu make for you grace-granmuzzer, de dev' can eat 60 you, Charlie, I don't care'

'But you'll sell it anyhow, won't you, old man?'

'No!' And the no rumbled off in muttered oaths like thunder out on the Gulf. The incensed old Colonel wheeled and started off.

'Curl' (Colonel) said Charlie, standing up unsteadily The planter turned with an inquiring frown

I'll trade with you!' said Charlie

The Colonel was tempted ''Ow'l you trade?' he asked 'My house for yours!'

The old Colonel turned pale with anger He walked very quickly back, and came close up to his kinsman

'Charlie!' he said

'Injin Charlie,'-with a tipsy nod

But by this time self-control was returning. Sell Belles Demoiselles to you?' he said in a high key, and then laughed 'Ho, ho, ho!' and rode away

A cloud, but not a dark one, overshadowed the spirits of Belles Demoiselles' plantation. The old master, whose beaming presence had always made him a shining Saturn, spinning and sparkling within the bright circle of his daughters, fell into musing fits, started out of frowning reveries, walked often by himself, and heard business from his overseer fretfully

No wonder The daughters knew his closeness in trade, and attributed to it his failure to negotiate for the Old Charlie buildings,-so to call them They began to depreciate Belles Demoiselles. If a north wind blew, it was too cold to ride. If a shower had fallen, it was too muddy to drive. In the morning the garden was wet. In the evening the grasshopper was a burden Ennui was turned into capital, every headache was interpreted a premonition of ague, and when the native exuberance of a flock of ladies without a want or a care burst out in laughter in the father's face, they spread their French 10 eyes, rolled up their little hands, and with rigid wrists and mock vehemence vowed and vowed again that they only laughed at their misery, and should pine to death unless they could move to the sweet city 'Oh! the theatre! Oh! Orleans Street! Oh! the masquerade! the Place d'Armes! the ball!' and they would call upon Heaven with French irreverence, and fall into each other's arms, and whirl down the hall singing a waltz, end with a grand collision and fall, and, their eyes streaming merriment, lay the blame on the slippery floor, that 20 would some day be the death of the whole seven

Three times more the fond father, thus goaded, managed, by accident,—business accident,—to see old Charlie and increase his offer, but in vain. He finally went to him formally

'Eh' said the deaf and distant relative. 'For what you want him, eh'. Why you don't stay where you halways be 'appy'. Dis is a blame old rat-hole,—good for old Injin Charlie,—da's all. Why you don't stay where you be halways 'appy'. Why you don't buy somewheres else'.'

'That's none of your business,' snapped the planter Truth was, his reasons were unsatisfactory even to himself

A sullen silence tollowed Then Charlie spoke

'Well, now, look here, I sell you old Charlie's house' 'Bien!' and the whole block,' said the Colonel

'Hold on,' said Charlie 'I sell you de 'ouse and de block Den I go and git drunk, and go to sleep, de dev' comes along and says, "Charlie' old Charlie, you blame low-down old dog, wake up' What you doin here? 'Til give you forty thousand dollars,' said the Colonel 'For de 'ouse?'

'For all.'

The deaf man shook his head.

'Forty-five' said the Colonel

'What a lie? For what you tell me "What a lie?' g I don't tell you no lie.'

'Non, non! I give you forty-five!' shouted the Colonel Charlie shook his head again

'Fifty!'

He shook it again.

The figures rose and rose to-

'Seventy-five!'

The answer was an invitation to go away and let the owner alone, as he was, in certain specified respects the vilest of living creatures, and no company for a fine gentyman

The 'fine gentyman' longed to blaspheme,—but be fore old Charlie'—in the name of pride, how could he' He mounted and started away

'Tell you what I'll make wid you,' said Charlie

The other, guessing aright turned back without dis mounting, smiling

'How much Belles Demoiselles hoes me now?' asked the deaf one

'One hundred and eighty thousand dollars' said the Colonel, firmly

'Yass,' said Charlie I don't want Belles Demoiselles The old Colonel's quiet laugh intimated it made no difference either way

But me, 'continued Charlie, 'me,—I m got le Compte De Charleu's blood in me, any'ow,—a litt' bit, any ow ain't it?'

The Colonel nodded that it was

Bien' If I go out of dis place and don't go to Belles Demoiselles, de peoples will say,—dey will say, "Old Charlie he been all doze time tell a blame lie! He ain't no kin to his old grace-gran-muzzer, not a blame bit! He don't got nary drop of De Charleu blood to save his blame low-down old Injin soul!" No, sare! What I want wid money, den? No, sare! My place for yours!

He turned to go into the house, just too soon to see the Colonel make an ugly whisk at him with his riding whip Then the Colonel, too, moved off

⁵ grasshopper . burden Compare Ecclesiastes 12.5 and the grasshopper shall be a burden, and desire shall fail.

Two or three times over, as he ambled homeward, laughter broke through his annoyance, as he recalled old Charlie's family pride and the presumption of his offer Yet each time he could but think better of—not the offer to swap, but the preposterous ancestral loyalty. It was so much better than he could have expected from his low-down' relative, and not unlike his own whim withal—the proposition which went with it was forgiven

This last defeat bore so harshly on the master of Belles Demoiselles, that the daughters, reading chagrin in his face, began to repent. They loved their father as daughters can, and when they saw their pretended dejection harassing him seriously they restrained their complaints, displayed more than ordinary tenderness, and heroically and ostentatiously concluded there was no place like Belles Demoiselles But the new mood touched him more than the old, and only refined his discontent. Here was a man, rich without the care of riches, free from any real trouble, happiness as native to his house as perfume to his garden, deliberately, as it were with premeditated malice, taking joy by the shoulder and bidding her be gone to town, whither he might easily have followed, only that the very same ancestral nonsense that kept lnin Charlie from selling the old place for twice its value prevented him from choosing any other spot for a city home

But by and by the charm of nature and the merry hearts around him prevailed, the fit of exalted sulks passed off, and after a while the year flared up at Christmas, flickered, and went out

New Year came and passed, the beautiful garden of Belles Demoiselles put on its spring attire; the seven fair sisters moved from rose to rose, the cloud of discontent had warmed into invisible vapor in the rich sunlight of family affection, and on the common memory the only scar of last year's wound was old Charlie's sheer impertinence in crossing the caprice of the De Charleus The cup of gladness seemed to fill with the filling of the river

How high that river was! Its tremendous current rolled and tumbled and spun along, hustling the long funeral flotillas of drift,—and how near shore it came! Men were out day and night, watching the levee On windy nights even the old Colonel took part, and grew light-hearted with occupation and excitement, as every minute the river threw a white arm over the levee's top, as though it would vault over. But all held fast, and, as the summer drifted in, the water sunk down into its banks and looked quite incapable of harm

On a summer afternoon of uncommon mildness, old 50 Colonel Jean Albert Henri Joseph De Charleu-Marot, being in a mood for revery, slipped the custody of his feminine rulers and sought the crown of the levee, where it was his wont to promenade. Presently he sat upon a stone bench,-a favorite seat. Before him lay his broadspread fields, near by, his lordly mansion; and being still, -perhaps by female contact,-somewhat sentimental, he fell to musing on his past. It was hardly worthy to be proud of All its morning was reddened with mad frolic, and far toward the meridian it was marred with elegant 60 rioting Pride had kept him well-nigh uscless, and despised the honors won by valor, gaming had dimmed prosperity, death had taken his heavenly wife, voluptuous ease had mortgaged his lands, and yet his house still stood, his sweet-smelling fields were still fruitful, his name was fame enough, and yonder and yonder, among the trees and flowers, like angels walking in Eden, were the seven goddesses of his only worship

Just then a slight sound behind him brought him to his feet. He cast his eyes anxiously to the outer edge 70 of the little strip of bank between the levee's base and the river. There was nothing visible. He paused, with his ear toward the water, his face full of frightened expectation. Ha! There came a single plashing sound, like some great beast slipping into the river, and little waves in a wide semi-circle came out from under the bank and spread over the water!

'My God'

He plunged down the levee and bounded through the low weeds to the edge of the bank. It was sheer, and 80 the water about four feet below. He did not stand quite on the edge, but fell upon his knees a couple of yards away, wringing his hands, moaning and weeping, and staring through his watery eyes at a fine, long crevice just discernible under the matted grass, and curving outward on either hand toward the river.

'My God!' he sobbed aloud, 'my God!' and even while he called, his God answered the tough Bermuda grass stretched and snapped, the crevice slowly became a gape, and softly, gradually, with no sound but the closing of 90 the water at last, a ton or more of earth settled into the boiling eddy and disappeared

At the same instant a pulse of the breeze brought from the garden behind, the joyous, thoughtless laughter of the fair mistresses of Belles Demoiselles

The old Colonel sprang up and clambered over the levee Then forcing himself to a more composed movement, he hastened into the house and ordered his horse

'Tell my children to make merry while I am gone, he left word 'I shall be back to-night,' and the horse's hoofs to clattered down a by-road leading to the city.

'Charlie,' said the planter, riding up to a window, from which the old man's nightcap was thrust out, what you say, Charlie,—my house for yours, eh, Charlie—what you say?'

'Ello' said Charlie, 'from where you come from distime of to-night?'

'I come from the Exchange in St Louis Street' (A small fraction of the truth)

'What you want?' said matter-of-fact Charlie on 'I come to trade'

The low-down relative diew the worsted off his ears 'Oh' yass,' he said with an uncertain air

'Well, old man Charlie, what you say my house for yours,—like you said,—eh, Charlie?'

'I dunno,' said Charlie, 'it's nearly mine now Why you don't stay dare youse'f?'

'Because I don't want' said the Colonel savagely. Is dat reason enough for you.' You better take me in de notion, old man, I tell you,—yes!'

Charlie never winced, but how his answer delighted the Colonel! Quoth Charlie

'I don't care—I take him!—mais, possession give right off'

'Not the whole plantation, Charlie, only'-

'I don't care,' sud Charlie, 'we easy can fix dat Mass, what for you don't want to keep him? I don't want him You better keep him'

'Don't you try to make no fool of me, old man,' cried the planter.

Oh, no! said the other. 'Oh, no! but you make a fool of yourself, ain't it?'

The dumbfounded Colonel stared, Charlie went on

'Yass' Belles Demoiselles is more wort' dan tree block like dis one I pass by dare since two weeks. Oh, pritty Belles Demoiselles' De cane was wave in de wind, de garden smell like a bouquet, de white-cap was jump up and down on de river, seven belles demoiselles was ridin' on horses. "Pritty, pritty, pritty!" says old Charlie. Ah! Monsieur le père, 'ow 'appy, 'appy, 'appy!

'Yass!' he continued—the Colonel still staring—'le so Compte De Charleu have two familie. One was low-down Choctaw, one was high up noblesse. He gave the low-down Choctaw dis old rat-hole, he give Belles Demoiselles to you gran-fozzer, and now you don't be satisfait What I'll do wid Belles Demoiselles? She'll break me in two years, yass And what you'll do wid old Charlie's house, eh? You'll tear her down and make you'se'f a blame old fool I rather wouldn't trade!'

The planter caught a big breathful of anger, but Charlie went straight on

'I rather wouldn't, mais I will do it for you,—just the same, like Monsieur le Compte would say, "Charlie, you old fool, I want to shange houses wid you."

So long as the Colonel suspected irony he was angry, but as Charlie seemed, after all, to be certainly in earnest, he began to feel conscience-stricken. He was by no means a tender man, but his lately-discovered misfortune had unhinged him, and this strange, undeserved, disinterested family fealty on the part of Charlie touched his heart And should he still try to lead him into the pitfall he had dug? He hesitated,—no, he would show him the place by broad daylight, and if he chose to overlook the 'caving bank,' it would be his own fault,—a trade's a trade

'Come,' said the planter, 'come at my house to-night, to-morrow we look at the place before breakfast, and finish the trade'

'For what?' said Charlie

'Oh, because I got to come in town in the morning'
'I don't want,' said Charlie 'How I'm goin' to come dere?'

'I git you a horse at the liberty stable

'Well-anyhow-I don't care-I ll go' And they went

When they had ridden a long time, and were on the road darkened by hedges of Cherokee rose, the Colonel called behind him to the 'low-down' scion

'Keep the road, old man'

'Eh?'

'Keep the road'

'Oh, yes, all right, I keep my word, we don't goin' to play no tricks, eh?'

49 Monsieur le père, the father • 54 satisfait, satisfied • 81 liberty stable, livery stable, where horses and vehicles are kept for hire But the Colonel seemed not to hear His ungenerous design was beginning to be hateful to him. Not only old Charlie's unprovoked goodness was prevailing, the eulogy on Belles Demoiselles had stirred the depths of in intense love for his beautiful home. True, if he held to it, the caving of the bank, at its present fearful speed, would let the house into the river within three months, but were it not better to lose it so, than sell his birthright? Again,—coming back to the first thought,—to betray his own blood! It was only Injin Charlie, but had not the De Charleu blood just spoken out in him? Unconsciously he groaned

After a time they struck a path approaching the plantation in the rear, and a little after, passing from behind a clump of live-oaks, they came in sight of the villa it looked so like a gem, shining through its dark grove, so like a great glow-worm in the dense foliage, so significant of luxury and gayety, that the poor master, from an over-flowing heart, groaned again

'What'' asked Charlie

The Colonel only drew his rein, and, dismounting mechanically, contemplated the sight before him. The high, arched doors and windows were thrown wide to the summer air, from every opening the bright light of numerous candelabra darted out upon the sparkling toliage of magnolia and bay, and here and there in the spacious verandas a colored lantern swayed in the gentle breeze. A sound of revel fell on the ear, the music of harps, and across one window, brighter than the rest, flitted, once or twice, the shadows of dancers. But oh! the shadows flitting across the heart of the fair mansion's master!

'Old Charlie,' said he, gazing fondly at his house. You and me is both old, eh?'

Yaas,' said the stolid Charlie

'And we has both been bad enough in our time, eh. Charlie?'

Charlie, surprised at the tender tone, repeated 'Yaas 'And you and me is mighty close?'

'Blame close, yaas'

But you never know me to cheat, old man!' 'No,'—impassively.

'And do you think I would cheat you now?'

'I dunno,' said Charlie. 'I don't believe'

Well, old man, old man, —his voice began to quiver,— I sha'n't cheat you now My God!—old man, I tell you you better not make the trade! 'Because for what' asked Charlie in plain anger; but both looked quickly toward the house! The Colonel tossed his hands wildly in the air, rushed forward a step 50 or two, and giving one fearful scream of agony and fright, fell forward on his face in the path Old Charlie stood transfixed with horror Belles Demoiselles, the realm of maiden beauty, the home of merriment, the house of dancing, all in the tremor and glow of pleasure, suddenly sunk, with one short, wild wail of terror—sunk, sunk, down, down, down, into the merciless, unfathomable flood of the Mississipp.

Twelve long months were midnight to the mind of the childless father, when they were only half gone, he 60 took his bed, and every day, and every night, old Charlie, the 'low-down,' the 'fool,' watched him tenderly, tended him lovingly, for the sake of his name, his misfortunes, and his broken heart. No woman's step crossed the floor of the sick-chamber, whose western dormer-windows overpeered the dingy architecture of old Charlie's block, Charlie and a skilled physician, the one all interest, the other all gentleness, hope, and patience-these only entered by the door, but by the window came in a sweetscented evergreen vine, transplanted from the caving 70 bank of Belles Demoiselles It caught the rays of sunset in its flowery net and let them softly in upon the sick min's bed, gathered the glancing beams of the moon at midnight, and often wakened the sleeper to look, with his mindless eyes, upon their pretty silver fragments strewn upon the floor

By and by there seemed—there was—a twinkling dawn of returning reason Slowly, peacefully, with an increase unseen from day to day, the light of reason came into the eyes, and speech became coherent, but withal there so came a failing of the wrecked body, and the doctor said that monsieur was both better and worse

One evening, as Charlie sat by the vine-clad window with his fireless pipe in his hand, the old Colonel's eyes fell full upon his own, and rested there

'Charl—,' he said with an effort, and his delighted nurse hastened to the bedside and bowed his best ear. There was an unsuccessful effort or two, and then he whispered, smiling with sweet sadiless,—

'We didn't trade'

The truth, in this case, was a secondary matter to Charlie, the main point was to give a pleasing answer. So he nodded his head decidedly, as who should say—'Oh yes, we did it was a bona-fide swap!' but when he saw the smile vanish, he tried the other expedient and shook his head with still more vigor, to signify that they had not so much as approached a bargain, and the smile returned

90

Charlie wanted to see the vine recognized. He stepped backward to the window with a broad smile, shook the foliage, nodded and looked smart.

'I know,' said the Colonel, with beaming eyes, '—many weeks'

The next day—

'Charl---'

The best ear went down

'Send for a priest'

The priest came, and was alone with him a whole afternoon. When he left, the patient was very haggard and exhausted, but smiled and would not suffer the crucifix to be removed from his breast.

One more morning came Just before dawn Charle, lying on a pallet in the room, thought he was called, and came to the bedside

'Old man,' whispered the failing invalid, 'is it caving yet?'

Charlie nodded

'It won't pay you out'

'Oh, dat makes not'ing,' said Charlie. Two big tears rolled down his brown face 'Dat makes not'in'.'

The Colonel whispered once more

Mes belles demosselles! in paradise,—in the garden— I shall be with them at sunrise,' and so it was

Mary Noailles Murfree (Charles Egbert Craddock)

1850 · 1922

Mary Noailles Murfree, who wrote under the pseudonym of Charles Fgbert Craddock, was one of the most prominent among the many local colorists who flourished during the last three decades of the nineteenth century, and whose work amounted to a literary discovery of America

She was born in 1850 in middle Tennessee near the fine old town of Murfreesboro (named at the beginning of the century for her great-grandfather, a Revolutionary officer from North Carolina). Her father was a successful lawyer, an owner of plantations in the delta country, and an admirer of Scott and Dickens. Miss Murfree was educated in the traditional Southern manner at young ladies' finishing schools—at the Nashville Female Academy and at Chegary Institute in Philadelphia The Murfrees spent some fifteen summers at Beersheba Springs, a fashionable resort in the Cumberland Mountains, it was the country around Beersheba which furnished the materials for Miss Murfree's early stories though she later visited, and utilized in her fiction, the wilder, more primitive Great Smokies, which lie to the east of the Cumberland range. Her first story to attract attention, "Dancin' Party at Harrison's Cove," was published in the Atlantic Montbly in 1878, other mountain stories appeared in the same magazine, and the group was collected in 1884 under the title In the Tennessee Mountains. In 1885 appeared The Prophet of the Great Smok; Mountains, a novel of considerable power Miss Murfree's reputation rests chiefly upon these books, although she wrote many volumes of mountain stories and of historical fiction dealing with the colonial Southwest and the Civil War.

Her work, like that of most of the writers of the local color school, seems much less important now than it did at the end of the last century. The modern reader of In the Tennessee Mountains is likely to object to the studied search for the quaint and picturesque, the moral emphasis, the purple style of the descriptive passages, and the intrusions of the author, a cultivated lady, among her uncultivated mountain characters. It was an artistic disadvantage, though inevitable, that Miss Murfree should approach her east Tennessee mountain folk as an outsider from the middle Tennessee aristocracy. Certainly, a sharp and instructive contrast could be pointed out between her stories and those of George W. Harris, who, dealing with the life of the same region, was closer to his subjects and less inhibited by genteel tradition in his treatment of them. But despite Miss Murfree's short-comings in art and in realism, her writings have a charm of their own. The dialect is adequately rendered. Her account of the life of the mountaineer is entirely faithful to her vision, if not entirely so to reality. Her descriptions of mountain scenery, though sometimes a burden upon the story, often have an old-fashioned beauty. Her name is associated enduringly with the Tennessee mountains.

Over on the Tother Mounting

Over on the Tother Mounting," like most of Miss Murfree's work, contains two different kinds of writing which are somewhat at odds with each other the passages which render the speech and manners of the mountain folk, and the literary passages in which the author describes her settings and comments upon the action. But despite this lack of integration, Miss Murfree's stories deserve a permanent place in American literature. If the reader is tempted to dismiss many passages as "fine writing," he will be arrested by the accuracy and skill with which the author records the dialect, superstitions, and idiosyncrasies of her mountain characters.

First printed in the Atlantic Monthly, June 1881, the story was reprinted in In the Tennessee Mountains, 1884

Stretching out laterally from a long oblique line of the Southern Alleghanies are two parallel ranges, following the same course through several leagues, and separated by a narrow strip of valley hardly half a mile in width As they fare along arm in arm, so to speak, sundry differences between the close companions are distinctly apparent One is much the higher, and leads the way, it strikes out all the bold curves and angles of the course, meekly attended by the lesser ridge, its shadowy coves and sharp ravines are repeated in miniature as its comrade falls into the line of maich, it seems to have its companion in charge, and to conduct it away from the majestic procession of mountains that traverses the

But, despite its more imposing appearance, all the tangible advantages are possessed by its humble neighbor. When Old Rocky-Top, as the lower range is called, is fresh and green with the tender verdure of spring, the snow still lies on the summit of the Tother Mounting, and drifts deep into treacherous rifts and chasms, and muffles the voice of the singing pines, and all the crags are hung with gigantic glitt ring icicles, and the woods are gloomy and bleak. When the sun shines bright on Old Rocky-Top, clouds often hover about the loftier mountain, and storms brew in that higher atmosphere, the all pervading winter winds surge wildly among the groaning forests, and wrench the limbs from the trees, and dash huge fragments of cliffs down deep gorges, and spend their fury before they reach the sheltered lower spur When the kindly shades of evening slip softly down on drowsy Rocky-Top, and the work is laid by in the rough little houses, and the simple homefolks draw around the hearth, day still lingers in a weird, paralytic life among the tree-tops of the Tother Mounting, and the only remnant of the world 10 visible is that stark black line of its summit, stiff and hard against the faint green and saffron tints of the sky Before the birds are well awake on Old Rocky-Top, and while the shadows are still thick, the Tother Mounting has been called up to a new day Lonely dawns these the pale gleam strikes along the October woods, bringing first into uncertain twilight the dead yellow and red of the foliage, presently heightened into royal gold and crimson by the first ray of sunshine, it rouses the timid wild-fowl, it drives home the plunder-20 ing fox, it meets, perhaps, some lumbering bear or skulking mountain wolf, it flecks with light and shade the deer, all gray and antlered, it falls upon no human habitation, for the few settlers of the region have a persistent predilection for Old Rocky-Top Somehow, the Tother Mounting is vaguely in ill repute among its neighbors.—it has a bad name.

"It is the onluckiest place ennywhar nigh about," said Nathan White, as he sat one afternoon upon the porch of his log-cabin, on the summit of Old Rocky-Top, and gazed up at the heights of the Tother Mounting across the narrow valley. "I hey hearn tell all my days ez how, ef ye go up that on the Tother Mounting, suthin' will happen ter ye afore ye kin git away. An' I knows myself ez how—'t war ten year ago an' better—I went up thar, one Jan'ry day, a-lookin' fur my cow, ez hed strayed off through not hevin enny calf ter our house, an I fund the cow, but jes' tuk an' slipped on a icy rock, an' bruk my ankle-bone. "I war sech a job a-gittin' oft in that thar Tother Mounting an' back over hyar, it hey l'arned me ter stay away from thar'.

"Thar war a man," piped out a shrill quavering voice from within the door,—the voice of Nathan White's father, the oldest inhabitant of Rocky-Top,—"thar war a man hyar, nigh on ter fifty year ago,—he war mightily gin ter thievin' horses, an' one time, while he war arunnin' away with Pete Dilks's dapple-gray mare,—they called her Luce, five year old she war,-Pete, he war a-ridin' a-hint him on his old sorrel mare,-her name 't war Jane, an'-the Jeemes boys, they war a-ridin' arter the horse-thief too. Thar, now! I clar forgits what . horses them Jeemes boys war a-ridin' of " He paused for an instant in anxious reflection. "Waal, sir! it do beat all that I can't remember them Jeemes boys' horses' Anyways, they got ter that thar tricky ford through Wild-Duck River, that on the side o' the T'other Mounting, an' the horse-thief war ahead, an' he hed ter take it fust. An' that thar river,-it rises yander in them pines, nigh about," pointing with a shaking fore-finger -"an' that thar river jes' spun him out'n the saddle like a top, an' he war n't seen no more till he hed a floated nigh ter Colbury, ez dead ez a door-nail, nor Pete's dapple-gray mare nuther, she bruk her knees agin them high stone banks. But he war a good swimmer, an he war drowned. He war witched with the place, ez sure ez ye air born"

A long silence ensued Then Nathan White raised his pondering eyes with a look of slow curiosity "What did Tony Britt say he war a-doin' of, when ye kem on him suddint in the woods on the Tother Mounting' he asked, addressing his son, a stalwart youth, who was sitting upon the step, his hat on the back of his head and his hands in the pockets of his jeans trousers

"He said he war a-huntin', but he hed n't hed no sort 'n luck. It 'pears ter me ez all the game thar is witched somehow, an' ye can't get no good shot at nuthin. Tony tole me to-day that he got up three deer, an hed toler'ble aim, an' he missed two, an' the t'other jes trotted off with a rifle-ball in his flank ez onconsarned of the hed hit him with an acorn'

"I hev always hearn ez everything that belongs en that that Tother Mounting air witched, an' ef ye brings away so much ez a leaf, or a stone, or a stick, ye fotches a curse with it," chimed in the old man, "'kase that hev been sech a many folks killed on the Tother Mounting

"I tole Tony Britt that that word," said the young fellow, "an' lowed ter him ez how he hed tuk a mighty bad spot ter go a-huntin'"

"What did he say?" demanded Nathan White
"He say he never knowed ez thar war murders com-

t on Tother Mounting, an' ef thar war he 'spects 't r nuthin' but Injuns, long time ago. But he 'lowed place war powerful onlucky, an' he believed the unting war witched."

Ef Tony Britt's arter enny harm," said the octogenari-"he 'll never come off 'n that thar T'other Mount-It 's a mighty place fur bad folks ter make than Id Thar 's that thar horse thief I war a-tellin' 'bout, that dapple-gray mare,—her name 't war Luce An' ks ez is a-runnin' from the sheriff jes' takes ter the other Mounting ez nateral ez ef it war home, an' ef y don't git cotched, they is never hearn on no more." paused impressively. "The rocks falls on 'em, an' ls 'em, an' I'll tell ye 1es' how I knows," he resumed, icularly "'T war sixty year ago, nigh about, an' me ' them Jeemes boys war a-burnin' of lime tergether er on the Tother Mounting We hed a lime-kiln over ar, jes' under Piney Notch, an' never hed no luck, but stuck ter it like fools, till Hiram Jeemes got one his eyes put out So we quit burnin' of lime on the other Mounting, 'count of the place bein' witched, an' m over hyar ter Old Rocky-Top, an' got along toler'ble ell, cornsiderin' But one day, whilst we war a-workin' the Tother Mounting, what d' ye think I fund in the ck? The print of a bare foot in the solid stone, ez ain an' ez nateral ez ef the track hed been lef' in the ay yestiddy Waal, I knowed it war the track o' remiah Stubbs, what shot his step-brother, an' gin the ieriff the slip, an' war las' seen on the Tother Mountig, 'kase his old shoe jes' fit the track, fur we tried it n' a good while arterward I fund on that same T'other founting-in the solid stone, mind ye-a fish, what he ad done br'iled fur supper, jes' turned ter a stone "

So than's the Bible made true," said an elderly woman, ho had come to the door to hear this reminiscence, nd stood mechanically stirring a hoe-cake batter in a ballow wooden bowl "Ax fur a fish, an' ye 'll git a tone"

The secret history of the hills among which they lived was indeed as a sealed book to these simple mountaineers

'The las' time I war ter Colbury," said Nathan White, I hearn the sheriff a-talkin' 'bout how them evil-doers n' sech runs fur the T'other Mounting fust thing, hough he 'lowed ez it war powerful foxy in 'em ter try er hide thar, kase he said, ef they wunst reaches it, he nought ez well look fur a needle in a hay-stack. He

'lowed ef he hed a posse a thousand men strong he could n't git 'em out."

"He can't find 'em, 'kase the rocks falls on 'em, or swallers 'em in," said the old man. "Ef Tony Britt is so up ter mischief he'll never come back no more He'll git into worser trouble than ever he see afore"

"He hev done seen a powerful lot of trouble, fust one way an another, 'thout foolin' round the T'other Mounting," said Nathan White "They tells me ez he got hisself indicted, I believes they calls it, or suthin', down yander ter the court at Colbury,-that war year afore las',-an' he hed ter pay twenty dollars fine; 'kase when he war overseer of the road he tes' war constant in lettin his friends, an' folks ginerally, off 'thout hevin' 60 'em fined, when they did n't come an' work on the road, -though that air the way ez the overseers hev always done, without nobody a-tellin' on 'em an' sech But them ez war n't Tony Britt's friends seen a mighty differ He war dead sure ter fine Caleb Hoxie seventy-five cents, 'cordin' ter the law, fur every day that he war summonsed ter work an' never come, 'kase Tony an' Caleb hed some sort 'n grudge agin one another 'count of a spavined horse what Caleb sold ter Tony, makin' him out to be a sound critter,—though Caleb swears he 70 never knowed the horse war spavined when he sold him ter Tony, no more 'n nuthin' Caleb war mightily worked up 'bout this hyar finin' business, an' him an' Tony hed a tussle 'bout it every time they kem tergether. But Caleb war always sure ter git the worst of it, 'kase Tony, though he air toler'ble spindling sort o' build, he air somehow or other sorter stringy an' tough, an' makes a right smart show in a reg'lar knock-down an' drag-out fight So Caleb he war beat every time, an' fined too. An' he tried wunst ter shoot Tony Britt, but he missed 80 his aim An' when he war a-layin' off how ter fix Tony. fur treatin' him that way, he war a-stoppin', one day, at Jacob Green's black-smith's shop, yander, a mile down the valley, an' he war a-talkin' 'bout it ter a passel o' folks thar An' Lawyer Rood from Colbury war thar, an' Jacob war a-shoein' of his mare, an' he hearn the tale, an' axed Caleb why n't he report Tony ter the court, an' git him fined fur neglect of his duty, bein' overseer of the toad. An' Caleb never knowed before that it war the law that everybody what war summonsed an' did n't come must be fined, or the overseer must be fined hisself; but he knowed that Tony hed been a-lettin' of his friends off, an' folks ginerally, an' he jes' 'greed fur Lawyer Rood ter stir up trouble fur Tony. An' he done it. An' the court fined Tony twenty dollars fur them ways o' his'n. An' it kept him so busy a-scufflin in' ter raise the twenty dollars that he never hed a chance ter give Caleb Hoxie more'n one or two beatin's the whole time he war a-scrapin' up the money"

This story was by no means unknown to the little circle, nor did its narrator labor under the delusion that he was telling a new thing. It was merely a verbal act of recollection, and an attentive silence reigned as he related the familiar facts. To people who live in lonely regions this habit of retrospection (especially noticeable in them) and an enduring interest in the past may be something of a compensation for the scanty happenings 20 of the present. When the recital was concluded, the hush for a time was unbroken, save by the rush of the winds, bringing upon their breath the fragrant woodland odors of balsams and pungent herbs, and a fresh and exhilarating suggestion of sweeping over a volume of falling water. They stirred the fringed shadow of a great pine that stood, like a sentinel, before Nathan White's door and threw its colorless simulacrum, a boastful lie twice its size, far down the sunset road Now and then the faint clangor of a cow-bell came 30 from out the tangled woods about the little hut, and the low of homeward-bound cattle sounded upon the air, " mellowed and softened by the distance. The haze that rested above the long, narrow valley was hardly visible, save in the illusive beauty with which it invested the scene,-the tender azure of the far-away ranges, the exquisite tones of the gray and purple shadows that hovered about the darkening coves and along the deep lines marking the gorges, the burnished brilliance of the sunlight, which, despite its splendor, seemed lonely 40 enough, lying motionless upon the lonely landscape and on the still figures clustered about the porch Their eves were turned toward the opposite steeps, gorgeous with scarlet oak and sumac, all in autumnal array, and their thoughts were busy with the hunter on the T'other Mounting and vague speculations concerning his evil intent

"It 'pears ter me powerful strange ez Tony goes afoolin' round that thar T'other Mounting, cornsiderin' what happened yander in its shadow," said the woman coming again to the door, and leaning idly against the frame, the bread was baking over the coals "That than wife o' his'n, afore she died, war always frettin' 'kase way down that on the backbone, whar her house war, the shadow o' the T'other Mounting laid on it fur an hour an' better every day of the worl' She 'lowed ez it always put her in mind o' the shadow o' death. An' I thought 'bout that that sayin' o' hern the day when I see her a-lyin' stiff an' cold on the bed, an' the shadow of the Tother Mounting drapping in at the open door an' a-creepin' an' a-creepin' over her face. An' I war plumb glad when they got that woman under ground whar, ef the sunshine can't git ter her, neither kin the shadow Ef ever thar war a murdered woman, she war one Arter all that hed come an' gone with Caleb Hoxie, fur Tony Britt ter go arter him, 'kase he war a verb-doctor, ter git him ter physic his wife, who war nigh about dead with the lung fever, an' gin up by old Dr Marsh!-it looks ter me like he war plumb crazythough him an' Caleb hed sorter made friends 'bout the spayined horse an' sech afore then Jes' ez soon ez she drunk the stuff that Caleb fixed fur her she laid her head back an' sher her eyes, an' never opened 'em no more in this worl' She war a muidered woman, an' Caleb Hoxie done it through the yerbs he fixed fur her"

A subtile amethystine mist had gradually overlaid the slopes of the Tother Mounting, mellowing the brilliant tints of the variegated foliage to a delicious hazy sheen of mosaics, but about the base the air seemed dun-colored though transparent, seen through it, even the red of the crowded trees was but a sombre sort of magnificence, and the great masses of gray rocks, jutting out among them here and there, wore a darkly frowning aspect. Along the summit there was a blaze of scarlet and gold in the full glory of the sunshine, the topmost chiffs caught its rays, and gave them back in unexpected gleams of green or grayish-yellow, as of mosses, or vines, or huckleberry bushes, nourished in the heart of the deep fissures.

"Waal," said Nathan White, "I never did believe ez Caleb gin her ennythink ter hurt,—though I knows that is them ez does. Caleb is the bes' yerb-doctor I ever see The rheumatiz would nigh on ter hev killed me, ef it war n't fur him, that spell I had las' winter An' Dr Marsh, what they hed up afore the gran' jury, swore that the yerbs what Caleb gin her war nuthin' ter hurt, be said, though, they could n't holp nor hender. An' but fur Dr Marsh they would hev jailed Caleb ter stand his trial, like Tony wanted 'em ter do. But Dr. Marsh said she died with the consumption, jes' the same an' Caleb's yerbs war wholesome, though they war n't no 'count at all.'"

⁶⁶ yerb-doctor, herb doctor

"I knows I am't a-goin' never ter tech nuthin' he fixes fur me no more," said his wife, "an' I ll be bound nobody else in these hyar mountings will, nuther"

"Waal," drawled her son, "I knows fur true ez he air tendin' now on old Gideon Croft, what lives over yander in the valley on the t'other side of the T'other Mounting, an' is down with the fever He went over thar yestiddy evening, late, I met him when he war goin', an' he tole me"

"He hed better look out how he comes across Tony Britt," said Nathan White, "fur I hearn, the las' time I war ter the Settlemint, how Tony hev swore ter kill him the nex' time he see him, fur a-givin' of pizenous yerbs ter his wife Tony air mightily outdone 'kase the gran' jury let him off Caleb hed better be sorter keerful how he goes a-foolin' round these hyar dark woods"

The sun had sunk, and the night, long held in abeyance, was coming fast. The glooms gathered in the valley, a soft gray shadow hung over the landscape making familiar things strange. The Tother Mounting was all a dusky, sad purple under the faintly pulsating stars, save that high along the horizontal line of its summit gleamed the strange red radiance of the dead and gone sunset. The outline of the foliage was clearly drawn against the pure tapis lazuli tint of the sky behind it, here and there the uncarny light streamed through the bare limbs of an early leafless tree, which looked in the distance like some bory hand beckoning, or warning, or raised in horror

"Anythmk mought happen that!" said the woman, as so she stood on night-wrapped Rocky-Top and gazed up at the alien light, so red in the midst of the dark land-scape. When she turned back to the door of the little hut, the meagre comforts within seemed almost luxury, in their cordial contrast to the desolate, dreary mountain yonder and the thought of the forlorn, wandering hunter. A genial glow from the hearth diffused itself over the puncheon floor, the savory odor of broiling venison filled the room as a tall, slim girl knelt before the fire and placed the meat upon the gridiron, her pale cheeks flushing with the heat, there was a happy suggestion of peace 50 and unity when the four generations trooped in to their supper, grandfather on his grandson's arm, and a sedate two-year-old bringing up the rear Nathan White's wife paused behind the others to bar the door, and once more, as she looked up at the T other Mounting, the thought of the lonely wanderer smote her heart. The red sunset light had died out at last, but a golden aureola heralded the moon-rise, and a gleaming thread edged the masses of foliage, there was no faint suggestion now of mist in the valley, and myriads of stars filled a cloudless sky "He 60 hev done gone home by this time," she said to her daughter-in-law, as she closed the door, "an' ef he ain't, he'll hev a moon ter light him"

"Air ye a-studyin' bout Tony Britt yit?" asked Nathan White "He hev done gone home a good hour by sun, I'll be bound Jes' ketch Tony Britt a-huntin' till sundown, will ye! He air a mighty pore hand ter work. Stonishes me ter hear he air even a-huntin' on the Tother Mounting."

"I don't believe he's up ter enny harm," said the 70 woman, "he hev jes' tuk ter the woods with grief"

"Pears ter me," said the daughter-in-law, rising from her kneeling posture before the fire, and glancing reproachfully at her husband,—' pears ter me ez ye mought hev brought him hyar tei eat his supper along of we-uns, stiddier a-leavin' him a-grievin' over his dead wife in them witched woods on the Tother Mounting."

The young fellow looked a trifle abashed at this suggestion "I never wunst thought of it," he said "Tony never stopped ter talk more'n a minit, nohow"

The evening wore away, the octogenarian and the sedate two-year-old fell asleep in their chairs shortly after supper, Nathan White and his son smoked their cob-pipes, and talked fitfully of the few incidents of the day, the women sat in the firelight with their knitting, silent and absorbed, except that now and then the elder, breaking from her reverie, declared, "I can't git Tony Britt out'n my head nohow in the worl'".

The moon had come grandly up over the Tother

Mounting, casting long silver lights and deep black shadows through all the tangled recesses and yawning chasms of the woods and rocks. In the vast wilderness the bright rays met only one human creature, the belated hunter making his way homeward through the dense forest with an experienced woodman's craft. For no evil intent had brought Tony Britt to the T'other Mounting, he had spent the day in hunting, urged by that strong necessity without which the mountaineer seldom makes any ex-10 ertion Dr Marsh's unavailing skill had cost him dear, his only cow was sold to make up the twenty dollars fine which his revenge on Caleb Hoxie had entailed upon him, without even so much as a spavined horse tillage was impossible, and the bounteous harvest left him empty-handed, for he had no crops to gather. The hardships of extreme poverty had reinforced the sorrows that came upon him in battalions, and had driven him far through long aisles of the woods, where the night fell upon him unaware. The foliage was all embossed with 20 exquisite silver designs that seemed to stand out some little distance from the dark masses of leaves, now and then there came to his eyes that emerald gleam never seen upon verdure in the day-time, --- only shown by some artificial light, or the moon's sweet uncertainty. The wind was strong and fresh, but not cold, here and there was a glimmer of dew. Once, and once only, he thought of the wild traditions which peopled the Tother Mounting with evil spirits. He paused with a sudden chill, he glanced nervously over his shoulder down the illimitable 30 avenues of the lonely woods. The grape-vines, hanging in festoons from tree to tree, were slowly swinging back and forth, stirred by the wind. There was a dizzy dance of shadows whirling on every open space where the light lay on the ground. The roar and fret of Wild-Duck River, hidden there somewhere in the pines, came on the breeze like a strange, weird, fitful voice, crying out amid the haunted solitudes of the Tother Mounting. He turned abruptly, with his gun on his shoulder, and pursued his way through the trackless desert in the direction of his 40 home. He had been absorbed in his quest and his gloomy thoughts, and did not realize the distance he had traversed until it lay before him to be retraced, but his superstitious terror urged him to renewed exertions "Ef ever I gits off'n this hvar witched mounting," he said to himself, as he tore away the vines and brambles that beset his course. "I'll never come back agin while I lives" He grew calmer when he paused on a huge projecting crag, and looked across the narrow valley at the great black mass opposite, which he knew was Old Rocky-Top, its very presence gave him a sense of companionship and blunted his fear, and he sat down to rest for a few minutes, gazing at the outline of the range he knew so well, so unfamiliar from a new stand-point. How low it seemed from the heights of the T'other Mounting! Could that faint gleam be the light in Nathan White's house? Tony Britt glanced further down the indistinct slope, where he knew his own desolate, deserted hut was crouched "Jes whar the shadow o' the T'other Mounting can reach it," he thought, with a new infusion of bitterness. He averted his eyes, he would look no longer, he threw himself at full length among the ragged clumps of grass and fragments of rock, and turned his face to the stars. It all came back to him then Sometimes, in his sordid cares and struggles for his scanty existence, his past troubles were dwarfed by the present. But here on the lonely cliff, with the infinite spaces above him and the boundless forest below, he felt anew his isolation. No light on earth save the far gleam from another man's home, and in heaven only the drowning face of the moon, drifting slowly through the blue floods of the skies. He was only twentyfive, he had youth and health and strength, but he felt that he had lived his life, it seemed long, marked as it was by cares and privation and persistent failure. Little as be knew of life, he knew how hard his had been, even meted by those of the poverty-stricken wretches among whom his lot was cast "An' sech luck!" he said, as his sad eves followed the drifting dead face of the moon "Along o that thar step-mother o' mine till I war growed, an' then when I war married, an' we hed got the house put up, an' war beginnin' ter git along like other folks kin, an' Carline's mother gin her that that calf what growed ter a cow, an' through pinchin' and' savin' we made out ter buy that that horse from Caleb Hoxie, jes' ez we war a-startin ter work a crap he lays down an' dies; an' that cussed twenty dollars ez I hed ter pay ter the court, an' Car'line jes' a-gettin' sick, an' a-wastin' an' a-wastin' away, till I like a fool, brung Caleb thar, an' he pizens her with his yerbs-God A'mighty! ef I could jes' lay my hands wunst on that scoundrel I would n't leave a mite of him

He rose with a set, stern face, and struck a huge bowlder beside him with his hard clenched hand as he spoke He had not even an ignorant idea of an impressive dramatic pose, but if the great gaunt cliff had been the stage of a theatre his attitude and manner at that instant would have won him applause. He was all alone with his poverty and his anguished memories, as men with such burdens are apt to be

The bowlder on which, in his rude fashion, he had registered his oath was harder than his hard hand, and the vehemence of the blow brought blood, but he had scarcely time to think of it. His absorbed reverie was broken by a rustling other than that of the eddying wind He raised his head and looked about him, half expecting to see the antlers of a deer Then there came to his ears the echo of the tread of man His eyes mechanically tollowed the sound Forty feet down the face of the crag a broad ledge jutted out, and upon it ran a narrow path, made by stray cattle, or the feet of their searching owners, it was visible from the summit for a distance of a hundred yards or so, and the white glamour of the moonbeams fell full upon it Before a speculation had suggested itself, a man walked slowly into view along the path, and with starting eyes the hunter recognized his dearest foe Britt's hand lay upon the bowlder, his oath was in his mind, his unconscious enemy had come within his power Swifter than a flash the temptation was presented He remembered the warnings of his lawyer at Colbury last week, when the grand jury had failed to find a true bill against Caleb Hoxie,-that he was an innocent man, and must go unscathed, that any revenge for fancied wrongs would be dearly rued, he remembered, too, the mountain traditions of the falling rocks burying evil-doers in the heart of the hills. Here was his opportunity He would have a life for a life, and there would be one more legend of the very stones conspiring to punish malefactors escaped from men added to the terrible "sayın's" of the T'other Mounting A strong belief in the supernatural influences of the place was rife within him, he knew nothing of Gideon Croft's fever and the errand that had brought the herb-doctor through the "witched mounting," had he not been transported thither by some invisible agency, that the rocks might fall upon him and crush him?

The temptation and the resolve were simultaneous. With his hand upon the bowlder, his hot heart beating fast, his distended eyes burning upon the approaching figure, he waited for the moment to come. There lay the long, low, black mountain opposite, with only the moon beams upon it, for the lights in Nathan White's house were extinguished, there was the deep, dark gulf of the valley, there, forty feet below him, was the narrow, moonflooded path on the ledge, and the man advancing carelessly. The bowlder fell with a frightful crash, the echoes rang with a scream of terror, and the two men—one fleeing from the dreadful danger he had barely escaped, the other from the hideous deed he thought he had done—ran wildly in opposite directions through the tangled autumnal woods.

Was every leaf of the forest endowed with a woful voice, that the echo of that shrick might never die from Tony Britt's ears? Did the storied, retributive rocks still vibrate with this new victims frenzied cry? And what was this horror in his heart! Now,—so late,—was coming a terrible conviction of his enemy's innocence, and with 70 it a fathomless remorse

All through the interminable night he fled frantically along the mountain's summit, scarcely knowing whither, and caring for nothing except to multiply the miles between him and the frightful object that he believed lay under the bowlder which he had dashed down the precipice The moon sank beneath the horizon, the fantastic shadows were merged in the darkest hour of the night, the winds died, and there was no voice in all the woods, save the wail of Wild-Duck River and the forever-re- 80 sounding screams in the flying wretch's ears Sometimes he answered them in a wild, hoarse, inarticulate cry, sometimes he flung his hands above his head and wrung them in his agony, never once did he pause in his flight Panting, breathless, exhausted, he eagerly sped through the darkness, tearing his face upon the brambles, plunging now and then into gullies and unseen quagmires, sometimes falling heavily, but recovering himself in an instant, and once more struggling on, striving to elude the pursuing voices, and to distance forever his con- 90 science and his memory

And then came that terrible early daylight that was wont to dawn upon the Tother Mounting when all the world besides was lost in slumber, the wan, melancholy light showed dimly the solemn trees and dense undergrowth, the precarious pitfalls about his path, the long deep gorges, the great crags and chasms, the cascades, steely gray, and white, the huge mass, all hung about with shadows, which he knew was Old Rocky-Top, rising from the impenetrably dark valley below. It seemed wonderful to him, somehow, that a new day should 10 break at all If, in a revulsion of nature, that utter blackness had continued forever and ever it would not have been strange, after what had happened He could have borne it better than the sight of the familiar world gradually growing into day, all unconscious of his secret He had begun the descent of the Tother Mounting, and he seemed to carry that pale dawn with him, day was breaking when he reached the foot of Old Rocky-Top, and as he climbed up to his own descried, empty little shanty, it too stood plainly defined in the morning light. He dragged 20 himself to the door, and impelled by some morbid fascination he glanced over his shoulder at the Tother Mounting There it was, unchanged, with the golden largess of a gracious season blazing upon every autumnal leaf He shuddered, and went into the fireless, comfortless house. And then he made an appalling discovery. As he mechanically divested himself of his shot-pouch and powder-horn he was stricken by a sudden consciousness that he did not have his gun! One doubtful moment, and he remembered that he had laid it upon the crag when 30 he had thrown himself down to rest. Beyond question, it was there yet. His conscience was still now,-his remorse had fled. It was only a matter of time when his crime would be known. He recollected his meeting with young White while he was hunting, and then Britt cursed the gun which he had left on the cliff. The discovery of the weapon there would be strong evidence against him, taken in connection with all the other circumstances True, he could even yet go back and recover it, but he was mastered by the fear of meeting some one on the un-40 frequented road, or even in the loneliness of the T'other Mounting, and strengthening the chain of evidence against him by the fact of being once more seen in the fateful neighborhood. He resolved that he would wait until night-fall, and then he would retrace his way, secure his gun, and all might yet be well with him. As to the bowlder,-were men never before buried under the falling rocks of the Tother Mounting?

Without food, without rest, without sleep, his limbs rigid with the strong tension of his nerves, his eyes bloodshot, haggard, and eager, his brain on fire, he sat through the long morning hours absently gazing across the narrow valley at the solemn, majestic mountain opposite, and that sinister jutting crag with the indistinctly defined ledges of its rugged surface

After a time, the scene began to grow dim, the sun was still shining, but through a haze becoming momently more dense. The brilliantly tinted foliage upon the T'other Mounting was fading, the cliffs showed strangely distorted faces through the semi-transparent blue vapor, and presently they seemed to recede altogether, the valley 6 disappeared, and all the country was filled with the smoke of distant burning woods He was gasping when he first became sensible of the smoke-laden haze, for he had seen nothing of the changing aspect of the landscape Before his vision was the changeless picture of a night of mingled moonlight and shadow, the ill-defined black mass where Old Rocky-Top rose into the air, the impenetrable gloom of the valley, the ledge of the crag. and the unconscious figure slowly coming within the power of his murderous hand. His eyes would look on no ? other scene, no other face, so long as he should live

He had a momentary sensation of stifling and then a great weight was lifted For he had begun to doubt whether the unlucky locality would account satisfactorily for the fall of that bowlder and the horrible object beneath it, a more reasonable conclusion might be deduced from the fact that he had been seen in the neighborhood, and the circumstances of the deadly feud. But what wonder would there be if the dry leaves on Tother Mounting should be ignited and the woods burned! What expla- : nations might not such a catastrophe suggest!-a frantic flight from the flames toward the cliff and an accidental fall And so he waited throughout the long day, that was hardly day at all, but an opaque twilight, through which could be discerned only the stony path leading down the slope from his door, only the blurred outlines of the bushes close at hand, only the great gaunt limbs of a lightning-scathed tree, seeming entirely severed from the unseen trunk, and swinging in the air sixty feet above the earth

Toward night-fall the wind rose and the smoke-curtain lifted, once more revealing to the settlers upon Old Rocky-Top the sombre Tother Mounting, with the belated evening light still lurid upon the trees,—only a strange, faint resemblance of the sunset radiance, rather the ghost of a dead day And presently this apparition was gone, and the deep purple line of the witched mounrain's summit grew darker against the opaline skies, till it was merged in a dusky black, and the shades of the night fell thick on the landscape.

The scenic effects of the drama, that serve to widen the mental vision and cultivate the imagination of even the poor in cities, were denied these primitive, simple people; but that magnificent pageant of the four seasons, wherein was forever presented the imposing splendor of the Tother Mounting in an ever-changing grandeur of aspect. was a gracious recompense for the spectacular privileges of civilization. And this evening the humble family party on Nathan White's porch beheld a scene of unique impressiveness.

The moon had not yet risen, the winds were awhirl; the darkness draped the earth as with a pall. Out from the impenetrable gloom of the woods on the Tother .3 Mounting there started, suddenly, a scarlet globe of fire, one long moment it was motionless, but near it the spectral outline of a hand appeared beckoning, of warning or raised in horror,—only a leafless tree, catching in the distance a semblance of humanity. Then from the still ball of fire there streamed upward a long, slender plume of golden light, waving back and forth against the pale horizon. Across the dark slope of the mountain below, flashes of lightning were shooting in zigzag lines, and wherever they gleamed were seen those frantic skeleton 30 hands raised and wrung in anguish. It was cruel sport for the cruel winds, they maddened over gorge and cliff and along the wooded steeps, carrying far upon their wings the sparks of desolation From the summit, myriads of jets of flame reached up to the placid stars, about the base of the mountain lurked a lake of liquid fire, with wreaths of blue smoke hovering over it, ever and anon, athwart the slope darted the sudden lightning, widening into sheets of flame as it conquered new ground

The astonishment on the faces grouped about Nathan 40 White's door was succeeded by a startled anxiety. After the first incoherent exclamations of surprise came the pertinent inquiry from his wife, "Ef Old Rocky-Top war ter ketch too, whar would we-uns run ter?"

Nathan White's countenance had in its expression more of astounded excitement than of bodily fear "Why, bless my soul' he said at length, "the woods away over yander, what hev been burnin' all day, ain't nigh enough ter the T'other Mourting ter ketch it,-nuthin' like it."

"The Tother Mounting would burn, though, ef fire war put ter it," said his son The two men exchanged a 50 glance of deep significance.

"Do ye mean ter say," exclaimed Mrs White, her firelit face agitated by a sudden superstitious terror, "that that thar T'other Mounting is fired by witches an' sech?"

"Don't talk so loud, Matildy," said her husband "Them knows best ez done it.

"Thar's one thing sure," quavered the old man "that thar fire will never tech a leaf on Old Rocky-Top Thar's a church on this hyar mounting,-bless the Lord fur it!an' we lives in the fear o' God'

There was a pause, all watching with distended eyes the progress of the flames

"It looks like it mought hev been kindled in torment," said the young daughter-in-law

"It looks down thar," said her husband, pointing to the lake of fire, "like the pit itself."

The apathetic inhabitants of Old Rocky-Top were stirred into an activity very incongruous with their habits and the hour During the conflagration they traversed long distances to reach each other's houses and confer 70 concerning the danger and the questions of supernatural agency provoked by the mysterious firing of the woods. Nathan White had few neighbors, but above the crackling of the timber and the roar of the flames there rose the quick beat of running footsteps, the undergrowth of the forest near at hand was in strange commotion, and at last, the figure of a man burst forth, the light of the fire showing the startling pallor of his face as he staggered to the little porch and sank, exhausted, into a chair

"Waal, Caleb Hoxie!" exclaimed Nathan White, in 80 good-natured raillery, "ye 're skeered, fur true! What ails ye, ter think Old Rocky-Top air a-goin' ter ketch too? "Tain't nigh dry enough, I'm a-thinkin'."

"Fire kindled that that way can't tech a leaf on Old Rocky-Top," sleepily piped out the old man, nodding in his chair, the glare of the flames which rioted over T'other Mounting gilding his long white hair and peaceful, slumberous face "Thar's a church on Old Rocky-Top, -bless the"-The sentence drifted away with his dreams

"Does ve believe-them-them"-Caleb Hoxie's

⁴³ torment, hall See Luke 16 28. For I have five brethren, that he may testify unto them, lest they also come into this place of toiment" trembling white lips could not frame the word—"them—done it?"

"Like ez not," said Nathan White. "But that ain't acroublin' of ye an' me. I ain't never hearn o' them witches a-tormentin' of honest folks what ain't done nuthin' hurtful ter nobody," he added, in cordial reassurance.

His son was half hidden behind one of the rough cedat posts, that his mirth at the guest's display of cowardice might not be observed. But the women, always quick to suspect, glanced meaningly at each other with widening eyes, as they stood together in the door-way.

"I dunno.—I dunno." Caleb Hoxie declared huskily "I ain't never done nuthin' ter nobody, an' what do ye s'pose them witches an' sech done ter me las' night, on that T'other Mounting? I war a-goin' over yander to Gideon Croft's fur ter physic him, ez he air mortal low with the fever, an' cz I war a-comin' alongside o' that thar high bluff"-it was very distinct, with the flames wreathing fantastically about its gray, rigid features-20 "they throwed a bowlder ez big ez this hyar porch down on ter me. It ies' grazed me, an' knocked me down, an' kivered me with dirt. An' I run home a-hollerin', an' it seemed ter me ter-day ez I war a-goin' ter screech an' screech all my life, like some onsettled crazy critter. It 'peared like 'twould take a barl o' hop tea ter git me quiet An' now look yander!" and he pointed tremulously to the blazing mountain

There was an expression of conviction on the women's faces. All their lives afterward it was there whenever called Hoxie's name was mentioned, no more to be moved or changed than the stern, set faces of the crags among the fiery woods.

"That's a church on this hyar mounting, said the old man feebly, waking for a moment, and falling asleep the next.

Nathan White was perplexed and doubtful, and a superstitious awe had checked the laughing youngster behind the cedar post

A great cloud of flame came rolling through the sky toward them, golden, pellucid, spangled through and through with fiery red stars, poising itself for one moment high above the valley, then breaking into myriads of sparks, and showering down upon the dark abysses below

"Look-a-hyar!" said the elder woman in a frightened under-tone to her daughter-in-law, "this hyar wicked critter air too onlucky ter be a-sittin' longside of us, we'll all be burnt up afore he gits hisself away from hyar. An' who is that a-comin' yander?" For from the encompassing woods another dark figure had emerged, and was slowly approaching the porch. The wary eyes near Caleb Hoxie saw that he fell to trembling, and that he clutched at a post for support. But the hand pointing at him was shaken as with a palsy, and the voice hardly seemed Tony Britt's as it cried out, in an agony of terror, "What air ye a-doin' hyar, a-sittin' longside o' livin' folks? Yet bones air under a bowlder on the Tother Mounting, an' ye air a dead man'"

They said ever afterward that Tony Britt had lost his mind "through goin' a-huntin' jes one time on the Tother. Mounting His spirit air all broke, an' he's a mighty tame critter nowadays." Through his persistent endeavor he and Caleb Hoxie became quite friendly, and he was even reported to "low that he war satisfied that Caleb never gin his wife nuthin' ter hurt." "Though," said the gossips of Cld Rocky-Top, "them women up ter White's will hev it no other way but that Caleb pizened her, an' they would n't take no yerbs from him no more'n he war a rattlesnake. But Caleb always 'pears sorter skittish when he an' Tony air tergether, like he did n't know when Tony war a-goin' ter fotch him a lick. But law! Tony air that changed that ye can't make him mad 'thout ye mind him o' the time he called Caleb a ghost."

A dark, gloomy, deserted place was the charred T'other Mounting through all the long winter And when spring came, and Old Rocky-Top was green with delicate fresh verdure, and melodious with singing birds and chorusing breezes, and bedecked as for some great festival with violets and azaleas and laurel-blooms, the T'other Mounting was stark and wintry and black with its desolate leafless trees. But after a while the spring came for it. too the buds swelled and burst, flowering vines festooned the grim gray crags, and the dainty freshness of the vernal season reigned upon its summit, while all the world below was growing into heat and dust. The circuit-rider said it reminded him of a tardy change in a sinner's heart: though it come at the eleventh hour, the glorious summer is before it, and a full fruition, though it work but an hour in the Lord's vineyard, it receives the same reward as those who labored through all the day

⁸⁹ Lord's vineyard See the parable of the laborers in the vineyard, Matthew 20 1-16

"An' it always did 'pear ter me ez thar war mighty little lestice in that," was Mrs. White's comment.

But at the meeting when that sermon was preached Tony Britt told his "experience." It seemed a confession, for according to the gossips he "lowed that he hed flung that bowlder down on Caleb Hoxie,—what the witches flung, ye know,—'kase he believed then that Caleb hed killed his wife with pizenous yerbs; an' he went back the nex' night an' fired the woods, ter make folks think when they fund Caleb's bones that he war a-runnin' from to the blaze an' fell off'n the bluff." And everybody on Old Rocky-Top said incredulously, "Pore Tony Britt! He hev los' his mind through goin' a-huntin' jes one time on the Tother Mounting."

Joel Chandler Harris

1848 • 1908

Writing in Life on the Mississippi in 1883, Mark Twain called Joel Chandler Harris "the only master" of the Negro dialect Twain himself was something of a master in this kind, but Harris' supremacy, then and even now, may well pass unquestioned

Harris was born near Eatonton, Georgia. His mother, deserted by his father, took in sewing for a living. Between the ages of thirteen and seventeen (these were the Civil War years), Harris lived on the nearby plantation of Joseph Addison Turner and helped Turner print a weekly paper At this time, he got an education, by working on the paper and by reading in Turner's excellent library, he also became intimately acquainted with the life of the Southern plantation and especially with the speech and folklore of the Negroes After the war he worked for brief periods on newspapers in Macon, New Orleans, and Savannah. In 1876 he joined the staff of the Atlanta Constitution, and for twenty-four years, through editorials, book reviews, feature articles, and the Uncle Remus stories (the last especially, of course), he helped mightily to make the Constitution the most influential newspaper ever published in the South The stories of Uncle Remus were first collected in Uncle Remus: His Songs and Sayings in 1880. Their popularity, both South and North, was so great that new volumes followed Nights with Uncle Remus (1883), Uncle Remus and His Friends (1892), Told by Uncle Remus (1905), and still others

Recent historical critics have stressed Harris' aim in the Uncle Remus stories of reconciling the North and the South "With Harris," says Professor Buck, "the desire to reconcile amounted almost to a passion" Harris "must have worked consciously," Professor Wade believes, "to make those stories propagandist in nature He must have realized that his propaganda, through Uncle Remus, had proved effective, and he could tell himself with all justice that much sectional rancour had evaporated before that old man's wit" Theodore Roosevelt praised Harris' writings in 1901, chiefly "for the blotting out of sectional antagonism" One can be glad that the Uncle Remus tales contributed to this happy result, without esteeming them the less as comic masterpieces of their kind, or enjoying them the less for their unalloyed humor.

Uncle Remus: His Songs and Sayings

Uncle Remus is Harris' version of the ante-bellum Negro who remained loyal to his master during the Civil War and after, and Harris' writings assure the reader of the kindly relations between the races on a Southern plantation.

The tales themselves belong to the folklore of the Negro race, though analogues can be found in the beast fables once popular in the literatures of Europe Abundant humor is provided by the incongruity in the fact that the behavior of the animals closely approximates that of human beings. Uncle Remus' hero, Brer Rabbit (as Harris pointed out), "is the weakest and most harmless of all animals," and yet "is victorious in contests with the bear, the wolf, and the fox. It is not virtue that triumphs, but helplessness, it is not malice, but mischievousness." Historical critics have seen in Uncle Remus and his stories an embodiment of the "primitive outlook" of the ante-bellum Southern Negro

UNCLE REMUS INITIATES THE LITTLE BOY

One evening recently, the lady whom Uncle Remus calls "Miss Sally" missed her little seven-year-old. Making search for him through the house and through the yard, she heard the sound of voices in the old man's cabin, and, looking through the window, saw the child sitting by Uncle Remus. His head rested against the old man's arm, and he was gazing with an expression of the most intense interest into the rough, weather-beaten face, that beamed so kindly upon him. This is what "Miss Sally" in heard.

"Bimeby, one day, arter Brer Fox bin doin' all dat he could fer ter ketch Brer Rabbit, en Brer Rabbit bin doin' all he could fer ter keep 'im fum it, Brer Fox say to hisse'f dat he'd put up a game on Brer Rabbit, en he ain't mo'n got de wuds out'n his mouf twel Brer Rabbit come a

"I wanter have some confab wid you, Brer Rabbit, sez Brer Fox, sezee.

"'All right, Brer Fox, but you better holler fum whar you stan'. I'm monstus full er fleas dis mawnin', sez Brer Rabbit, sezee.

"'I seed Brer B'ar yistiddy,' sez Brer Fox, sezee, 'en he sorter rake me over de coals kaze you en me ain't make frens en live naberly, en I tole 'im dat I'd see you'

"Den Brer Rabbit scratch one year wid his off hinefoot sorter jub'usly, en den he ups en sez, sezee

"'All a settin', Brer Fox Spose'n you drap roun' termorrer en take dinner wid me We ain't got no great doin's at our house, but I speck de ole 'oman en de chilluns kin sorter scramble roun' en git up sump'n fer ter stay yo' stummuck.'

"'I'm 'gree'ble, Brei Rabbit,' sez Brer Fox, sezee

"'Den I'll 'pen' on you,' sez Brer Rabbit, sezee

"Nex' day, Mr Rabbit an' Miss Rabbit got up soon, 'fo' day, en raided on a gyarden like Miss Sally's out dar, en got some cabbiges, en some roas'n years, en some sparrergrass, en dey fix up a smashin' dinner Bimeby one er de little Rabbits, playin' out in de back-yard, come runnin' in hollerin', 'Oh, ma' oh, ma' I seed Mr Fox a comin'' En den Brer Rabbit he tuck de chilluns by der years en make um set down, en den him en Miss Rabbit sorter dally roun' waitin' for Brer Fox En dey keep on waitin' but no Brer Fox ain't come Attei while Brer Rabbit goes to de do', easy like, en peep out, en dar, stickin' out fum behime de cornder, wuz de tip-een' er Brer Fox tail Den Brer Rabbit shut de do' en sot down, en put his paws behime his years en begin fer ter sing En wid dat Brer Rabbit lipt out er de do' and dodge 'mong de bushes, en sot dar watchin' fer Brer Fox, en he ain't watch long, nudder, kaze Brer Fox flung off de flannil en crope out er de house en got what he could close in on Brer Rabbit, en bimeby Brer Rabbit holler out. 'Oh, Brer Fox! I'll des put yo' calamus root out yer on dish yer stump. Better come git it while hit's fresh,' and wid dat Brer Rabbit gallop off home. En Brer Fox ain't never kotch 'im yit, en w'at's mo', honey, he ain't gwineter."

HOW MR RABBIT SAVED HIS MEAT

"One time," said Uncle Remus, whetting his knife slowly and thoughtfully on the palm of his hand, and gazing reflectively in the fire—"one time Brer Wolf—"

"Why, Uncle Remus!" the little boy broke in, "I thought you said the Rabbit scalded the Wolf to death a long time ago"

The old man was fairly caught and he knew it; but this made little difference to him. A frown gathered on his usually serene brow as he turned his gaze upon the child—a frown in which both scorn and indignation were visible. Then all at once he seemed to regain control of himself. The frown was chased away by a look of Christian resignation.

"Dar now! Wat I tell you?" he exclaimed as if addressing a witness concealed under the bed. "Ain't I done tole you so? Bless grashus! ef chilluns ain't gittin' so dev knows mo'n ole fokes, en dey'll spute longer you en spute longer you ceppin der ma call um, w'ich I speck twon't be long 'fo' she will, en den I'll set yere by de chimbly-cornder en git some peace er mine W'en ole Miss wuz livin'," continued the old man, still addressing some imaginary person. "hit 'uz mo'n enny her chilluns 'ud dast ter do ter come 'sputin' longer me, en Mars John'll tell you de same enny day you ax 'im"

"Well, Uncle Remus, you know you said the Rabbit poured hot water on the Wolf and killed him," said the little boy.

The old man pretended not to hear He was engaged in searching among some scraps of leather under his chair, and kept on talking to the imaginary person. Finally, he found and drew forth a nicely plaited whip- 60 thong with a red snapper all waxed and knotted

"I wuz fixin' up a w'ip fer a little chap," he continued, with a sigh, "but, bless grashus' 'fo' I kin git 'er done, de little chap done grow'd up twel he know mo'n I duz."

The child's eyes filled with tears and his lips began to quiver, but he said nothing, whereupon Uncle Remus immediately melted.

"I 'clar' to goodness," he said, reaching out and taking the little boy tenderly by the hand, "ef you ain't de ve'y spit en image er ole Miss w'en I brung 'er de las' news 70 er de war Hit's des like skeerin' up a ghos' w'at you ain't fear'd un."

Then there was a pause, the old man patting the little child's hand caressingly.

"You ain't mad, is you, honey?" Uncle Remus asked finally, "kaze ef you is, I'm gwine out yere en butt my head 'gin de do' jam'."

But the little boy wasn't mad Uncle Remus had conquered him and he had conquered Uncle Remus in pretty much the same way before But it was some time to before Uncle Remus would go on with the story He had to be coaxed At last, however, he settled himself back in the chair and began:

"Co'se, honey, hit mout er bin ole Brer Wolf, er hit mout er bin er n'er Brer Wolf, it mout er bin 'fo' he got kotch up wid, er it mout er bin atterwards Ez de tale were gun to me des dat away I gin it unter you One time Brer Wolf wuz comin' 'long home fum a fishin' frolic He s'anter 'long de road, he did, wid his string er fish 'cross his shoulder, wen fus news you know ole Miss Pa'tridge, she hop outer de bushes en flutter 'long right at Brer Wolf nose Brer Wolf he say ter hisse'f dat ole Miss Pa'tridge tryin' fer ter toll 'im 'way fum her nes', en wid dat he lay his fish down en put out inter de 10 bushes whar ole Miss Pa'tridge come fum, en 'bout dat time Brer Rabbit, he happen 'long Dar wuz de fishes, en dar wuz Brer Rabbit, en w'en dat de case w'at you speck a sorter innerpen'ent man like Brer Rabbit gwine do? I kin tell you dis, dat dem fishes ain't stay whar Brer Wolf put um at, en w'en Brer Wolf come back dev wuz gone

"Brer Wolf, he sot down en scratch his head, he did, en study en study, en den hit sorter rush inter his mine dat Brer Rabbit bin long dar, en den Brer Wolf, he put 20 out fer Brer Rabbit house, en w'en he git dar he hail 'im Brer Rabbit, he dunno nuthin' tall 'bout no fishes Brer Wolf he up'n say he bleedzd ter b leeve Brer Rabbit got dem fishes. Brer Rabbit 'ny it up en down, but Brer Wolf stan' to it dat Brer Rabbit got dem fishes. Brer Rabbit, he say dat if Brer Wolf b'leeve he got de fishes, den he give Brer Wolf lief fer ter kill de bes' cow he got Brer Wolf, he tuck Brer Rabbit at his word, en go off ter de pastur' en drive up de cattle en kill Brer Rabbit bes' cow

"Brer Rabbit, he hate mighty bad fer ter lose his cow but he lay his plans, en he tell his chilluns dat he gwineter have dat beef yit. Brer Wolf, he bin tuck up by de patter-rollers 'fo' now, en he mighty skeerd un um, en fus news you know, yer come Brer Rabbit hollerin' en tellin' Brer Wolf dat de patter-rollers comin'.

"'You run en hide, Brer Wolf,' sez Brer Rabbit, sezee, 'en I'll stay yer en take keer er de cow twel you gits back,' sezee.

"Soon's Brer Wolf hear talk er de patter-rollers, he scramble off inter de underbresh like he bin shot out'n a gun En he want mo'n gone 'fo' Brer Rabbit, he whirl in en skunt de cow en salt de hide down, en den he tuck'n cut up de kyarkiss en stow it 'way in de smoke-house, en den he tuck'n stick de een' er de cow-tail in de groun'. Atter he gone en done all dis, den Brer Rabbit he squall out fer Brer Wolf

"'Run yer, Brer Wolf! Run yer! Yo' cow gwine in de groun'! Run yer!'

"Wen ole Brer Wolf got dar, with he come er scootin', dar wuz Brer Rabbit hol'in' on ter de cow-tail, fer ter keep it fum gwine in de groun' Brer Wolf, he kotch holt, en dey 'gin a pull er two en up come de tail Den Brer Rabbit, he wink his off eye en say, sezee

"'Dar' de tail done pull out en de cow gone,' sezec "But Brer Wolf he wer'n't de man fer ter give it up dat away, en he got 'im a spade, en a pick-axe, en a shovel, en he dig en dig fer dat cow twel diggin' wuz pas' all endu unce, en ole Brer Rabbit he sot up dar in his front po'ch en smoke his seegyar Eve'y time ole Brer Wolf stuck de pick-axe in de clay, Brer Rabbit, he giggle ter his chilluns

"'He diggy, diggy, diggy, but no meat dar' He diggy diggy, diggy, but no meat dar!'

"Now den, honey, you take dis yer w'ip," continued the old man, twining the leather thong around the little boy's neck, "en scamper up ter de big ouse en tell Miss Sally fer ter gin you some un it de nex' time she fine yo' tracks in de sugar-bairl"

MR RABBIT MEETS HIS MATCH AGAIN

Dere wuz nudder man dat sorter play it sharp on Bret Rabbit," said Uncle Remus, as, by some mysterious process, he twisted a hog's bristle into the end of a piece of thread—an operation which the little boy watched with great interest. "In dem days," continued the old man, 'de beastesses kvar'd on marters same ez fokes. Dey went inter fahmin', en I speck ef de troof wuz ter come out, dey kep' sto, en had der camp-meetin times en der bobbycues w'en de wedder wuz 'gieeble'."

Uncle Remus evidently thought that the little boy wouldn't like to hear of any further discomfiture of Brer. Rabbit, who had come to be a sort of hero, and he was not mistaken

"I thought the Terrapin was the only one that fooled the Rabbit," said the little boy, dismally

"Hit's des like I tell you, honey Dey ain't no smart man, 'cep' w'at dey's a smarter Ef ole Brer Rabbit hadn't cr got kotch up wid, de nabers 'ud er tuck 'im for a hant, en in dem times dey bu'nt witches 'fo' you could squinch yo' eyeballs Dey did dat"

'Who fooled the Rabbit this time?" the little boy asked:
When Uncle Remus had the bristle "sot" in the thread,
he proceeded with the story

"One time Brer Rabbit en ole Brer Buzzard 'cluded dey'd sorter go snacks, en crap tergedder Hit wuz a mighty good year, en de truck tu'n out monstus well, but bameby, w'en de time come fer dividjun, hit come ter light dat ole Brer Buzzard ain't got nuthin' De crap wuz all gone, en dey want nuthin' dar fer ter show fer it Brer Rabbit, he make like he in a wuss fix'n Brer Buzzard, en he mope 'roun', he did, like he fear'd dey gwineter sell c' im out

"Brer Buzzard, he am't sayın' nuthın', but he keep up a monstus thınkin', en one day he come 'long en holler en tell Brer Rabbit dat he done fine rich gole-mine des

"You come en go 'longer me, Brer Rabbit,' sez Brer Tukky Buzzard, sezee. 'I'll scratch en you kin grabble, en 'tween de two un us we'll make short wuk er dat golemine,' sezee

"Brer Rabbit, he wuz high up fer de job, but he study en study, he did, how he gwineter git 'cross de water, so kaze et y time he git his foot wet all de fambly kotch cole Den he up n ax Brer Buzzard how he gwine do, en Brer Buzzard he up n say dat he kyar Brer Rabbit 'cross, en wid dat ole Brer Buzzard, he squot down, he did, en spread his wings, en Brer Rabbit, he mounted, en up dey tiz. There was a pause

"What did the Buzzard do then?" asked the little boy "Dey riz," continued Uncle Remus, "en w'en dey lit, dey lit in de top er de highest sorter pine, en de pine w'at dey lit in wuz growin' on er ilun, en de ilun wuz in 60 de middle er de river, wid de deep water runnin' all 'roun' Dey ain't mo'n lit 'fo' Brer Rabbit, he know w'ich way de win' 'uz blowin', en by de time ole Brer Buzzard got hisse'f ballunce on a lim', Brer Rabbit, he up'n say, sezee

"'W'iles we er res'n here, Brer Buzzard, en bein's you bin so good, I got sump'n fer ter tell you, sezee 'I got a gole-mine er my own, one w'at I make myse'f, en I speck we better go back ter mine 'fo' we bodder longer yone,' sezee

"Den ole Brer Buzzard, he laff, he did, twel he shake, en Brer Rabbit, he sing out

"'Hole on, Brer Buzzard' Don't flop yo' wings w'en you laff, kaze den ef you duz, sump n'ill drap fum up yer, en my gole-mine won't do you no good, en needer will yone do me no good'

"But 'fo' dey got down fum dar, Brer Rabbit done role all 'bout de crap, en he hatter promus fer ter 'vide fa'r en squar So Brer Buzzard, he kyar 'im back, en Brer Rabbit he walk weak in de knees a mont' atter- 80 wuds"

Nights with Uncle Remus

MR BENJAMIN RAM AND HIS WONDERFUL FIDDLE

I 'speck you done year tell er ole man Benjermun Ram," said Uncle Remus, with a great affectation of indifference, after a pause

"Old man who?" asked the little boy.

"Old man Benjermun Ram I speck you done year tell er him too long go ter talk bout"

"Why, no, I haven't, Uncle Remus!" exclaimed the little boy, protesting and laughing "He must have been a mighty funny old man."

"Dar's ez may be," responded Uncle Remus, sententiously "Fun deze days wouldn't er counted fer fun in dem days, en many's de time wat I see folks laughin'," continued the old man, with such withering sarcasm that the little boy immediately became serious,—"many's de time w'at I sees um laughin' en laughin', wen I lay dey ain't kin tell w'at deyer laughin' at deyse'f En 'tain't der laughin' w'at pesters me, nudder,"—relenting a little,—"hit's dish yer ev'lastin' snickle en giggle, giggle en snickle."

Having thus mapped out, in a dim and uncertain way, what older people than the little boy might have been excused for accepting as a sort of moral basis, Uncle Remus proceeded

"Dish yer Mr Benjermun Ram, wich he done come up inter my min', was one er deze yer ole-timers. Dey tells me dat he 'uz a fiddler fum away back yander—one er dem ar kinder fiddlers wat can't git de chune down fine less dey pats der foot. He stay all by he own-alone se'f way out in de middle un a big new-groun', en he sech a so handy man fer ter have at a frolic dat de yuther creeture. Iike 'im mighty well, en w'en dey tuck a notion fer ter shake der foot, w'ich de notion tuck'n' struck um eve'y once in a w'ile, nuthin' 'ud do but dey mus' sen' fer ole man Benjermun Ram en he fiddle, en dey do say," continued Uncle Remus, closing his eyes in a sort of ecstasy,

"dat w'en he squar' hisse'f back in a cheer, en git in a weavin' way, he kin des snatch dem old-time chunes fum who lay de rail En den, w'en de frolic wuz done, dey'd all fling in, dem yuther creeturs would, en fill up a bag er peas fer ole Mr. Benjermun Ram fer ter kyar home wid 'im

"One time, des 'bout Christmas, Miss Meadows en Miss Motts en de gals, dey up 'n' say dat dey'd sorter gin a blow-out, en dey got wud ter ole man Benjermun Ram wich dey 'speckted 'im fer ter be on han' W'en de time come fer Mr Benjermun Ram fer ter start, de win' blow cole en de cloud 'gun ter spread out 'cross de elements-but no marter fer dat, ole man Benjermun Ram tuck down he walkin'-cane, he did, en tie up de fiddle in a bag, en sot out fer Miss Meadows He thunk he know de way, but hit keep on gittin' col'er, en col'er, en mo' cloudy, twel bimeby, fus' news you know, ole Mr. Benjermun Ram done lose de way Ef he'd er kep' on down de big road fum de start, it moughter bin diffunt, but he tuck a nigh-cut, en he ain't git fur 'fo' he done los' sho' 'nuff He go dis away, en he go dat away. en he go de yuther way, yit all de same he wus done los Some folks would er sot right flat down whar dey wus en study out de way, but ole man Benjermun Ram ain't got wrinkle on he hawn fei nothin', kaze he done got de name er ole Billy Hardhead long 'fo' dat Den ag'in, some folks would er stop right still in der tracks en holler en bawl fer ter see ef dey can't roust up some er de neighbors, but ole Mr Benjermun Ram, he des stick he jowl in de win', he did, en he march right on des 'zackly like he know he ain't gwine de wrong way He keep on, but 'twan't long 'fo' he 'gun ter feel right lonesome, mo' speshually w'en hit come up in he min' how Miss Meadows en de galls en all de comp'ny be bleedz ter do de bes' dey kin bidout any fiddlin', en hit kinder make he marrer git cole w'en he study 'bout how he gotter sleep out dar in de woods by hisse'f

"Yit, all de same, he keep on twel de dark 'gun ter drap down, en den he keep on still, en bimeby he come ter a little rise whar dey wuz a clay-gall Wen he git dar he stop en look 'roun', he did, en 'way off down in de holler, dar he see a light shinin', en w'en he see dis, ole

"'Who dat?'

"Tm Mr. Benjermun Ram, en I done lose de way, en I come fer ter ax you ef you can't take me in fer de night,' sezee

"In common," continued Uncle Remus, "ole Mr. Beniermun Ram wuz a mighty rough-en-spoken somebody, but you better b'leeve he talk monst'us perlite dis time

'Den some un on t'er side er de do' ax Mr. Benjermun Ram fer ter walk right in, en wid dat he open de do' en walk in, en make a bow like fiddlin' folks does w'en dev goes in comp'ny, but he ain't no sooner made he bow en look 'roun' twel he 'gun ter shake en shiver lak he done bin stricken wid de swamp ager, kaze, settin' right dar 'fo' de fier wuz ole Brer Wolf, wid his toofies showin' up all w'ite en shiny like dey wuz bran new Ef ole Mr Benjermun Ram ain't bin so ole en stiff I boun vou he'd er broke en run, but 'mos' 'fo' he had time fer ter study 'bout gittin' 'way, ole Brer Wolf done bin jump up en shet de do' en fassen' 'er wid a great big chain. "Den Brer Wolf tuck'n' flung 'n'er lighter'd-knot on de fier, en den he slip inter de back room, en present'y, w'iles ole Mr Benjermun Ram wuz settin' dar shakin' in he shoes, he year Brer Wolf whispun' ter he ole oman fresh meat fer supper! Fling 'way yo' smoke meat—fresh meat fer supper!'

"Den ole Miss Wolf, she talk out loud, so Mr. Benjermun Ram kin year.

"'Tooby sho' I'll fix 'im some supper. We er 'way off yer in de woods, so fur fum comp'ny dat goodness knows I'm mighty glad ter see Mr. Benjermun Ram'

"Den Mr. Benjermun Ram year ole Miss Wolf whettin' 'er knife on a rock—shirrah! shirrah! shirrah!—en ev'y time he year de knife say shirrah! he know he dat much nigher de dinner-pot. He know he can't git 'way, en w'iles he settin' dar studyin', hit 'come 'cross he min' dat he des mought ez well play one mo' chune on he fiddle 'fo' de wuss come ter de wuss Wid dat he ontie de bag 60 en take out de fiddle, en 'gun ter chune 'er up—plink, plank, plunk, plunk, plunk, plunk, plunk, plunk'"

Uncle Remus's imitation of the tuning of a fiddle was marvellous enough to produce a startling effect upon a much less enthusiastic listener than the little boy. It was given in perfect good faith, but the serious expression on the old man's face was so irresistibly comic that the child laughed until the tears ran down his face. Uncle Remus very properly accepted this as a tribute to his wonderful resources as a story-teller, and continued, in 70 great good-humor.

"Wen ole Miss Wolf year dat kinder fuss, co'se she dunner w'at is it, en she drap 'er knife en lissen Ole Mr. Benjermun Ram ain't know dis, en he keep on chunin' up—plank, plink, plank, plank/ Den ole Miss Wolf, she tuck'n' hunch Brer Wolf wid'er elbow, en she sav, sez she

"'Hey, ole man! w'at dat?'

"'Den bofe un um cock up der years en lissen, en des bout dat time, ole Mr Benjermun Ram he sling de butt 80 er de fiddle up und he chin, en struck up one er dem ole-time chunes."

"Well, what tune was it, Uncle Remus?" the little boy asked, with some display of impatience

"Ef I ain't done gone en fergit dat chune off'n my min'," continued Uncle Remus; "hit sorter went like dat ar song 'bout 'Sheep shell co'n wid de rattle er his ho'n,' en yit hit mout er been dat ar yuther one 'bout 'Roll de key, ladies, roll dem keys.' Brer Wolf

Sarah Orne Jewett

1849 · 1909

"If I were asked to name three American books," wrote Willa Cather in 1925, "which have the possibility of a long, long life, I would say at once, The Scarlet Letter, Huckleberry Finn, and The Country of the Pointed Firs I can think of no others that confront time and change so serenely."

Sarah Orne Jewett, the author of The Country of the Pointed Firs, was born in the village of South Berwick, in the southwest corner of Maine, just ten miles from the seacoast. Although she became a cosmopolitan person, traveling in Europe and spending a good deal of time with friends in Boston (Annie Fields, Howells, Thomas Bailey Aldrich, and others), South Berwick was her lifelong home and she always returned there to write Like all good regionalists, she believed with Whittier that > he who wanders widest lifts No more of beauty's jealous veils Than he who from his doorway sees The miracle of flowers and trees

Her formal schooling was irregular and fragmentary. Her real education for writing came from riding and talking with her father, a country doctor, as he visited his many patients in the fishing villages and on the upland farms, and from reading in her father's library

Although she read widely in the modern English and Continental novel (in Jane Austen, Thackeray, Flaubert, Tolstoy), she was influenced especially by Mrs Stowe's account of life along the Maine coast and by Howells, who had emphasized, in A Chance Acquaintance, the pleasure in finding out the small graces and beauties of the poverty-stricken subjects" Her first story appeared in the Atlantic Monthly in 1869, when she was only twenty In 1877 was published Deepharen, a collection of stories and sketches about a Maine village, nominally Deephaven but really South Berwick Miss Jewett wrote many such sketches and stories, which appeared at frequent intervals in the Atlantic and were collected from time to time in book form Country By-Ways (1881). A White Heron and Other Stories (1886), A Native of Winby and Other Tales (1893), The Country of the Pointed Firs (1896) are a partial list.

"The thing that teases the mind over and over for years," Miss Jewett once said, "and at last gets itself put down rightly on paper—whether little or great, it belongs to Literature." Her work shows the knowledge that comes only with long saturation, and the fine selective process of the artist. Her stories of New England are the best that have been written since Hawthorne. They are not as great as Hawthorne's (Miss Cather's praise, quoted earlier, is a little extravagant), because Miss Jewett lacks Hawthorne's grasp, his tragic power. She deals with the gentle, the amiable, the picturesque, and, at times, the trivial, and she sometimes fails to make their significance convincing. But her work is authentic literary art she adds a delicate grace to the New England spareness. Her best writing has been justly called "a miracle in pastel shades".

The Courting of Sister Wisby

Discursive and plotless, "The Courting of Sister Wisby" finds ample literary justification in its portrayal of New England life and manners. The author herself is present in the story, and the characters are seen from her point of view. Although the critical reader may detect the faintest suggestion of condescension toward "dear old Mrs. Goodsoe" and the others and an air of exhibiting them as interesting "specimens," Miss Jewett's treatment is firmly based upon an intimate knowledge and a genuine sympathy.

The story was printed in The King of Folly Island and Other People, 1888.

All the morning there had been an increasing temptation to take an out-door holiday, and early in the afternoon the temptation outgrew my power of resistance A far-away pasture on the long southwestern slope of a high hill was persistently present to my mind, yet there seemed to be no particular reason why I should think of it. I was not sure that I wanted anything from the pasture, and there was no sign, except the temptation, that the pasture wanted anything of me. But I was on the farther side of as many as three fences before I to stopped to think again where I was going, and why.

There is no use in trying to tell another person about that afternoon unless he distinctly remembers weather exactly like it. No number of details concerning an Arctic ice-blockade will give a single shiver to a child of the tropics. This was one of those perfect New England days in late summer, when the spirit of autumn takes a first stealthy flight, like a spy, through the ripening country-side, and, with feigned sympathy for those who droop with August heat, puts her cool cloak of bracting air about leaf and flower and human shoulders. Every living thing grows suddenly cheerful and strong, it is only when you catch sight of a horror-stricken little maple in swamp soil—a little maple that has second sight and fore-knowledge of coming disaster to her race—only then does a distrust of autumn's friendliness dim your joyful satisfaction.

In midwinter there is always a day when one has the first foretaste of spring; in late August there is a morning when the air is for the first time autumn-like. Perhaps it is a hint to the squirrels to get in their first supplies for the winter hoards, or a reminder that summer will soon end, and everybody had better make the most of it. We are always looking forward to the passing and ending of winter, but when summer is here it seems as if summer must always last. As I went across the fields that day, I found myself half lamenting that the world must fade again, even that the best of her budding and bloom was only a preparation for another springtime, for an awakening beyond the coming winter's sleep

The sun was slightly veiled, there was a chattering group of birds, which had gathered for a conference about their early migration Yet, oddly enough, I heard 20 the voice of a belated bobolink, and presently saw him rise from the grass and hover leisurely, while he sang a brief tune. He was much behind time if he were still a housekeeper, but as for the other birds who listened, they cared only for their own notes An old crow went sagging by, and gave a croak at his despised neighbor, just as a black reviewer croaked at Keats-so hard it is to be just to one's contemporaries The bobolink was indeed singing out of season, and it was impossible to say whether he really belonged most to this summer or 3) to the next. He might have been delayed on his northward journey, at any rate, he had a light heart now, to judge from his song, and I wished that I could ask him a few questions-how he liked being the last man among the bobolinks, and where he had taken singing lessons in the South

Presently I left the lower fields, and took a path that led higher, where I could look beyond the village to the northern country mountainward. Here the sweet fern grew thick and fragrant, and I also found myself heedlessly treading on pennyroyal. Nearby, in a field corner, I long ago made a most comfortable seat by putting a stray piece of board and bit of rail across the angle of the fences. I have spent many a delightful hour there, in the shade and shelter of a young pitch-pine and a wild-cherry tree, with a lovely outlook toward the village, just far enough away beyond the green slopes and tall elms of the lower meadows But that day I still had the feeling of being outward bound, and did not turn aside nor linger. The high pasture land grew more and more enticing.

I stopped to pick some blackberries that twinkled at me like beads among their dry vines, and two or three vellow-birds fluttered up from the leaves of a thistle and then came back again, as if they had complacently discovered that I was only an overgrown yellow-bird. in strange disguise but perfectly harmless They made me feel as if I were an intruder, though they did not offer to peck at me, and we parted company very soon. It was good to stand at last on the great shoulder of the hill The wind was coming in from the sea, there was a fine a fragrance from the pines, and the air grew sweeter every moment I took new pleasure in the thought that in a piece of wild pasture land like this one may get closest to Nature, and subsist upon what she gives of her own free will. There have been no drudging, heavy-shod ploughmen to overturn the soil, and vex it into yielding artificial crops Here one has to take just what Nature is pleased to give, whether one is a yellow-bird or a human being It is very good entertainment for a summer wayfarer, and I am asking my reader now to share the winter provision which I harvested that day Let us hope that the small birds are also faring well after their fashion, but I give them an anxious thought while the snow goes hurrying in long waves across the buried fields this windy winter night.

I next went farther down the hill, and got a drink of fresh cool water from the brook, and pulled a tender sheaf of sweet flag beside it. The mossy old fence just beyond was the last barrier between me and the pasture which had sent an invisible messenger earlier in the day, but I saw that somebody else had come first to the rendezvous there was a brown gingham cape-bonnet and a sprigged shoulder-shawl bobbing up and down, a little way off among the junipers. I had taken such uncommon pleasure in being alone that I instantly felt a sense of disappointment; then a warm glow of pleasant satisfaction rebuked my selfishness. This could be no one but dear old Mrs. Goodsoe, the friend of my childhood.

d fond dependence of my maturer years I had not en her for many weeks, but here she was, out on one her famous campaigns for herbs, or perhaps just rerning from a blueberrying expedition I approached ith care, so as not to startle the gingham bonnet, but e heard the rustle of the bushes against my dress, and oked up quickly, as she knelt, bending over the turf. that position she was hardly taller than the luxuriant nipers themselves.

"I'm a-gittin' in my mulleins," she said briskly, "an' re been thinking o' you these twenty times since I come it o' the house. I begun to believe you must ha' foror me at last"

"I have been away from home," I explained. "Why on't you get in your pennyroyal too? There's a great lantation of it beyond the next fence but one"

"Pennyr'yal1" repeated the dear old woman, with an r of compassion for inferior knowledge, "'tain't the ght time, darlin'. Pennyr'yal's too rank now But for sulleins this day is prime. I've got a dreadful graspin' t for 'em this year; seems if I must be goin' to need 'em xtry. I feel like the squirrels must when they know a ard winter's comin" And Mrs Goodsoe bent over her ork again, while I stood by and watched her carefully ut the best fullgrown leaves with a clumsy pair of scisors, which might have served through at least half a entury for herb-gathering They were fastened to her pron-strings by a long piece of list.

"I'm going to take my jack-knife and help you," I uggested, with some fear of refusal "I just passed a lourishing family of six or seven heads that must have een growing on purpose for you"

"Now be keerful, dear heart," was the anxious reponse, "choose 'em well There's odds in mulleins same's here is in angels Take a plant that's all run up to stalk, and there ain't but little goodness in the leaves This one I'm at now must ha' been stepped on by some creatur and blighted of its bloom, and the leaves is han'some! When I was small I used to have a notion that Adam an' Eve must a took mulleins for their winter wear Ain't they just like flannel, for all the world? I've had experience, and I know there's plenty of sickness might be saved to folks if they'd quit horse-radish and such fiery, exasperating things, and use mullein drarves in proper season Now I shall spread these an' dry 'em nice on my spare floor in the garrit, an' come to steam 'em for use along in the winter there'll be the vally of the whole sum mer's goodness in 'em, sartin." And she snipped awawith the dull scissors while I listened respectfully, and took great pains to have my part of the harvest presen a good appearance

"This is most too dry a head," she added presently, a little out of breath "There1 I can tell you there's win'row o' young doctors bilin' over with book-larnin', that i truly ignorant of what to do for the sick, or how to p'in out those paths that well people foller toward sickness Book-fools I call 'em, them young men, an' some on 'en never'll live to know much better, if they git to b Methuselahs In my time every middle-aged woman wh had brought up a family had some proper ideas of dealir with complaints I won't say but there was some fool amongst them but I'd rather take my chances, unles they'd forsook herbs and gone to dealin' with patent stuf Now my mother really did sense the use of herbs an roots. I never see anybody that come up to her. SI was a meek-looking woman, but very understanding mother was"

"Then that's where you learned so much yourself, Mr Goodsoe," I ventured to say

"Bless your heart, I don't hold a candle to her, 'tis b little I can recall of what she used to say No, her l'arni died with her," said my friend, in a self-deprecating toi "Why, there was as many as twenty kinds of roots alor that she used to keep by her, that I forgot the use of, a I'm sure I shouldn't know where to find most of 'er any There was an herb"--airb she called it-"an he called masterwort, that she used to get way from Pen sylvany, and she used to think everything of noble-live wort, but I never could seem to get the right effects fro it as she could Though I don't know as she ever real did use masterwort where somethin' else wouldn't served She had a cousin married out in Pennsylva that used to take pains to get it to her every year or tv and so she felt 't was important to have it. rec'lect mother always used to maintain that folks was meant to be doctored with the stuff that grew right about 'em, 'twas sufficient, an' so ordered. That was before the whole population took to livin' on wheels, the way they do now 'Twas never my idee that we was meant to know what's goin' on all over the world to once There's goin' to be some sort of a set-back one o' these days, with these telegraphs an' things, an' letters comin' every hand's turn, and folks leavin' their proper work to answer 'em I may not live to see it 'Twas allowed to be difficult for folks to get about in old times, or to git word across the country, and they stood in their lot an' place, and weren't all just alike, either, same as pine-spills''

We were kneeling side by side now, as if in penitence for the march of progress, but we laughed as we turned to look at each other.

"Do you think it did much good when everybody brewed a cracked quart mug of herb-tea?" I asked, walking away on my knees to a new mullein.

"I've always lifted my voice against the practice, far's I could," declared Mrs Goodsoe, "an' I won't deal out none o' the herbs I save for no such nonsense. There was three houses along our road-I call no names-where you couldn't go into the livin' room without findin' a mess o' herb-tea drorin' on the stove or side o' the fireplace, winter or summer, sick or well. One was thoroughwut, one would be camomile, and the other, like as not, yellow dock, but they all used to put in a little new rum to git out the goodness, or keep it from spilin'" (Mrs 30 Goodsoe favored me with a knowing smile) "Land, how mother used to laugh! But poor creatures, they had to work hard, and I guess it never done 'em a mite o' harm, they was all good herbs. I wish you could hear the quawkin' there used to be when they was indulged with a real case o' sickness Everybody would collect from far an' near, you'd see 'em coming along the road and across the pastures then, everybody clamorin' that nothin' would do no kind o' good but her choice o' teas or drarves to the feet. I wonder there was a babe lived to 10 grow up in the whole lower part o' the town, an' if nothin' else 'peared to ail 'em, word was passed about that 'twas likely Mis' So-and-So's last young one was goin' to be foolish Land, how they'd gather! I know one day the doctor come to Widder Peck's and the house was crammed so't he could scercely git inside the door, and he says, just as polite, 'Do send for some of the neighbors!' as if there wa'n't a soul to turn to, right or left, You'd ought to seen 'em begin to scatter."

"But don't you think the cars and telegraphs have given people more to interest them, Mrs Goodsoe? Don't you believe people's lives were narrower then, and more taken up with little things?" I asked, unwisely, being a product of modern times.

"Not one mite, dear," said my companion stoutly "There was as big thoughts then as there is now, these times was born o' them. The difference is in folks themselves, but now, instead o' doin' their own housekeepin' and watchin' their own neighbors-though that was carried to excess—they git word that a niece's child is ailin' the other side o' Massachusetts, and they drop everything: and git on their best clothes, and off they jiggit in the cars 'Tis a bad sign when folks wear out their best clothes faster 'n they do their everyday ones. The other side o' Massachusetts has got to look after itself by rights An' besides that, Sunday-keepin's all gone out o' fashion Some lays it to one thing an' some another, but some o' them old ministers that folks are all a-sighin' for did preach a lot o' stuff that wa'n't nothin' but chaff, 'twa'n't the word o' God out o' either Old Testament or New But everybody went to meetin' and heard it, and come home, and was set to fightin' with their next door neigh bor over it Now I'm a believer, and I try to live a Christian life, but I'd as soon hear a surveyor's book read out, figgers an' all, as try to get any simple truth out o' most sermons It's them as is most to blame"

"What was the matter that day at Widow Peck s?" I hastened to ask, for I knew by experience that the good, clear-minded soul beside me was apt to grow unduly vexed and distressed when she contemplated the state of religious teaching

"Why, there wa'n't nothin' the matter, only a gal o' Miss Peck's had met with a dis'pintment and had gone into screechin' fits 'Twas a rovin' creatur' that had come along hayin' time, and he'd gone off an' forsook her betwixt two days, nobody ever knew what become of him Them Pecks was 'Good Lord, anybody!' kind o' gals, and took up with whoever they could get One of 'em married Heron, the Irishman, they lived in that little house that was burnt this summer, over on the edge o' the plains

He was a good-hearted creatur, with a laughin eye and a clever word for everybody. He was the first Irishman that ever came this way, and we was all for gettin a look at him, when he first used to go by. Mother's folks was what they call Scotch-Irish, though; there was an old race of 'em settled about here. They could foretell events, some on 'em, and had second sight. I know tolks used to say mother's grandmother had them gifts, but mother was never free to speak about it to us. She remembered the well, too."

"I suppose that you mean old Jim Heron, who was such a famous fiddler?" I asked with great interest, for I am always delighted to know more about that rustic hero, parochial Orpheus that he must have been!

"Now, dear heart, I suppose you don't remember him, do you?" replied Mrs Goodsoe, earnestly "Fiddle! He'd about break your heart with them tunes of his, or else set your heels flying up the floor in a jig, though you was minister o' the First Parish and all wound up for a funeral prayer I tell ye there ain't no tunes sounds like them used to. It used to seem to me summer nights when I was comin' along the plains road, and he set by the window playin', as if there was a bewitched human creatur' in that old red fiddle o' his He could make it sound just like a woman's voice tellin' somethin' over and over, as if folks could help her out o' her sorrows if she could only make 'em understand I've set by the stonewall and cried as if my heart was broke, and dear knows it wa'n't in them days. How he would twirl off them 33 jigs and dance tunes! He used to make somethin' han'some out of 'em in fall an' winter, playin' at huskins and dancin' parties, but he was unstiddy by spells, as he got along in years, and never knew what it was to be forehanded Everybody felt bad when he died, you couldn't help likin' the creatur'. He'd got the gift—that's all you could say about 1t.

"There was a Mis' Jerry Foss, that lived over by the brook bridge, on the plains road, that had lost her husband early, and was left with three child'n. She set the world by 'em, and was a real pleasant, ambitious little woman, and was workin' on as best she could with that little farm, when there come a rage o' scarler fever, and her boy and two girls was swept off and laid dead within the same week. Every one o' the neighbors did what they could, but she'd had no sleep since they was taken sick, and after the funeral she set there just like a piece

o' marble, and would only shake her head when you spoke to her. They all thought her reason would go; and 'twould certain, if she couldn't have shed tears. An' one o' the neighbors—'twas like mother's sense, but it so might have been somebody else-spoke o' Jim Heron. Mother an' one or two o' the women that knew her best was in the house with her. 'T was right in the edge o' the woods and some of us younger ones was over by the wall on the other side of the road where there was a couple of old willows--I remember just how the brook damp felt-and we kept quiet's we could, and some other folks come along down the road, and stood waitin' on the little bridge, hopin' somebody'd come out, I suppose, and they'd git news Everybody was wrought up, and telt a 60 good deal for her, you know By an' by Jim Heron come stealin' right out o' the shadows an' set down on the doorstep, an 'twas a good while before we heard a sound, then, oh, dear met twas what the whole neighborhood felt for that mother all spoke in the notes, an' they told me afterwards that Mis' Foss's face changed in a minute, and she come right over an' got into my mother's lapshe was a little woman-an' laid her head down, and there she cried herself into a blessed sleep. After a while one o' the other women stole out an' told the folks, and 70 we all went home He only played that one tune

"But there!" resumed Mrs Goodsoe, after a silence, during which my eyes were filled with teais. "His wife always complained that the fiddle made her nervous She never 'peared to think nothin' o' poor Heron after she'd once got him".

"That's often the way," said I, with harsh cynicism, though I had no guilty person in my mind at the moment, and we went straying off, not very far apart, up through the pasture. Mrs. Goodsoc cautioned me that we must go not get so far off that we could not get back the same day. The sunshine began to feel very hot on our backs, and we both turned toward the shade. We had already collected a large bundle of mullein leaves, which were carefully laid into a clean, calico apron, held together by the four corners, and proudly carried by me, though my companion regarded them with anxious eyes. We sat down together at the edge of the pine woods, and Mrs.

¹⁴ parochial Orpheus The lyre of Orpheus, in Greek mythology, could charm beasts and make trees and rocks move Parochial' means restricted to a parish, provincial

Goodsoe proceeded to fan herself with her limp capebonnet

"I declare, how hot it is! The east wind's all gone again," she said. "It felt so cool this forenoon that I overburdened myself with as thick a petiticoat as any I've got I'm despri't afeared of having a chill, now that I ain't so young as once I hate to be housed up."

"It's only August, after all," I assured her unnecessarily, confirming my statement by taking two peaches out of my pocket, and laying them side by side on the brown pine needles between us.

"Dear sakes alive!" exclaimed the old lady, with evident pleasure "Where did you get them, now? Doesn't anything taste twice better out-o'-doors? I ain't had such a peach for years. Do le's keep the stones, an' I'll plant 'em, it only takes four years for a peach pit to come to bearing, an' I guess I'm good for four years, 'thout I meet with some accident'

I could not help agreeing, or taking a fond look at the thin little figure, and her wrinkled brown face and kind, twinkling eyes. She looked as if she had properly dried herself, by mistake, with some of her mullein leaves, and was likely to keep her goodness, and to last the longer in consequence. There never was a truer, simple-hearted soul made out of the old-fashioned country dust than Mrs. Goodsoe. I thought, as I looked away from her across the wide country, that nobody was left in any of the farmhouses so original, so full of rural wisdom and reminiscence, so really able and dependable, as she. And nobody had made better use of her time in a world foolish enough to sometimes under-value medicinal herbs.

When we had eaten our peaches we still sat under the pines, and I was not without pride when I had poked about in the ground with a little twig, and displayed to my crony a long fine root, bright yellow to the eye, and a wholesome bitter to the taste.

"Yis, dear, goldthread," she assented indulgently. "Seems to me there's more of it than anything except grass an' hardhack. Good for canker, but no better than two or three other things I can call to mind, but I always lay in a good wisp of it, for old times' sake. Now, I want to know why you should a bit it, and took away all the taste o' your nice peach? I was just thinkin' what a han some entertainment we've had. I've got so I 'sociate certain things with certain folks, and goldthread was somethin' Lizy Wisby couldn't keep house without.

no ways whatever. I believe she took so much it kind o' puckered her disposition."

"Lızy Wısby?" I repeated inquiringly.

"You knew her, if ever, by the name of Mis' Deacon shrimblecom," answered my friend, as if this were only a brief preface to further information, so I waited with respectful expectation. Mrs Goodsoe had grown tired out in the sun, and a good story would be an excuse for sufficient rest. It was a most lovely place where we sat, half-way up the long hillside, for my part, I was perfectly contented and happy. "You've often heard of Deacon Brimblecom?" she asked, as if a great deal depended upon his being properly introduced.

"I remember him," said I "They called him Deacon of Brimfull, you know, and he used to go about with a witchhazel branch to show people where to dig wells."

"That's the one," said Mrs Goodsoe, laughing "I didn't know's you could go so far back. I'm always divided between whether you can remember everything I can, or are only a babe in arms."

"I have a dim recollection of there being something strange about their marriage," I suggested, after a pause, which began to appear dangerous — I was so much afraid the subject would be changed

"I can tell you all about it," I was quickly answered "Deacon Brimblecom was very pious accordin' to his lights in his early years. He lived way back in the country then, and there come a rovin' preacher along, and set everybody up that way all by the ears I've heard the old folks talk it over, but I forget most of his doctrine except some of his followers was persuaded they could dwell among the angels while yet on airth, and this Deacon Brimfull, as you call him, felt sure he was called by the voice of a spirit bride So he left a good, deservin : wife he had, an' four children, and built him a new house over to the other side of the land he'd had from his father They didn't take much pains with the buildin' because they expected to be translated before long, and then the spirit brides and them folks was goin' to appear and divide up the airth amongst 'em, and the world's folks and onbelievers was goin' to serve 'em or be sent to torments. They had meetin's about in the schoolhouses, an' all sorts o' goin's on, some on 'em went crazy, but the deacon held on to what wits he had, an' by an' by me spirit bride didn't turn out to be much of a house-keeper an' he had always been used to good livin so he sneaked home ag'in. One o mother's sisters married up to Ash Hill, where it all took place, that's how I come to have the particulars"

"Then how did he come to find his Eliza Wisby?' I inquired "Do tell me the whole story, you've got mullein leaves enough"

"There's all yisterday's at home, if I haven't," replied Mrs. Goodsoe "The way he come a-courtin o' Sister Wisby was this she went a-courtin o' him

"There was a spell he lived to home, and then his poor wife died, and he had a spirit bride in good earnest, an' the child'n was placed about with his folks and hers, for they was both out o' good families, and I don't know what come over him, but he had another pious fit that looked for all the world like the real thing He hadn't no family cares, and he lived with his brother's folks, and turned his land in with theirs. He used to travel to every meetin' an' conference that was within reach of his old sorrel hoss's feeble legs, he j'ined the Christian Baptists that was just in their early prime, and he was a great exhorter, and got to be called deacon, though I guess he wa'n't deacon, 'less it was for a spare hand when deacon timber was scercer'n usual. An' one time there was a four-days' protracted meetin to the church in the lower part of the town 'Twas a real solemn time, somethin' o more n usual was goin' forward, an they collected from the whole country round Women folks liked it, an' the men too, it give 'em a change, an they was quartered round free, same as conference folks now Some on 'em, for a joke, sent Silas Brimblecom up to Lizy Wisby's, though she'd give out she couldn't accommodate nobody because of expectin' her cousin's folks Everybody knew 'twas a lie, she was amazin' close considerin' she had plenty to do with. There was a streak that wa'n't just right somewheres in Lizy's wits, I always thought She 41 was very kind in case o' sickness, I'll say that for her

'You know where the house is, over there on what they call Windy Hill? There the deacon went, all unsuspectin', and 'stead o Lizy's resentin' of him she put in her own hoss, and they come back together to evenin' meetin'. She was prominent among the sect herself, an' he bawled and talked, and she bawled and talked, an'

took up more'n the time allotted in the exercises, just as if they was shown off to each other what they was able to do at expoundin. Everybody was laughin' at 'em after the meetin broke up, and that next day an' the next, so an' all through they was constant, and seemed to be havin' a beautiful occasion. Lizy had always give out she scorned the men, but when she got a chance at a particular one 'twas altogether different, and the deacon seemed to please her somehow or 'nother, and—There' you don't want to listen to this old stuff that's past an 'gone?"

"Oh, yes I do, said I

"I run on like a clock that's onset her striking hand," said Mrs. Goodsoe mildly. "Sometimes my kitchen timepiece goes on half the forenoon, and I says to myself the 60 day before visterday I would let it be a warnin', and keep it in mind for a check on my own speech. The next news that was heard was that the deacon an' Lizy-well, opinions differed which of 'em had spoke first, but them fools settled it before the protracted meetin' was over, and give away their hearts before he started for home They considered 'twould be wise, though, considerin' their short acquaintance, to take one another on trial a spell, twas Lizy's notion, and she asked him why he wouldn't come over and stop with her till spring, and 70 then if they both continued to like, they could git married any time twas convenient. Lizy, she come and talked it over with mother, and mother disliked to offend her, but she spoke pretty plain, and Lizy felt hurt, an' thought they was showin' excellent judgment, so much harm come from hasty unions and folks comin' to a realizin' sense of each other's failin's when 'twas too late

"So one day our folks saw Deacon Brimfull a-ridin' by with a gre't coopful of hens in the back o' his wagon, and bundles o' stuff tied on top and hitched to the exes underneath, and he riz a hymn just as he passed the house, and was speedin' the old sorrel with a willer switch 'Twas most Thanksgivin' time, an' sooner'n she expected him. New Year's was the time she set, but he thought he'd come while the roads was fit for wheels. They was out to meetin' together Thanksgivin' Day, an' that used to be a gre't season for marryin', so the young folks nudged each other, and some on 'em ventured to speak to the couple as they come down the aisle. Lizy carried

It off real well, she wa'n't afraid o' what nobody said or thought, and so home they went. They'd got out her yaller sleigh and her hoss, she never would ride after the deacon's poor old creatur', and I believe it died long o' the winter from stiffenin' up.

"Yes," said Mrs. Goodsoe, emphatically, after we had silently considered the situation for a short space of time, "yes, there was consider'ble talk, now I tell you! The raskil boys pestered 'em just about to death for a while. 10 They used to collect up there an' rap on the winders. and they'd turn out all the deacon's hens 'long at nine o'clock o' night, and chase 'em all over the dingle, an' one night they even lugged the pig right out o' the sty, and shoved it into the back entry, an' run for their lives They'd stuffed its mouth full o' somethin', so it couldn't squeal till it got there. There wa'n't a sign o' nobody to be seen when Lizy hasted out with the light, and she an' the deacon had to persuade the creatur' back as best they could, 'twas a cold night, and they said it took 'em till 20 towards mornin' You see the deacon was just the kind of a man that a hog wouldn't budge for, it takes a masterful man to deal with a hog Well, there was no end to the works nor the talk, but Lizy left 'em pretty much alone. She did pear kind of dignified about it. I must say!"

"And then, were they married in the spring?"

"I was tryin' to remember whether it was just before Fast Day or just after," responded my friend, with a careful look at the sun, which was nearer the west than either 30 of us had noticed "I think likely 'twas along in the last o' April, any way some of us looked out o' the window one Monday mornin' early, and says, 'For goodness' sake! Lizy's sent the deacon home again!' His old sorrel havin' passed away, he was ridin in Ezry Welsh's hoss-cart, with his hen-coop and more bundles than he had when he come, and looked as meechin' as ever you see Ezry was drivin', and he let a glance fly swiftly round to see if any of us was lookin' out, an' then I declare if he didn't have the malice to turn right in towards the barn, where 40 he see my oldest brother, Joshuay, an' says he real natural. Joshuay, just step out with your wrench I believe I hear my kingbolt rattlin' kind o' loose' Brother, he went out an' took in the sitooation, an' the deacon bowed kind of stiff. Joshuay was so full o' laugh, and Ezry Welsh, that they couldn't look one another in the face. There wa'n't nothing ailed the kingbolt, you know, an' when

Josh riz up he says, 'Goin' up country for a spell, Mr Brimblecom'

"I be,' says the deacon, lookin' dreadful mortified and cast down.

"'Ain't things turned out well with you an' Sister Wisby?' says Joshuay. 'You had ought to remember that the woman is the weaker vessel.'

"'Hang her, let her carry less sail, then!' the deacon bu'st out, and he stood right up an' shook his fist there by the hen-coop, he was so mad, an' Ezry's hoss was a young creatur' an' started up and set the deacon right over backwards into the chips. We didn't know but he'd broke his neck, but when he see the women folks runnin out he jumped up quick as a cat, an' clim' into the cart, an' off they went. Ezry said he told him that he couldn't git along with Lizy, she was so fractious in thundery weather, if there was a rumble in the daytime she must go right to bed an' screech, and if 'twas night she must git right up an' go an' call him out of a sound sleep. But everybody knew he'd never a gone home unless she'd sent him.

"Somehow they made it up ag'in, him an' Lizy, and she had him back. She'd been countin' all along on not havin' to hire nobody to work about the gardin an' so on, an' she said she wa'n't goin' to let him have a whole winter's board for nothin'. So the old hens was moved back, and they was married right off fair an' square, an I don't know but they got along well as most folks He brought his youngest girl down to live with 'em after a while, an' she was a real treasure to Lizy, everybody spoke well o' Phœbe Brimblecom. The deacon got over his pious fit, and there was consider'ble work in him if you kept right after him. He was an amazin' ciderdrinker, and he airnt the name you know him by in his » latter days Lizy never trusted him with nothin', but she kep' him well. She left everything she owned to Phœbe when she died, 'cept somethin' to satisfy the law. There, they're all gone now, seems to me sometimes, when I get thinkin', as if I'd lived a thousand years!"

I laughed, but I found Mrs. Goodsoe's thoughts had taken a serious turn.

"There, I come by some old graves down here in the lower edge of the pasture," she said as we rose to go. "I couldn't help thinking how I should like to be laid right out in the pasture ground, when my time comes, it looked sort o' comfortable, and I have ranged these slopes so many summers. Seems as if I could see right up through the turf and tell when the weather was pleasant, and get the goodness o' the sweet fern. Now, dear, just hand me my aperiful o' mulleins out o' the shade. I hope you won't come to need none this winter, but I'll dry some special for you."

Tm going by the road," said I, "or else by the path across the meadows, so I will walk as far as the house with you. Aren't you pleased with my company?" for she demurred at my going the least bit out of the way.

So we strolled toward the little gray house, with our plunder of mullein leaves slung on a stick which we carried between us. Of course I went in to make a call, as if I had not seen my hostess before, she is the last maker of muster-gingerbread, and before I came away I was a kindly measured for a pair of mittens

Mary E. Wilkins Freeman

1852 · 1930

The most realistic of the New England local colorists, Mary E. Wilkins was born in Randolph, a village in eastern Massachusetts She attended the schools of Randolph and of Brattleboro, Vermont, where her family lived for a while and her father kept a store, and she spent one year (1870-1871) at Mount Holyoke Female Seminary After the death of her parents in 1883, she returned to her native village to live, the Massachusetts village and the country around it furnished the materials for her early stories. The best of these are found in A Humble Romance and Other Stories (1887), A New England Nun and Other Stories (1891), and People of Our Neighborhood (1898) After her marriage in 1902 to Dr Charles M Freeman of Metuchen, New Jersey, Mrs Freeman attempted, with indifferent success, to enlarge the scope of her writing Despite a voluminous and varied output, her reputation and importance still rest upon the early stories of Massachusetts village and rural life

The style of these stories is as spare and angular as the characters it is used to describe. The stories themselves are concentrated and dramatic they move inexorably to a climax which often takes the form of open revolt. For, in the author's view, the New England nature holds within itself "the elements of revolution" this repressed nature "has a floodgate, and the power which it releases is an accumulation" Compared with Miss Jewett, she is pessimistic "What Miss Jewett with her love of the idyllic did not see," says Parringion, "—the grim and stark ugliness that resulted from the long Puritan repression—Mary Wilkins was to make the very warp of her work." Van Wyck Brooks, however, regards the ugliness in the lives of Miss Wilkins' people as less important than the heroism. "Better than anyone else, she pictured the powers of last resistance in the Yankee soul.... All these villagers lived with a vengeance... Thus, underneath Miss Wilkins's village something lurked that was still sublime." Such an interpretation would seem to have been at least a part of the author's intention. A case in point is Sarah Penn in "The Revolt of 'Mother'" she performed a 'feat," says the author, which "was equal in its way to Wolfe's storming of the Heights of Abraham."

The Revolt of 'Mother'

"The Revolt of 'Mother'" is remarkable for its penetrating insight into the New England character, for its economy, and for its dramatic power

First printed in Harper's New Monthly Magazine, September 1890, the story was reprinted in A New England Nun and Other Stories, 1891

Father!"

"What is it?"

"What are them men diggin' over there in the field for?"

There was a sudden dropping and enlarging of the lower part of the old man's face, as if some heavy weight had settled therein, he shut his mouth tight, and went on harnessing the great bay mare. He hustled the collar on to her neck with a jerk

"Father!"

The old man slapped the saddle upon the mare's back "Look here, father, I want to know what them men are diggin' over in the field for, an' I'm goin' to know"

"I wish you'd go into the house, mother, an' 'tend to your own affairs," the old man said then. He ran his words together, and his speech was almost as inarticulate as a growl.

But the woman understood, it was her most native tongue "I ain't goin' into the house till you tell me what them men are doin' over there in the field," said she

Then she stood waiting. She was a small woman, short and straight-waisted like a child in her brown cotton gown. Her forehead was mild and benevolent between the smooth curves of gray hair, there were meek downward lines about her nose and mouth, but her eyes, fixed upon the old man, looked as if the meekness had been the result of her own will, never of the will of another.

They were in the barn, standing before the wide open doors. The spring air, full of the smell of growing grass and unseen blossoms, came in their faces. The deep yard in front was littered with farm wagons and piles of wood, on the edges close to the fence and the house, the grass was a vivid green, and there were some dandelions.

The old man glanced doggedly at his wife as he tightened the last buckles on the harness. She looked as immovable to him as one of the rocks in his pastureland, bound to the earth with generations of blackberry vines. He slapped the reins over the horse, and started forth from the barn.

"Father!" said she

The old man pulled up. "What is it?"

"I want to know what them men are diggin' over there in that field for"

"They're diggin' a cellar, I s'pose, if you've got to know"

"A cellar for what?"

"A barn"

"A barn? You am't goin' to build a barn over there where we was goin' to have a house, father?"

The old man said not another word. He hurried the horse into the farm wagon, and clattered out of the yard, touncing as sturdily on his seat as a boy.

The woman stood a moment looking after him, then she went out of the barn across a corner of the yard to the house. The house, standing at right angles with the great barn and a long reach of sheds and out-buildings was infinitesimal compared with them. It was scarcely as commodious for people as the little boxes under the barn eaves were for doves.

A pretty girl's face, pink and delicate as a flower, was looking out of one of the house windows. She was warching three men who were digging over in the field which bounded the yard near the road line. She turned quietly when the woman entered.

"What are they digging for, mother?" said she "Did he tell you?"

'They're diggin' for-a cellar for a new barn '

'Oh, mother, he ain't going to build another barn?'
"That's what he says"

A boy stood before the kitchen glass combing his hair. He combed slowly and painstakingly, arranging his brown hair in a smooth hillock over his forehead. He did not seem to pay any attention to the conversation.

'Sammy, did you know father was going to build a new barn.'" asked the girl

The boy combed assiduously.

Sammy!"

He turned, and showed a face like his father's under us smooth crest of hair. "Yes, I s'pose I did," he said, reluctantly

How long have you known 1t?" asked his mother.

Bout three months, I guess"

Why didn't you tell of it?"

Dida't think 'twould do no good''

I don't see what father wants another barn for," said the girl, in her sweet, slow voice. She turned again to the window, and stared out at the digging men in the field. Her tender, sweet face was full of a gentle distress. Her forehead was as bald and innocent as a baby's with the light hair strained back from it in a row of curle-papers. She was quite large, but her soft curves did not look as if they covered muscles.

Her mother looked sternly at the boy 'Is he goin' to buy more cows?"

The boy did not reply; he was tying his shoes.

"Sammy, I want you to tell me if he's goin' to buy more cows."

"I s'pose he is."

"How many?"

"Four, I guess."

His mother said nothing more. She went into the pantry, and there was a clatter of dishes. The boy got his cap from a nail behind the door, took an old arithmetic from the shelf, and started for school. He was lightly built, but clumsy. He went out of the yard with a curious spring in the hips that made his loose home-made jacket tilt up in the rear.

The girl went to the sink, and began to wash the dishes that were piled up there. Her mother came 60 promptly out of the pantry, and shoved her aside "You wipe 'em," said she, "I'll wash. There's a good many this mornin"."

The mother plunged her hands vigorously into the water, the girl wiped the plates slowly and dreamily "Mother," said she, "don't you think it's too bad father's going to build that new barn, much as we need a decent house to live in?"

Her mother scrubbed a dish fiercely "You ain't found out yet we're women-folks. Nanny Penn," said she 70 "You ain't seen enough of men-folks yet to One of these days you'll find it out, an' then you'll know that we know only what men-folks think we do, so far as any use of it goes, an' how we'd ought to reckon menfolks in with Providence, an' not complain of what they do any more than we do of the weather"

"I don't care, I don't believe George is anything like that, anyhow," said Nanny Her delicate face flushed pink, her lips pouted softly, as if she were going to cry

'You wait an' see I guess George Eastman ain't no so better than other men. You hadn't ought to judge father, though He can't help it, 'cause he don't look at things jest the way we do. An' we've been pretty comfortable here, after all. The roof don't leak—ain't never but once—that's one thing. Father's kept it shingled right up."

"I do wish we had a parlor"

"I guess it won't hurt George Eastman any to come to see you in a nice clean kitchen. I guess a good many girls don't have as good a place as this. Nobody's ever 90 heard me complain."

"I ain't complained either, mother."

"Well, I don't think you'd better, a good father an' a good home as you've got S'pose your father made you go out an' work for your livin'? Lots of girls have to that ain't no stronger an' better able to than you be."

Sarah Penn washed the frying-pan with a conclusive air. She scrubbed the outside of it as faithfully as the inside She was a masterly keeper of her box of a house. Her one living-room never seemed to have in it any of the dust which the friction of life with inanimate matter 10 produces She swept, and there seemed to be no dirt to go before the broom, she cleaned, and one could see no difference. She was like an artist so perfect that he has apparently no art To-day she got out a mixing bowl and a board, and rolled some pies, and there was no more flour upon her than upon her daughter who was doing finer work. Nanny was to be married in the fall, and she was sewing on some white cambric and embroidery. She sewed industriously while her mother cooked, her soft milk-white hands and wrists showed whiter than 20 her delicate work.

"We must have the stove moved out in the shed before long," said Mrs Penn "Talk about not havin' things, it's been a real blessin' to be able to put a stove up in that shed in hot weather Father did one good thing when he fixed that stove-pipe out there"

Sarah Penn's face as she rolled her pies had that expression of meck vigor which might have characterized one of the New Testament saints. She was making mince-pies. Her husband, Adoniram Penn, liked them the sterring other kind. She baked twice a week Adoniram often liked a piece of pie between meals. She hurried this morning. It had been later than usual when she began, and she wanted to have a pie baked for dinner. However deep a resentment she might be forced to hold against her husband, she would never fail in sedulous attention to his wants.

Nobility of character manifests itself at loop-holes when it is not provided with large doors. Sarah Penn's showed itself to-day in flaky dishes of pastry. So she 40 made the pies faithfully, while across the table she could see, when she glanced up from her work, the sight that rankled in her patient and steadfast soul—the digging of the cellar of the new barn in the place where Adoniram forty years ago had promised her their new house should stand.

The pies were done for dinner. Adoniram and Sammy were home a few minutes after twelve o'clock 'The dinner was eaten with serious haste. There was never much conversation at the table in the Penn family Adoniram asked a blessing, and they are promptly, then 5 rose up and went about their work.

Sammy went back to school, taking soft sly lopes out of the yard like a rabbit. He wanted a game of marbles before school, and feared his father would give him some chores to do. Adoniram hastened to the door and called after him, but he was out of sight.

"I don't see what you let him go for, mother," said he "I wanted him to help me unload that wood"

Adoniram went to work out in the yard unloading wood from the wagon Sarah put away the dinner dishes swhile Nanny took down her curl papers and changed her dress She was going down to the store to buy some more embroidery and thread

When Nanny was gone, Mrs Penn went to the door. "Father!" she called.

"Well, what is it!"

"I want to see you jest a minute, father"

"I can't leave this wood nohow I've got to git it un loaded an' go for a load of gravel afore two o'clock Sammy had ought to helped me You hadn't ought to let? him go to school so early"

"I want to see you jest a minute."

"I tell ye I can't, nohow, mother"

"Father, you come here" Sarah Penn stood in the door like a queen; she held her head as if it bore a crown, there was that patience which makes authority royal in her voice. Adoniram went

Mrs Penn led the way into the kitchen, and pointed to a chair. "Sit down, father," said she, "I've got somethin' I want to say to you."

He sat down heavily, his face was quite stolid, but he looked at her with restive eyes "Well, what is it, mother?"

"I want to know what you're buildin' that new barn for, father?"

"I ain't got nothin' to say about it"

"It can't be you think you need another barn?"

"I tell ye I am't got nothin' to say about it, mother, an' I am't goin' to say nothin'."

"Be you goin' to buy more cows?"

Adoniram did not reply, he shut his mouth tight.

"I know you be, as well as I want to. Now, father, look here"-Sarah Penn had not sat down; she stood before her husband in the humble fashion of a Scripture woman-"I'm goin' to talk real plain to you, I never have sence I married you, but I'm goin' to now I ain't never complained, an' I ain't goin' to complain now. but I'm goin' to talk plain. You see this room here. tather: you look at it well. You see there ain't no carpet on the floor, an' you see the paper is all dirty, an' droppin' off the wall We ain't had no new paper on it for ten year, an' then I put it on myself, an it didn't cost but ninepence a roll. You see this room, father; its all the one I've had to work in an' eat in an' sit in sence we was married. There ain't another woman in the whole town whose husband ain't got half the means you have but what's got better It's all the room Nanny's got to have her company in, an' there ain't one of her mates but what's got better, an' their fathers not so ible as hers is. It's all the room she'll have to be married in What would you have thought, father, if we had had our weddin' in a room no better than this? I was married in my mother's parlor, with a carpet on the floor, and stuffed furniture, an' a mahogany card-table. An' this is ill the room my daughter will have to be married in Look here, father!"

Sarah Penn went across the room as though it were a tragic stage. She flung open a door and disclosed a tiny bedroom, only large enough for a bed and bureau, with a path between "There, father," said she—"there's all the room I ve had to sleep in forty year. All my children were born there—the two that died, an' the two that's livin'. I was sick with a fever there."

She stepped to another door and opened it It led into the small, ill-lighted pantry "Here," said she, "is all the buttery I've got—every place I've got for my dishes, to set away my victuals in, an' to keep my milk-pans in. Father, I've been takin' care of the milk of six cows in this place, an' now you're goin' to build a new barn, an' keep more cows, an' give me more to do in it."

She threw open another door A narrow crooked of flight of stairs wound upward from it "There, father," said she, "I want you to look at the stairs that go up to them two unfinished chambers that are all the places our son an daughter have had to sleep in all their lives. There ain't a prettier girl in town nor a more ladylike one than Nanny, an' that's the place she has to sleep in. It ain't so good as your horse's stall, it ain't so warm an' tight."

Sarah Penn went back and stood before her husband. "Now, father," said she, "I want to know if you think you're doin' right an accordin' to what you profess. Here, when we was married, forty year ago, you so promised me faithful that we should have a new house built in that lot over in the field before the year was out. You said you had money enough, an you wouldn't ask me to live in no such place as this. It is forty year now, an you've been makin more money, an I've been savin of it for you ever since an you ain't built no house yet. You've built sheds an 'cow-houses an one new barn, an now you're goin' to build another. Father, I want to know if you think it's right. You're lodgin' your dumb beasts better than you are your own flesh an blood. I so want to know if you think it's right.

"I ain't got nothin' to say."

"You can't say nothin' without ownin' it ain't right, father. An' there's another thing—I ain't complained, I've got along forty year, an' I s'pose I should forty more, if it wasn't for that—if we don't have another house Nanny she can't live with us after she's married. She'll have to go somewhere else to live away from us, an' it don't seem as if I could have it so, noways, father. She wasn't ever strong. She's got considerable color, but 70 there wasn't never any backbone to her. I've always took the heft of everything off her, an' she ain't fit to keep house an' do everything herself. She'll be all worn out inside of a year. Think of her doin' all the washin' an' ironin' an' bakin' with them soft white hands an' arms, an' sweepin'! I can't have it so, noways, father."

Mrs Penn's face was burning, her mild eyes gleamed. She had pleaded her little cause like a Webster, she had ranged from severity to pathos, but her opponent employed that obstinate silence which makes eloquence 80 futile with mocking echoes. Adontram arose clumsily.

"Father, ain't you got nothin' to say?" said Mrs Penn "I've got to go off after that load of gravel I can't stan' here talkin' all day."

"Father, won't you think it over, an' have a house built there instead of a barn?"

"I ain't got nothin' to say"

Adoniram shuffled out Mrs Penn went into her bedroom. When she came out, her eyes were red She had a roll of unbleached cotton cloth She spread it out on 90 the kitchen table, and began cutting out some shirts for her husband. The men over in the field had a team to help them this afternoon; she could hear their halloos. She had a scanty pattern for the shirts; she had to plan and piece the sleeves.

Nanny came home with her embroidery, and sat down with her needlework. She had taken down her curl-papers, and there was a soft roll of fair hair like an aureole over her forehead; her face was as delicately fine and clear as porcelain Suddenly she looked up, and the tender red flamed all over her face and neck. "Mother," so said she.

"What say?"

"I've been thinking—I don't see how we're goin' to have any—wedding in this room. I'd be ashamed to have his folks come if we didn't have anybody else"

"Mebbe we can have some new paper before then; I can put it on I guess you won't have no call to be ashamed of your belongin's"

"We might have the wedding in the new barn," said Nanny, with gentle pettishness "Why, mother, what makes you look so?"

Mrs Penn had started, and was staring at her with a curious expression. She turned again to her work, and spread out a pattern carefully on the cloth "Nothin"," said she Presently Adoniram clattered out of the yard in his two-wheeled dump cart, standing as proudly upright as a Roman charioteer. Mrs Penn opened the door and stood there a minute looking out, the halloos of the men sounded louder.

It seemed to her all through the spring months that she heard nothing but the halloos and the noises of saws and hammers. The new barn grew fast. It was a fine edifice for this little village. Men came on pleasant Sundays, in their meeting suits and clean shirt bosoms, and stood around it admiringly. Mrs Penn did not speak of it, and Adoniram did not mention it to her, although sometimes, upon a return from inspecting it, he bore himself with injured dignity.

"It's a strange thing how your mother feels about the to new barn," he said, confidentially, to Sammy one day.

Sammy only grunted after an odd fashion for a boy; he had learned it from his father.

The barn was all completed ready for use by the third week in July Adoniram had planned to move his stock in on Wednesday, on Tuesday he received a letter which changed his plans. He came in with it early in the morning "Sammy's been to the post-office," said he,

"an' I've got a letter from Hiram." Hiram was Mrs Penn's brother, who lived in Vermont.

"Well," said Mrs. Penn, "what does he say about the stolks?"

"I guess they're all right. He says he thinks if I come up country right off there's a chance to buy jest the kind of a horse I want." He stared reflectively out of the window at the new barn.

Mrs Penn was making pies. She went on clapping the rolling-pin into the crust, although she was very pale, and her heart beat loudly

"I dun' know but what I'd better go," said Adoniram
"I hate to go off jest now, right in the midst of hayin', a but the ten-acre lot's cut, an' I guess Rufus an' the orthers can git along without me three or four days I can't get a horse round here to suit me, nohow, an' I've got to have another for all that wood-haulin' in the fall I told Hiram to watch out, an' if he got wind of a good horse to let me know I guess I'd better go."

"I'll get out your clean shirt an' collar," said Mrs Penn calmly

She laid out Adoniram's Sunday suit and his clean clothes on the bed in the little bedroom. She got his r shaving-water and razor ready. At last she buttoned on his collar and fastened his black crayat.

Adoniram never wore his collar and cravat except on extra occasions. He held his head high, with a rasped dignity. When he was all ready, with his coat and his brushed, and a lunch of pie and cheese in a paper bag he hesitated on the threshold of the door. He looked at his wife, and his manner was definitely apologetic "If them cows come to-day, Sammy can drive 'em into the new barn," said he, "an' when they bring the hay sup, they can pitch it in there."

"Well," replied Mrs Penn,

Adoniram set his shaven face ahead and started When he had cleared the door-step, he turned and looked back with a kind of nervous solemnity "I shall be back by Saturday if nothin' happens," said he

"Do be careful, father," returned his wife

She stood in the door with Nanny at her elbow and watched him out of sight. Her eyes had a strange doubtful expression in them, her peaceful forehead was 50 contracted. She went in, and about her baking again Nanny sat sewing. Her wedding-day was drawing nearer and she was getting pale and thin with her steady sewing. Her mother kept glancing at her.

"Have you got that pain in your side this mornin'?" she asked.

'A little."

Mrs. Penn's face, as she worked, changed, her perplexed forehead smoothed, her eyes were steady, her lips firmly set. She formed a maxim for herself, although incoherently with her unlettered thoughts "Unsolicited opportunities are the guide-posts of the Lord to the new roads of life," she repeated in effect, and she made up her mind to her course of action.

"S'posin' I had wrote to Hiram," she muttered once, when she was in the pantry—"s'posin' I had wrote, an' asked him if he knew of any horse? But I didn't, an' father's goin' wa'n't none of my doin' It looks like a providence." Her voice rang out quite loud at the last.

"What you talkin' about, mother?" called Nanny "Nothin'"

Mrs Penn hurried her baking, at eleven o'clock it was all done The load of hay from the west field came slowly down the cart track, and drew up at the new barn Mrs Penn ran out. "Stop!" she screamed, "stop!"

The men stopped and looked, Sammy upreared from the top of the load, and stared at his mother.

"Stop'" she cried out again 'Don't you put the hay in that barn, put it in the old one"

"Why, he said to put it in here," returned one of the haymakers, wonderingly He was a young man, a neighbor's son, whom Adoniram hired by the year to nelp on the farm.

"Don't you put the hay in the new barn; there's room enough in the old one, ain't there?" said Mrs. Penn

"Room enough," returned the hired man, in his thick, rustic tones "Didn't need the new barn, nohow, far as room's concerned Well, I s'pose he changed his mind." He took hold of the horses' bridles.

Mrs Penn went back to the house Soon the kitchen windows were darkened, and a fragrance like warm honey came into the room.

Nanny laid down her work "I thought father wanted them to put the hay into the new barn?" she said, wonderingly.

"It's all right," replied her mother.

Sammy slid down from the load of hay, and came in to see if dinner was ready.

"I am't goin' to get a regular dinner to-day, as long as tather's gone," said his mother. "I've let the fire go out.

You can have some bread an' milk an' pie. I thought we could get along "She set out some bowls of milk, some bread, and a pie on the kitchen table. "You'd better so eat your dinner now," said she. "You might jest as well get through with it I want you to help me afterwards."

Nanny and Sammy stared at each other. There was something strange in their mother's manner Mrs Penn did not eat anything herself. She went into the pantry, and they heard her moving dishes while they ate Presently she came out with a pile of plates. She got the clothes-basket out of the shed, and packed them in it Nanny and Sammy watched. She brought out cups and saucers, and put them in with the plates.

"What you goin' to do, mother?" inquired Nanny, in a timid voice A sense of something unusual made her tremble, as if it were a ghost Sammy rolled his eyes over his pie.

"You'll see what I'm goin' to do," replied Mrs. Penn. "If you're through, Nanny, I want you to go up-stairs an' pack up your things, an' I want you, Sammy, to help me take down the bed in the bedroom."

"Oh, mother, what for?" gasped Nanny.

"You'll see"

During the next few hours a feat was performed by this simple, pious New England mother which was equal in its way to Wolfe's storming of the Heights of Abraham It took no more genius and audacity of bravery for Wolfe to cheer his wondering soldiers up those steep precipices, under the sleeping eyes of the enemy, than for Sarah Penn, at the head of hei children, to move all their little household goods into the new barn while her husband was away

Nanny and Sammy followed their mother's instructions without a murmur, indeed, they were overawed. There is a certain uncanny and superhuman quality about all such purely original undertakings as their mother's was to them. Nanny went back and forth with her light load, and Sammy tugged with sober energy.

At five o'clock in the afternoon the little house in which the Penns had lived for forty years had emptied itself into the new barn

Every builder builds somewhat for unknown purposes, and is in a measure a prophet. The architect of Adoniram 90 Penn's barn, while he designed it for the comfort of four-footed animals, had planned better than he knew for the comfort of humans. Sarah Penn saw at a glance its possibilities. Those great box-stalls, with quilts hung before them, would make better bedrooms than the one she had occupied for forty years, and there was a tight carriage-room. The harness-room, with its chimney and shelves, would make a kitchen of her dreams. The great middle space would make a parlor, by-and-by, fit for a palace. Up-stairs there was as much room as down. With partitions and windows, what a house would there be! Sarah looked at the row of stanchions before the allotted space for cows, and reflected that she would have her front entry there.

73 Wolfe's . . . Abraham. See note, p 402

At six o'clock the stove was up in the harness room, the kettle was boiling, and the table set for tea. It looked almost as home-like as the abandoned house across the yard had ever done. The young hired man milked, and Sarah directed him calmly to bring the milk to the new bain. He came gaping, dropping little blots of foam from the biimming pails on the grass. Before 20 the next morning he had spread the story of Adonuam Penn's wife moving into the new barn all over the little village. Men assembled in the store and talked it over. women with shawls over their heads scuttled into each other's houses before their work was done. Any deviation from the ordinary course of life in this quiet town was enough to stop all progress in it. Everybody paused to look at the staid, independent figure on the side track. There was a difference of opinion with regard to her. Some held her to be insane, some, of a lawless and re-30 bellious spirit

Friday the minister went to see her. It was in the forenoon, and she was at the barn door shelling peas for dinner. She looked up and returned his salutation with dignity, then she went on with her work. She did not invite him in. The saintly expression of her face remained fixed, but there was an angry flush over it.

The minister stood awkwardly before her, and talked. She handled the peas as if they were bullets. At last she looked up, and her eyes showed the spirit that her meek front had covered for a lifetime.

"There ain't no use talkin', Mr. Hersey," said she "Tve thought it all over an' over, an' I believe I m doin' what's right. I've made it the subject of prayer, an' it's betwixt me an' the Lord an' Adoniram. There ain't no call for nobody else to worry about it."

"Well, of course, if you have brought it to the Lord in prayer, and feel satisfied that you are doing right Mrs Penn," said the minister, helplessly. His thin gray bearded face was pathetic. He was a sickly man, his youthful confidence had cooled, he had to scourge himself up to some of his pastoral duties as relentlessly as a Catholic ascetic, and then he was prostrated by the smart.

"I think it's right jest as much as I think it was right for our forefathers to come over here from the old country 'cause they didn't have what belonged to 'em," said Mrs Penn She arose The barn threshold might have been Plymouth Rock from her bearing. "I don't doubt you mean well, Mr. Hersey," said she, "but there are things people hadn't ought to interfere with. I verbeen a member of the church for over forty years. I've got my own mind an 'my own feet, an' I'm goin' to think my own thoughts an' go my own way, an' nobody but the Lord is goin' to dictate to me unless I've a mind to have him Won't you come in an' set down? How is Mis' Hersey?"

"She is well, I thank you," replied the minister. He added some more perplexed apologetic remarks, then he retreated.

He could expound the intricacies of every character study in the Scriptures, he was competent to grasp the Pilgrim Fathers and all historical innovators, but Sarah Penn was beyond him. He could deal with primal cases but parallel ones worsted him. But, after all, although it was aside from his province, he wondered more how Adoniram Penn would deal with his wife than how the Lord would. Everybody shared the wonder. When Adoniram's four new cows arrived, Sarah ordered three to be put in the old barn, the other in the house shed where the cooking-stove had stood. That added to the excitement. It was whispered that all four cows were domiciled in the house.

Towards sunset on Saturday, when Adoniram was expected home, there was a knot of men in the road near the new barn. The hired man had milked, but he still hung around the premises. Sarah Penn had supper all ready. There were brown-bread and baked beans and a custard pie, it was the supper that Adoniram loved on a Saturday night. She had on a clean calico, and she bore herself imperturbably. Nanny and Sammy kept close at her heels. Their eyes were large, and Nanny was full of nervous tremors. Still there was to them.

more pleasant excirement than anything else An inborn confidence in their mother over their father asserted itself.

Sammy looked out of the harness-room window. There he is," he announced, in an awed whisper. He and Nanny peeped around the casing. Mrs. Penn kept on about her work. The children watched Adoniram leave the new horse standing in the drive while he went to the house door. It was fastened. Then he went around to the shed. That door was seldom locked, even when the family was away. The thought how her father would be confronted by the cow flashed upon Nanny. There was a hysterical sob in her throat. Adoniram emerged from the shed and stood looking about in a dazed fashion. His lips moved, he was saying something, but they could not hear what it was. The hired man was peeping around a corner of the old barn, but nobody say him.

Adoniram took the new horse by the bridle and led nim across the yard to the new barn. Nanny and Sammy slunk close to their mother. The barn doors rolled back, and there stood Adoniram, with the long mild face of the great Canadian farm horse looking over his shoulder.

Nanny kept behind her mother, but Sammy stepped suddenly forward, and stood in front of her.

Adontram stared at the group "What on airth you all down here for?" said he. "What's the matter over to the house?"

"We've come here to live, father," said Sammy His a shrill voice quavered out bravely

"What"—Adoniram sniffed—"what is it smells like cookin?" said he He stepped forward and looked in the open door of the harness-room. Then he turned to his wife. His old bristling face was pale and frightened "What on airth does this mean, mother?" he gasped

"You come in here, father," said Sarah. She led the way into the harness-room and shut the door "Now, father," said she, "you needn't be scared. I ain't crazy There ain't nothin' to be upset over But we've come here to live, an' we're goin' to live here. We've got jest as good a right here as new horses an' cows. The house wasn't fit for us to live in any longer, an' I made up my mind I wa'n't goin' to stay there. I've done my duty by you forty year, an' I'm goin' to do it now; but I'm goin' to live here You've got to put in some windows and parateons; an' you'll have to buy some furniture."

"Why, mother!" the old man gasped.

"You'd better take your coat off an' get washed—there's the wash basin—an' then we'll have supper."

"Why, mother!"

Sammy went past the window, leading the new horse to the old barn. The old man saw him, and shook his head speechlessly. He tried to take off his coat, but his arms seemed to lack the power. His wife helped him She poured some water into the tin basin, and put in a piece of soap. She got the comb and brush, and smoothed his thin gray hair after he had washed. Then she put the beans, hot bread, and tea on the table. Sammy came in, and the family drew up. Adoniram sat looking dazedly at his plate, and they waited.

"Ain't you goin' to ask a blessin', father?" said Sarah And the old man bent his head and mumbled

All through the meal he stopped eating at intervals, and stared furtively at his wife, but he ate well. The home food tasted good to him, and his old frame was too sturdily healthy to be affected by his mind. But after supper he went out, and sat down on the step of the smaller door at the right of the barn, through which he had meant his Jerseys to pass in stately file, but which Sarah designed for her front house door, and he leaned 10 his head on his hands.

After the supper dishes were cleared away and the milk-pans washed, Sarah went out to him. The twilight was deepening. There was a clear green glow in the sky. Before them stretched the smooth level of field, in the distance was a cluster of hay-stacks like the huts of a village, the air was very cool and calm and sweet. The landscape might have been an ideal one of peace.

Sarah bent over and touched her husband on one of his thin, sinewy shoulders. "Father!"

The old man's shoulders heaved he was weeping "Why, don't do so, father," said Sarah

"I'll—put up the—partitions, an —everything you—want, mother."

Sarah put her apron up to her face, she was overcome by her own triumph

Adoniram was like fortress whose walls had no active resistance, and went down the instant the right besieging tools were used. "Why, mother," he said, hoarsely, "I hadn't no idee you was so set on't as all this 90 comes to."

William Sydney Porter (O. Henry)

1862 · 1910

William Sydncy Porter—at one time somewhat extravagantly called "the American de Maupassant"—was born in Greensboro, North Carolina After clerking in a drug store, he went to Texas, where he lived on a ranch and later was a bank teller in Austin Accused of embezzlement, he fled to Central America only to return because of his wife's illness and (after trial and conviction) to serve a term of three years (1897-1900) in the federal penitentiary at Columbus, Ohio While in the penitentiary, he began to write short stories for the magazines under the pen name of "O Henry" The last ten years of his life were spent in New York producing many stories which proved to be enormously popular all over the United States

O Henry's stories are not great literature. They rely for their interest chiefly upon ingenuity of plot—the "surprise ending"—the achievement of which depends too much upon accident and coincidence. The style is marked by a journalistic smartness. His work, however has a social significance. In The Four Million, he described aspects of life in New York which previous writers had missed. "In spite of his preposterous absurdities," says Ludwig Lewisohn, "he caught the tang of, let us say, Herald Square in 1907. A perished, amusing moment is somehow captured and held fast."

The Furnished Room

"The Furnished Room" is taken from O Henry's famous collection of stories about New York City, The Four Million, published in 1909

The story is thoroughly characteristic in its use of coincidence and surprise, its picturesque detail, its facile, journalistic style. A larger significance may be found in its social connotation, the migration of countless young people to New York and other big cities to seek their fortunes. As Lewisohn has observed, "O Henry discovered the hall bedroom."

Restless, shifting, fugacious as time itself is a certain vast bulk of the population of the red brick district of the lower West Side Homeless, they have a hundred homes They flit from furnished room to furnished room, transients forever—transients in abode, transients in heart and mind. They sing "Home, Sweet Home" in ragtime, they carry their lares et penates in a bandbox, their time is entwined about a picture hat, a rubber plant is their fig tree.

Hence the houses of this district, having had a thousand dwellers, should have a thousand tales to tell, mostly dull ones no doubt, but it would be strange if there could not be found a ghost or two in the wake of all these vagrant guests

One evening after dark a young man prowled among these crumbling red mansions, ringing their bells. At the twelfth he rested his lean hand-baggage upon the step and wiped the dust from his hat-band and forehead. The bell sounded faint and far away in some remote, hollow depths.

To the door of this, the twelfth house whose bell he had rung, came a housekeeper who made him think of an unwholesome surfeited worm that had eaten its nut to a hollow shell and now sought to fill the vacancy with edible lodgers

He asked if there was a room to let

Come in," said the housekeeper Her voice came from her throat, her throat seemed lined with fur "I have the third floor back, vacant since a week back Should you wish to look at it?"

The young man followed her up the stairs. A faint light from no particular source mitigated the shadows of the halls. They trod noiselessly upon a stair carpet that its own loom would have forsworn. It seemed to have become vegetable, to have degenerated in that rank, sunless air to lush lichen or spreading most that grew in patches to the staircase and was viscid under the foot like organic matter. At each turn of the stairs were vacant niches in the wall. Perhaps plants had once been set within them. If so they had died in that foul and tainted air. It may be that statues of the saints had stood there, but it was not difficult to conceive that imps and devils had dragged them forth in the darkness and down to the unholy depths of some furnished pit below.

This is the room," said the housekeeper, from her turry throat "It's a nice room. It ain't often vacant. I had some most elegant people in it last summer—no trouble at all, and paid in advance to the minute. The waters at the end of the hall. Sprowls and Mooney kept it three months. They done a vaudeville sketch. Miss B'retta Sprowls—you may have heard of her—Oh, that was just the stage names—right there over the dresser is where the marriage certificate hung, framed. The gas is here, and you see there is plenty of closet room. It's a room everybody likes. It never stays idle long."

"Do you have many theatrical people rooming here?" asked the young men

"They comes and goes A good proportion of my lodgers is connected with the theatres Yes, sir, this is the theatrical district. Actor people never stays long anywhere I get my share. Yes, they comes and they goes."

He engaged the room, paying for a week in advance He was tired, he said, and would take possession at once. He counted out the money The room had been made ready, she said, even to towels and water As the housekeeper moved away he put, for the thousandth time, the question that he carried at the end of his tongue.

"A young girl—Miss Vashner—Miss Eloise Vashner—do you remember such a one among your lodgers? She would be singing on the stage, most likely A fair girl, of medium height and slender, with reddish, gold hair and a dark mole near her left eyebrow."

"No, I don't remember the name Them stage people has names they changes as often as their rooms They comes and they goes No, I don't call that one to mind" 70

No Always no Five months of ceaseless interrogation and the inevitable negative. So much time spent by day in questioning managers, agents, schools and choruses, by night among the audiences of theatres from all-star casts down to music halls so low that he dreaded to find what he most hoped for. He who had loved her best had tried to find her. He was sure that since her disappearance from home this great, water-girt city held her somewhere, but it was like a monstrous quicksand, shifting its particles constantly, with no foundation, its upper granules of to-day buried to-morrow in ooze and slime

The furnished room received its latest guest with a first glow of pseudo-hospitality, a hectic, haggard, perfunctory welcome like the specious smile of a demirep The sophistical comfort came in reflected gleams from the decayed furniture, the ragged brocade upholstery of a couch and two chairs, a foot-wide cheap pier glass between two windows, from one or two gilt picture frames and a brass bedstead in a corner

The guest reclined, mert, upon a chair, while the room, 90

confused in speech as though it were an apartment in Babel, tried to discourse to him of its diverse tenantry

A polychromatic rug like some brilliant-flowered rectangular, tropical islet lay surrounded by a billowy sea of soiled matting. Upon the gray-papered wall were those pictures that pursue the homeless one from house to house.—The Huguenot Lovers, The First Quarrel, The Wedding Breakfast, Psyche at the Fountain. The mantel's chastely severe outline was ingloriously veiled beto hind some pert drapery drawn rakishly askew like the sashes of the Amazonian ballet. Upon it were some desolate flotsam cast aside by the room's marooned when a lucky sail had borne them to a fresh port—a trifling vase or two, pictures of actresses, a medicine bottle, some stray cards out of a deck.

One by one, as the characters of a cryptograph become explicit, the little signs left by the furnished room's procession of guests developed a significance. The threadbare space in the rug in front of the dresser told that 20 lovely woman had marched in the throng. Tiny finger prints on the wall spoke of little prisoners trying to feel their way to sun and air. A splattered stain, raying like the shadow of a bursting bomb, witnessed where a hurled glass or bottle had splintered with its contents against the wall. Across the pier glass had been scrawled with a diamond in staggering letters the name "Marie" It seemed that the succession of dwellers in the furnished room had turned in fury-perhaps tempted beyond forbearance by its garish coldness-and wreaked upon it 30 their passions. The furniture was chipped and bruised, the couch, distorted by bursting springs, seemed a horrible monster that had been slain during the stress of some grotesque convulsion. Some more potent upheaval had cloven a great slice from the marble mantel. Each plank in the floor owned its particular cant and shriek as from a separate and individual agony. It seemed incredible that all this malice and injury had been wrought upon the room by those who had called it for a time their home, and yet it may have been the cheated home 40 instinct surviving blindly, the resentful rage at false household gods that had kindled their wrath. A hut that is our own we can sweep and adorn and cherish

The young tenant in the chair allowed these thoughts to file, softshod, through his mind, while there drifted into the room furnished sounds and furnished scents. He heard in one room a tittering and incontinent, slack laughter, in others the monologue of a scold, the rattling of dice, a lullaby, and one crying dully; above him banjo tinkled with spirit. Doors banged somewhere, the elevated trains roared intermittently, a cat yowled miserably upon a back fence. And he breathed the breath of the house—a dank savour rather than a smell—a cold, musty effluvium as from underground vaults mingled with the reeking exhalations of linoleum and mildewed and rotten woodwork

Then suddenly, as he rested there, the room was filled with the strong, sweet odour of mignonette. It came as upon a single buffet of wind with such sureness and fragrance and emphasis that it almost seemed a living visitant. And the man cried aloud "What, dear?" as if he had been called, and sprang up and faced about. The rich odour clung to him and wrapped him around. He reached out his arms for it, all his senses for the time confused and commingled. How could one be peremptorily called by an odour? Surely it must have been a sound. But, was it not the odour that had touched, that had caressed him?

"She has been in this room," he cried, and he sprang to wrest from it a token, for he knew he would recognize the smallest thing that had belonged to her or that she had touched. This enveloping scent of mignonette, the odour that she had loved and made her own—whence came it?

The room had been but carelessly set in order Scat tered upon the flimsy dresser scarf were half a dozen hairpins-those discreet, indistinguishable friends of womankind, feminine of gender, infinite of mood, and uncommunicative of tense. These he ignored, conscious of their triumphant lack of identity Ransacking the drawers of the dresser he came upon a discarded, tiny. ragged handkerchief He pressed it to his face. It was racy and insolent with heliotrope, he hurled it to the floor. In another drawer he found odd burtons, a theatre programme, a pawnbroker's card, two lost marshmallows a book on the divination of dreams. In the last was . woman's black satin hair-bow, which halted him poised between ice and fire. But the black satin hair-bow also is femininity's demure, impersonal, common ornament. and tells no tales

² Babel, a reference to the confusion of languages at the tower of Babel, described in Genesis 11.1-9

And then he traversed the room like a hound on the scent, skimming the walls, considering the corners of the bulging matting on his hands and knees, rummaging mantel and tables, the curtains and hangings, the drunken cabinet in the corner, for a visible sign, unable to perceive that she was there beside, around, against, within, above him, clinging to him, wooing him, calling nim so poignantly through the finer senses that even his grosser ones became cognisant of the call Once again he answered loudly "Yes, dear!" and turned, wild-eyed to gaze on vacancy, for he could not yet discern form and colour and love and outstretched arms in the odour of mignonette. Oh, God! whence that odour, and since when have odours had a voice to call? Thus he groped

He burrowed in crevices and corners, and found corks and cigarettes. These he passed in passive contempt But once he found in a fold of the matting a half-smoked cigar, and this he ground beneath his heel with a green and trenchant oath. He sifted the room from end to end. He found dreary and ignoble small records of many a peripatetic tenant, but of her whom he sought, and who may have lodged there, and whose spirit seemed to hover there, he found no trace.

And then he thought of the housekeeper

He ran from the haunted room downstairs and to a door that showed a crack of light She came out to his knock. He smothered his excitement as best he could

'Will you tell me, madam," he besought her "who occupied the room I have before I came,"

"Yes, sir I can tell you again 'Twas Sprowls and Mooney, as I said Miss B'retta Sprowls it was in the theatres, but Missis Mooney she was My house is well known for respectability The marriage certificate hung, framed, on a nail over——"

"What kind of a lady was Miss Sprowls—in looks. I mean?"

"Why, black-haired, sir, short, and stout, with a comical face. They left a week ago Tuesday"

"And before they occupied it?"

"Why, there was a single gendeman connected with the draying business. He left owing me a week. Before him was Missis Crowder and her two children, that stayed four months, and back of them was old Mr. Doyle, whose sons paid for him. He kept the room six months. That goes back a year, sir, and further I do not remember."

He thanked her and crept back to his room The room was dead. The essence that had vivified it was gone. The perfume of mignonette had departed. In its place was the old, stale odour of mouldy house furniture, of atmosphere in storage.

The ebbing of his hope drained his faith. He sat staring at the yellow, singing gaslight. Soon he walked to the bed and began to rear the sheets into strips. With the blade of his knife he drove them tightly into every crevice around windows and door. When all was snug and taut he turned out the light, turned the gas full on again, and laid himself gratefully upon the bed.

lt was Mrs McCool's night to go with the can for beer. So she fetched it and sat with Mrs Purdy in one of those subterranean retreats where housekeepers fore- en gather and the worm dieth seldom.

"I rented out my third floor, back, this evening," said Mrs. Purdy across a fine circle of foam. "A young man took it. He went up to bed two hours ago."

"Now, did ye, Mrs Purdy, ma am?" said Mrs McCool, with intense admiration "You do be a wonder for rentin rooms of that kind. And did ye tell him, then?" she concluded in a husky whisper, laden with mystery

"Rooms," said Mrs Purdy, in her furriest tones, "are furnished for to rent I did not tell him, Mrs McCool" 70

'Tis right ye are, ma'am, tis by renting rooms we kape alive. Ye have the rale sense for business, ma'am. There be many people will rayjict the rentin' of a room if they be tould a suicide has been after dyin' in the bed of it."

"As you say, we has our living to be making," remarked Mrs Purdy

"Yis, ma'am, 'tis true "Tis just one wake ago this day I helped ye lay out the third floor, back A pretty slip of a colleen she was to be killin' herself wid the gas— 80 a swate little face she had, Mrs. Purdy, ma'am."

"She'd a-been called handsome, as you say," said Mrs Purdy, assenting but critical, "but for that mole she had a-growin' by her left eyebrow. Do fill up your glass again, Mrs. McCool."

Samuel L. Clemens (Mark Twain)

1835 · 1910

Perhaps the happiest circumstance in Samuel Langhorne Clemens' life, as far as rich material for literature was concerned, was that he spent his boyhood years in Hannibal, Missouri Just about in the center of the United States, this little town had the mile-wide Mississippi rolling before it, and on the other sides were countryside, prairie, and forest. The river, the farm, and the out-ofdoors of his boyhood were part and parcel not only of Clemens' life but also of his great books. At sixty-two, he wrote "I can call back the solemn twilight and the mystery of the deep woods, the earthy smells, the faint odors of the wild flowers, the sheen of rain-washed foliage . the far-off hammering of woodpeckers . . . in the remoteness of the forest . . . I can call it all back and make it as real as it ever was and as blessed. I can call back the prairie and its loneliness and peace, and a vast hawk hanging motionless in the sky."

He could call back such memories of his boyhood, and he could set them down with gusto and with atfection in his best books. But, as he said, "if I confine myself to boy life at times, it is because that life had a peculiar charm for me, and not because I was unfamiliar with other phases of life." A life full of wide experience preceded and included his career as an author. In turn a printer's devil, journeyman printer, steamboat pilot soldier, miner, newspaper reporter, traveling correspondent, lecturer, author, editor, and publisher, he had enough "careers" to give several authors materials for books, and each pursuit contributed to his understanding of human nature.

Panel (I to r.) Hunnibal, Missouri— and the mile-wide Mississippi rolling before it" • Samuel Clemens at 50 • His study at Quarry Farm Elmira, New York Clemens became a printer's apprentice during his boyhood in Hannibal Having learned to set type, he wandered eastward as far as New York, picking up printing jobs in one city after another. Then, back in the Middle West in the fifties, he learned the pilot's trade and spent some of his happiest years steering boats up and down the Mississippi. (When, later, he adopted a pseudonym, it was an expression used by steamboatmen when testing the depth of the channel.) The job of piloting lasted through the boom days of river trade which were cut off by the Civil War. In 1861, after brief service in the Confederate army, he went out to the Far West. There, he took some fliers in mining stock, did some prospecting, and finally got into journalism of the masculine humorous sort which flourished in the Far West.

The journalistic work, in Nevada and California, launched him on his career as a humorist Pieces he had written in the Far West were printed in the East, and one of his tales, "The Celebrated Jumping Frog of Calaveras County," first heard in a mining camp, won national acclaim in 1865 Travel letters about a trip to Europe and the Holy Land, published in newspapers in 1867 and put into book form as The Innocents Abroad (1869), established him as an outstandingly popular humorist Roughing It (1872), The Gilded Age (in collaboration with Charles Dudley Warner, 1873), The Adventures of Tom Sawyer (1876), A Tramp Abroad (1880), The Prince and the Pauper (1882), Life on the Mississippi (1883), The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (1884), and A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court (1889) were all widely purchased The success of various books made work other than writing unnecessary, but Clemens, a son of the boomtime frontier who had a love for speculation and a childlike reverence for wealth, tried to swell a generous income by making investments. Having invested some of his royalties from his first popular book in a Buffalo newspaper, Clemens was an editor for a time He financed many inventions and get-rich schemes, and eventually set up as a large-scale publisher of books -his own as well as those by other authors

In Buffalo and Hartford, abroad and in New York, he lived lavishly on his excellent income His Hartford mansion, for instance, was a massive, showy structure incorporating a number of costly features, and his monthly expenditures for living and entertaining were huge In 1893, when the author-businessman was fiftyeight, some important financial investments proved unwise, his publishing house failed, and he faced financial ruin Refusing to accept bankruptcy, he paid off his debts dollar for doilar, earning enough to do so by making a lecture trip around the world and by publishing

Tom Sawyer Abroad and Pudd'nhead Wilson (1894),
Joan of Arc (1896), and Following the Equator (1897)
His last great books, published posthumously, were The Mysterious Stranger (1916), and his Autobiography
(1924, 1910)

In all of Twain's writings, his personality was an important element. Those who knew the humorist best emphasize the fact that his character had extraordinarily varied facets. Olivia Langdon, whom he married in 1870, loved him not only for his chivalry and his tenderness, but also for his tendency, freely indulged, to tease her and the children unmercifully Close associates saw him, on alternate visits, as an outrageous prankster and a gloomy pessimist. Surprisingly, his intimate friend, Howells, thought that a certain delicacy was an intrinsic trait "Among the half-dozen personalities that each of us becomes," Howells wrote, "I should say that Clemens's central and final personality was something exquisite His casual acquaintances might know him, perhaps, from his fierce intensity, his wild pleasure in shocking people as anything but exquisite and yet that was what in the last analysis he One could not know him well without realizing him the most serious, the most humane, the most conscientious of men"

The first works by Twain to attract national attention—"The Jumping Frog" and Innocents Abroad—represented two aspects of his work. The former was a tall tale much like those Sam Clemens, as a boyish printer's devil, had seen in newspapers or had heard told in yarnspinning sessions. Its affiliations with "The Big Bear" or 'A Coon Hunt in a Fency Country" are obvious A large share of Innocents Abroad was popular humor similar, in important ways, to the kind of humor which had been flourishing when Clemens had set up as a humorist—the humor of such professional "Funny Men" as Artemus Ward and Josh Billings. After he had hit upon his mature technique, the two methods—that of the old Southwestern humorists and that of the funny men—were intermingled in most of his writings. The travel books, for example, increasingly gained in variety and interest by alternating literary-comedian material with anecdotes

When, in his fiction, the training Twain had had as a professional humorist caused him to mingle buffoonery and burlesque with materials inhospitable to the broadest comedy, his writings tended to suffer from unevenness of tone His masterpiece, Huckleberry Finn, for instance, particularly in the chapters concerning the rescue of Jim, contained passages of broad humor and parody which frequently clashed in tone with the style of the long oral tale used throughout the volume. But this book, like others which showed him at his best. triumphed over such faults. It triumphed, for one thing, because, taking a hint from local colorists of the day, and recalling his varied past, Clemens freighted his pages with vivid regional details which were instinct with life Moreover, although he was as contemptuous of poetry as Shakespeare's rough soldier Hotspur, like Hotspur Clemens was an interesting combination of masculinity and poetic sensibility, and his style revealed both qualities. More than any other classic fictionist he wrote the American language, but he also manifested a knack -comparable to the skill of the best poets-for finding the best words to represent scenes, actions, and emotions. In addition, he had genius for creating memorable characters like Colonel Sellers, Tom Sawyer, Huck and Huck's Pappy, and for breathing the breath of life into survive other humorists was the philosophy he expressed in his writings "Philosophy" is too highfalutin a word, perhaps, for the notions, hunches, and prejudices which this emotional and often cantankerous individual expressed in his books. Yet the attitudes of this highly American author give his writings an element of interest over and above that supplied by their artistry and the peculiar quirks of his own personality. He reveals the nostalgia for the old America, the distruct of religion, the zeal for political and social reform, and the pessimism which were being voiced by other authors, particularly in the period from 1865 to 1900.

Clemens thought that another thing that helped him

All these qualities have helped Twain overcome the handicap any American author must overcome if he starts writing what his countrymen are likely to call 'mere humor' Although critics still now and then reach up to pat him condescendingly on the head, it now seems reasonably certain that Mark Twain will grow in stature with the passage of time Increasingly, Clemens' countrymen appreciate the charm of his personality, the breadth and depth of his richly native experiences, the unostentatious artistry revealed by his best writings. More and more, Americans are agreeing with Howells' estimate of him as "sole and incomparable, the Lincoln of our literature"

The Celebrated Jumping Frog of Calaveras County

On December 4, 1864, Clemens arrived for a visit at Jim Gillis' cabin on Jackass Hill, in the Tuolumne district. On pleasant days, Clemens worked at pocket mining. On rainy days the author, Gillis, and neighboring miners sat around the stove in the dilapidated tavern at Angel's Camp and told stories. One afternoon Ben Coon, a former Illinois river pilot, spun a yarn which had been going the rounds of the camps and the newspapers—the one about the $\ensuremath{\operatorname{lumping}}$ frog

In time the humorist told the story to his friend, Artemus Ward Ward, liking it, asked him to write it out for use in a forthcoming book, Artemus Ward's Travels Arriving too late for inclusion in the volume, it was printed, instead, in the Saturday Press, November 18, 1865. The piece, an immediate hit, was reprinted in newspapers throughout the country.

The teller of the tale at Angel's Camp, Clemens said later, "was entirely serious, for he was dealing with what for him were austere facts, he saw no humor in the tale, neither did his listeners, neither he nor they ever smiled or laughed; in my time I have not attended a more solemn conference. In writing his own version,

Ciemens perhaps tried to reproduce the ludicrous elements in this scene by having humorless Simon Wheeler tell his comic narrative to an equally humorless, painfully bored listener. Based on an oral narrative, the tale in many ways—especially in its "humanization" of animals—shows its relationship to the frontier humor which the humorist had enjoyed as a boy

In compliance with the request of a friend of mine, who wrote me from the East, I called on good-natured, garrulous old Simon Wheeler, and inquired after my friend's friend, Leonidas W. Smiley, as requested to do, and I hereunto append the result I have a lurking suspicion that Leonidas W. Smiley is a myth, that my triend never knew such a personage, and that he only conjectured that, if I asked old Wheeler about him, it would remind him of his infamous Jim Smiley, and he would go to work and bore me nearly to death with some exasperating reminiscence of him as long and tedious as it should be useless to me If that was the design, it succeeded

I found Simon Wheeler dozing comfortably by the bar-room stove of the dilapidated tavern in the decayed mining camp of Angel's, and I noticed that he was fat and bald-headed, and had an expression of winning gentleness and simplicity upon his tranquil countenance. He roused up and gave me good-day. I told him a friend 2. of mine had commissioned me to make some inquities about a cherished companion of his boyhood named Leonidas. W. Smiley—Rev. Leonidas. W. Smiley—avoung minister of the Gospel, who he had heard was at one time a resident of Angel's Camp. I added that, if Mr. Wheeler could tell me anything about this Rev. Leonidas. W. Smiley, I would feel under many obligations to him.

Simon Wheeler backed me into a corner and blockaded me there with his chair, and then sat me down and reeled off the monotonous narrative which follows this paragraph. He never smiled, he never frowned, he never changed his voice from the gentle-flowing key to which he tuned the initial sentence, he never betrayed the slightest suspicion of enthusiasm, but all through the interminable narrative there ran a vein of impressive earnestness and sincerity, which showed me plainly that, so far from his imagining that there was anything ridiculous or tunny about his story, he regarded it as a really important matter, and admired its two heroes as men of transcendent genius in finesse. I let him go on 40 in his own way, and never interrupted him once

"Rev Leonidas W H'm, Reverend Le-well, there was a feller here once by the name of Jim Smiley, in the winter of '49-or may be it was the spring of '50-I don't recollect exactly, somehow, though what makes me think it was one or the other is because I remember the big flume wasn't finished when he first came to the camp, but any way, he was the curiosest man about always betting on any thing that turned up you ever see, if he could get any body to bet on the other side, 50 and if he couldn't, he'd change sides. Any way that suited the other man would suit him-any way just so's he got a bet, he was satisfied But still he was lucky, uncommon lucky, he most always come out winner He was always ready and laying for a chance, there couldn't be no solit'ry thing mentioned but that feller'd offer to bet on it, and take any side you please, as I was just telling you. If there was a horse-race, you'd find him flush, or you'd find him busted at the end of it, if there was a dog-fight, he'd bet on it, if there was a cat-fight, he'd 60 bet on it, if there was a chicken-fight, he'd bet on it; why, if there was two birds setting on a fence, he would bet you which one would fly first, or if there was a camp-meeting, he would be there reg'lar, to bet on Parson Walker, which he judged to be the best exhorter about there, and so he was, too, and a good man. If he even seen a straddle-bug start to go anywheres, he would bet you how long it would take him to get wherever he was going to, and if you took him up, he would foller that straddle-bug to Mexico but what he would find out 70 where he was bound for and how long he was on the road Lots of the boys here has seen that Smiley, and can tell you about him Why, it never made no difference to him-he would bet on any thing-the dangdest feller Parson Walker's wife laid very sick once, for a good while, and it seemed as if they warn't going to save her, but one morning he come in, and Smiley asked how she was, and he said she was considerable betterthank the Lord for his infinite mercy-and coming on so smart that, with the blessing of Providence, she'd 80 get well yet, and Smiley, before he thought, says, "Well, I'll resk two-and-a-half that she don't, anyway "

Thish-yer Smiley had a mare—the boys called her the fifteen-minute nag, but that was only in fun, you know, because, of course, she was faster than that—and he used to win money on that horse, for all she was so slow and always had the asthma, or the distemper, or the consumption, or something of that kind. They used to give her two or three hundred yards start, and then pass her under way, but always at the fag-end of the race she'd get excited and desperate-like, and come cavorting and straddling up, and scattering her legs around limber, sometimes in the air, and sometimes out to one side amongst the fences, and kicking up m-o-redust, and raising m-o-re racket with her coughing and sneezing and blowing her nose—and always fetch up at the stand just about a neck ahead, as near as you could cipher it down

And he had a little small bull pup, that to look at him you'd think he wa'nt worth a cent, but to set around and look ornery, and lay for a chance to steal something But as soon as money was up on him, he was a different dog, his under-jaw'd begin to stick out like 20 the fo'castle of a steamboat, and his teeth would uncover, and shine savage like the furnaces. And a dog might tackle him, and bully-rag him, and bite him, and throw him over his shoulder two or three times, and Andrew Jackson-which was the name of the pup-Andrew Jackson would never let on but what he was satisfied, and hadn't expected nothing else-and the bets being doubled and doubled on the other side all the time, till the money was all up, and then all of a sudden he would grab that other dog jest by the j'int of his hind leg and 30 freeze to it-not chaw, you understand, but only jest grip and hang on till they throwed up the sponge, if it was a year. Smiley always come out winner on that pup, till he harnessed a dog once that didn't have no hind legs, because they'd been sawed off by a circular saw, and when the thing had gone along far enough, and the money was all up, and he come to make a snatch for his pet holt, he saw in a minute how he'd been imposed on, and how the other dog had him in the door, so to speak, and he 'peared surprised, and then he 40 looked sorter discouraged-like, and didn't try no more to win the fight, and so he got shucked out bad. He give Smiley a look, as much as to say his heart was broke, and it was / it fault, for putting up a dog that hadn't no hind legs for him to take holt of, which was his main dependence in a fight, and then he limped off a piece and laid down and died. It was a good pup, was that Andrew Jackson, and would have made a name for hisself if he'd lived, for the stuff was in him, and he had genius—I know it, because he hadn't had no opportunities to speak of, and it don't stand to reason that a dog could make such a fight as he could under them circumstances, if he hadn't no talent. It always makes me feel sorry when I think of that last fight of his'n, and the way it turned out.

Well, thish-yer Smiley had rat-tarriers, and chicken cocks, and tom-cats, and all them kind of things, till you couldn't rest, and you couldn't fetch nothing for him to bet on but he'd match you He ketched a frog one day. and took him home, and said he calk'lated to edercate him, and so he never done nothing for three months but : set in his back yard and learn that frog to jump And you bet he did learn him, too He'd give him a little punch behind, and the next minute you'd see that frog whirling in the air like a doughnut-see him turn one summerset, or may be a couple, if he got a good start, and come down flat-footed and all right, like a cat He got him up so in the matter of catching flies, and kept him in practice so constant, that he'd nail a fly every time as far as he could see him Smiley said all a frog wanted was education, and he could do most anything-and I believe him Why, I've seen him set Dan'l Webster down here on this floor-Dan'l Webster was the name of the frog-and sing out, "Flies, Danl, flies'" and quicker'n you could wink, he'd spring straight up, and snake a fly off'n the counter there, and flop down on the floor again as solid as a gob of mud and fall to scratching the side of his head with his hind foot as indifferent as if he hadn't no idea he'd been doin any more'n any frog might do You never see a frog so modest and straightfor'ard as he was, for all he was so gifted And when it come to fair and square jumping on a dead level, he could get over more ground at one straddle than any animal of his breed you ever sec Jumping on a dead level was his strong suit, you understand, and when it come to that, Smiley would ante up money on him as long as he had a red Smiley was monstrous proud of his frog, and well he might be, for fellers that had traveled and been everywheres, all said he laid over any frog that ever they see

Well, Smiley kept the beast in a little lattice box, and he used to fetch him down town sometimes and lay for a bet. One day a feller—a stranger in the camp, he was—come across him with his box, and says.

"What might it be that you've got in the box?"

And Smiley says, sorter indifferent like, "It might be a parrot, or it might be a canary, may be, but it ain't—it's only just a frog."

And the feller took it, and looked at it careful, and turned it round this way and that, and says, "H'm—so tis Well, what's be good for?"

"Well," Smiley says, easy and careless, "he's good chough for one thing, I should judge—he can outjump ary frog in Calaveras county."

The feller took the box again, and took another long, particular look, and give it back to Smiley, and says, very deliberate, "Well, I don't see no p'ints about that trog that's any better'n any other frog."

"May be you don't," Smiley says "May be you understand frogs, and maybe you don't understand 'em, may be vou've had experience, and may be you ain't only a amature, as it were Anyways I've got my opinion, and I'll risk forty dollars he can outjump any frog in Calaveras county."

And the feller studied a minute, and then says, kinder sid like, "Well, I'm only a stranger here, and I ain't got no frog, but if I had a frog, I'd bet you"

And then Smiley says, "That's all right—that's all right—if you'll hold my box a minute, I'll go and get you a frog." And so the feller took the box, and put up his forty dollars along with Smiley's, and set down to wait

So he set there a good while thinking and thinking to hisself, and then he got the frog out and prized his mouth open and took a teaspoon and filled him full of quail shot—filled him pretty near up to his chin—and set him on the floor Smiley he went to the swamp and slopped around in the mud for a long time, and finally he ketched a frog, and fetched him in, and give him to this feller, and says

"Now, if you're ready, set him alongside of Dan'l, with his fore-paws just even with Dan'l, and I'll give the word." Then he says, "One—two—three—jump!" and him and the feller touched up the frogs from behind, and the new frog hopped off, but Dan'l give a heave, nd hysted up his shoulders—so—like a Frenchman, but it wan't no use—he couldn't budge, he was planted as solid as an anvil, and he couldn't no more stir than if he was anchored out Smiley was a good deal surprised, and he was disguisted too, but he didn't have no idea what the matter was, of course

The feller took the money and started away; and when

"'-he 'pears to look mighty baggy, somehow."

he was going out at the door, he sorter jerked his thumb over his shoulders—this way—at Dan'l, and says again, very deliberate, "Well, I don't see no p'ints about that 50 frog that's any better'n any other frog "

Smiley he stood scratching his head and looking down at Dan'l a long time, and at last he says, "I do wonder what in the nation that frog throw'd off for—I wonder if there ain't something the matter with him—he 'pears to look mighty baggy, somehow' And he ketched Dan'l by the nap of the neck, and lifted him up and says, "Why, blame my cats, if he don't weigh five pound!" and turned him upside down, and he belched out a double handful of shot And then he see how it was, and he was the 60 maddest man—he set the frog down and took out after that feller, but he never ketched him And—

[Here Simon Wheeler heard his name called from the front yard, and got up to see what was wanted] And turning to me as he moved away, he said "Just set where you are, stranger, and rest easy—I ain't going to be gone a second"

But, by your leave, I did not think that a continuation of the history of the enterprising vagabond Jim Smiley would be likely to afford me much information concerning the Rev. Leonidas W Smiley, and so I started away

At the door I met the sociable Wheeler returning, and he buttonholed me and recommenced

"Well, thish-yer Smiley had a yal'er one-cyed cow that didn't have no tail, only jest a short stump like a bannanner, and—"

"Oh! hang Smiley and his afflicted cow!" I muttered. good-naturedly, and bidding the old gentleman goodday, I departed

The Innocents Abroad

With a band of nineteenth-century pilgrims, Clemens made a trip abroad between June 8 and November 19, 1867. During the journey he sent accounts from various stopping places to some American newspapers. These accounts, which had been well liked by readers, were revised and published in the book The Innocents Abroad in 1869. Within a year, some sixty-seven thousand copies were sold. The humorist's fame was established.

The book, as its Preface proclaimed, had as its purpose "to suggest to the reader how he would be likely to see Europe and the East if he looked at them with his own eyes instead of the eyes of those who traveled in those countries before him " Previous travelers, guidebooks in hand, had been overawed by the antiquity and the romance of the Old World, this author was determined to judge for himself The two passages which follow were among the most admired in the book. In each the naive tourists were satirized, but two distinctly different methods were used In "The Old Masters," perhaps the most famous chapter in the volume, Clemens wrote as a sensible man, sickened by the ecstasies and idiocies of tourists who depend upon guidebooks to suggest how they shall react to works of art. The way Clemens built up his devastating attack on "The Last Supper," after an ingratiating start, offers an interesting study in rhetorical method. In 'The Tomb of Adam," he wrote as if he himself were a sentimental, credulous traveler, believing everything he was told-no matter how preposterous-and trying to pump up appropriate emotions for the occasion (The titles have been inserted by the editors)

Chapter XIX

THE OLD MASTERS

Here, in Milan, in an ancient tumble-down ruin of a church, is the mournful wreck of the most celebrated painting in the world—"The Last Supper," by Leonardo da Vinci. We are not infallible judges of pictures, but of course we went there to see this wonderful painting, once so beautiful, always so worshipped by masters in art, and forever to be famous in song and story. And the first thing that occurred was the infliction on us of a placard fairly reeking with wretched English Take a morsel of it

"Bartholomew (that is the first figure on the left hand side at the spectator), uncertain and doubtful about what he thinks to have heard, and upon which he wants to be assured by himself at Christ and by no others"

Good, isn't it? And then Peter is described as "argumenting in a threatening and angrily condition at Judas Iscariot"

This paragraph recalls the picture "The Last Supper is painted on the dilapidated wall of what was a little chapel attached to the main church in ancient times, I suppose It is battered and scarred in every direction, and stained and discolored by time, and Napoleon's horses kicked the legs off most the disciples when they (the horses, not the disciples.) were stabled there more than a half century ago

I recognized the old picture in a moment—the Saviour with bowed head seated at the centre of a long, rough table with scattering fruits and dishes upon it, and six disciples on either side in their long robes, talking to each other-the picture from which all engravings and all copies have been made for three centuries Perhaps no living man has ever known an attempt to paint the Lord's Supper differently The world seems to have be come settled in the belief, long ago, that it is not possible for human genius to outdo this creation of Da Vinci's I suppose painters will go on copying it as long as any of the original is left visible to the eye. There were dozen easels in the room, and as many artists transfer ring the great picture to their canvases. Fifty proofs of steel engravings and lithographs were scattered around too And as usual, I could not help noticing how superior the copies were to the original, that is, to my inexperi enced eye Wherever you find a Raphael, a Rubens, a Michael Angelo, a Caracci, or a Da Vinci (and we see them every day,) you find artists copying them, and the copies are always the handsomest. Maybe the originals were handsome when they were new, but they are not now.

This picture is about thirty feet long, and ten or twelve high. I should think, and the figures are at least life size It is one of the largest paintings in Europe.

The colors are dimmed with age, the countenances are scaled and marred, and nearly all expression is gone from them; the hair is a dead blur upon the wall, and there is no life in the eyes. Only the attitudes are certain

People come here from all parts of the world, and glorify this masterpiece. They stand entranced before it with bated breath and parted lips, and when they speak, it is only in the catchy ejaculations of rapture.

O, wonderful!

Such expression!"

Such grace of attitude!"

Such dignity!"

Such faultless drawing!"

Such matchless coloring!"

Such feeling!"

"What delicacy of touch!"

'What sublimity of conception!"

"A vision! A vision!"

I only envy those people, I envy them their honest admiration, if it be honest—their delight, if they feel delight I harbor no animosity toward any of them But at the same time the thought wall intrude itself upon me, how can they see what is not visible? What would you think of a man who looked at some decayed, blind, toothless, pock-marked Cleopatra, and said "What matchless beauty! What soul! What expression!" What would you think of a man who gazed upon a dingy, foggy sunset, and said "What sublimity! What feeling! What richness of coloring!" What would you think of a man who stared in ecstasy upon a desert of stumps and said. Oh, my soul, my beating heart, what a noble forest is here!"

You would think that those men had an astonishing talent for seeing things that had already passed away. It was what I thought when I stood before the "Last Supper" and heard men apostrophizing wonders, and beauties and perfections which had faded out of the picture and gone, a hundred years before they were born We can imagine the beauty that was once in an aged face, we can imagine the forest if we see the stumps, but we can not absolutely see these things when they are not there I am willing to believe that the eye of the practiced artist can rest upon the "Last Supper" and renew a lustre where only a hint of it is left, supply a tint that has faded away, restore an expression that is gone, patch, and color, and add, to the dull canvas until at last its figures shall stand before him aglow with the so life, the feelings, the freshness, yea, with all the noble beauty that was theirs when first they came from the hand of the master But I can not work this miracle Can those other uninspired visitors do it, or do they only happily imagine they do^2

After reading so much about it, I am satisfied that the "Last Supper" was a very miracle of art once But it was three hundred years ago

It vexes me to hear people talk so glibly of "feeling," "expression," "tone," and those other easily acquired and 60 inexpensive technicalities of art that make such a fine show in conversations concerning pictures. There is not one man in seventy-five hundred that can tell what a pictured face is intended to express. There is not one man in five hundred that can go into a court-room and be sure that he will not mistake some harmless innocent of a juryman for the black-hearted assassin on trial. Yet such people talk of "character" and presume to interpret "expression" in pictures. There is an old story that Matthews, the actor, was once lauding the ability of the 70 human face to express the passions and emotions hidden in the breast. He said the countenance could disclose what was passing in the heart plainer than the tongue could

"Now," he said, "observe my face—what does it express?"

'Despair'

Bah, it expresses peaceful resignation! What does

"Rage!"

'Stuff' it means terror' This'

'Imbeculity'"

"Fool! It is smothered ferocity! Now this!"

'Joy'"

'Oh, perdition' Any ass can see it means insanity'

Expression' People coolly pretend to read it who would think themselves presumptuous if they pretended to interpret the hieroglyphics on the obelisks of Luxor—yet they are fully as competent to do the one thing as the other I have heard two very intelligent critics speak of 90 Murillo's Immaculate Conception (now in the museum at Seville) within the past few days One said

P()

"Oh, the Virgin's face is full of the ecstasy of a joy that is complete—that leaves nothing more to be desired on earth!"

The other said

"Ah, that wonderful face is so humble, so pleading it says as plainly as words could say it 'I fear, I tremble, I am unworthy But Thy will be done, sustain Thou Thy servant!'"

The reader can see the picture in any drawing-room, it can be easily recognized, the Virgin (the only young and really beautiful Virgin that was ever painted by one of the old masters, some of us think,) stands in the crescent of the new moon, with a multitude of cherubs hovering about her, and more coming, her hands are crossed upon her breast, and upon her uplifted countenance falls a glory out of the heavens. The reader may amuse himself, if he chooses, in trying to determine which of these gentlemen read the Virgin's "expression" aright, or if either of them did it

Any one who is acquainted with the old masters will comprehend how much the Last Supper is damaged when I say that the spectator can not really tell, now, whether the disciples are Hebrews or Italians These ancient painters never succeeded in denationalizing themselves The Italian artists painted Italian Virgins, the Dutch painted Dutch Virgins, the Virgins of the French painters were Frenchwomen-none of them ever put into the face of the Madonna that indescribable something which proclaims the Jewess, whether you find her in New York, 30 in Constantinople, in Paris, Jerusalem or in the Empire of Morocco 1 saw in the Sandwich Islands, once, a picture, copied by a talented German artist from an engraving in one of the American illustrated papers. It was an allegory, representing Mr. Davis in the act of signing a secession act or some such document. Over him hovered the ghost of Washington in warning attitude, and in the background a troop of shadowy soldiers in Continental uniform were limping with shoeless, bandaged feet through a driving snow-storm Valley Forge 40 was suggested, of course The copy seemed accurate, and yet there was a discrepancy somewhere. After a long examination I discovered what it was-the shadowy soldiers were all Germans! Jeff Davis was a German! Even the hovering ghost was a German ghost! The artist had unconsciously worked his nationality into the picture To tell the truth, I am getting a little perplexed about John the Baptist and his portraits. In France I finally grew reconciled to him as a Frenchman, here he is unquestionably an Italian What next? Can it be possible that the painters make John the Baptist a spaniard in Madrid and an Irishman in Dublin?

Chapter III:

THE TOMB OF ADAM

The Greek Chapel is the most roomy, the richest and the showiest chapel in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre Its altar, like that of all the Greek churches, is a loft screen that extends clear across the chapel, and is gorgeous with gilding and pictures. The numerous lamps that hang before it are of gold and silver, and cost great sums.

But the feature of the place is a short column that rises from the middle of the marble pavement of the chapel, and marks the exact centre of the earth. The most reliable traditions tell us that this was known to be the earth's centre, ages ago, and that when Christ was upon earth he set all doubts upon the subject forever, by stating with his own lips that the tradition was correct Remember, He said that that particular column stood upon the centre of the world If the centre of the world changes, the column changes its position accordingly This column has moved three different times, of its own accord This is because, in great convulsions of nature at three different times, masses of the earth-whole ranges of mountains, probably—have flown off into space, thus lessening the diameter of the earth, and changing the exact locality of its centre by a point or two This is a very curious and interesting circumstance and is a withering rebuke to those philosophers who would make us believe that it is not possible for any portion of the earth to fly off into space

To satisfy himself that this spot was really the centre of the earth, a sceptic once paid well for the privilege and of ascending to the dome of the church to see if the sun gave him a shadow at noon. He came down perfectly convinced. The day was very cloudy and the sun threw no shadows at all, but the man was satisfied that if the sun had come out and made shadows it could not have made any for him. Proofs like these are not to be set and by the idle tongues of cavilers. To such as are not bigoted, and are willing to be convinced, they carry a conviction that nothing can ever shake

If even greater proofs than those I have mentioned ire wanted, to satisfy the headstrong and the foolish that this is the genuine centre of the carth, they are here The greatest of them lies in the fact that from under this very column was taken the dust from which Adam was made. This can surely be regarded in the light of a settler. It is not likely that the original first man would have been made from an inferior quality of earth when it was entirely convenient to get first quality from the world's centre. This will strike any reflecting mind torcibly. That Adam was formed of dirt procured in this very spot is amply proven by the fact that in six thousand years no man has ever been able to prove that the dirt was not procured here whereof he was made.

It is a singular circumstance that right under the roof of this same church, and not far away from that illustrious column, Adam himself, the father of the human race, lies buried. There is no question that he is actually buried in the grave which is pointed out as his—there can be none—because it has never yet been proven that that grave is not the grave in which he is buried.

The tomb of Adam' How touching it was, here in a land of strangers, far away from home, and friends, and all who cared for me, thus to discover the grave of a blood relation The unerring instinct of nature thrilled its recognition. The fountain of my filial affection was 30 stirred to its profoundest depths, and I gave way to tumultuous emotion I leaned upon a pillar and burst into tears. I deem it no shame to have wept over the grave of my poor dead relative. Let him who would sneer at my emotion close this volume here, for he will find little to his taste in my journeyings through Holy Land Noble old man-he did not live to see me-he did not live to see his child And I-I-alas, I did not live to see him Weighed down by sorrow and disappointment, he died before I was born—six thousand brief summers 40 before I was born. But let us try to bear it with fortitude. Let us trust that he is better off, where he is Let us take comfort in the thought that his loss is our eternal gain

Actually the book was W C Prime's Tent Life in the Holy Land In one of the passages quoted, Prime had pointed out proudly how often he had wept 'It is no shame,' Prime had soid, to have wept in Palestine Let him who would sneer at my emotion close this value here, for he will find little to his taste in my journeyings through Holy Land"

From

Roughing It

Published in 1871, Roughing It, for its subject matter, went back a few years in Clemens' life to the period when he had gone to the Far West Informatively and amusingly, he recounted his journey across country and his Western adventures Like Innocents Abroad, this volume was highly successful, its sales aggregating almost forty thousand copies in three months. The following chapter shows how the author, by alternating exposition and description with humorous anecdotes, secured variety. The tall tales about the speed of the lackass rabbit and the appetite of the camel were vastly admired.

Chapter III

JACKASS RABBITS AND SAGEBRUSH

About an hour and a half before divlight we were bowling along smoothly over the road—so smoothly that our cradle only rocked in a gentle, lulling way, that was gradually soothing us to sleep, and dulling our consciousness—when something gave away under us! We were dimly aware of it, but indifferent to it. The coach stopped. We heard the driver and conductor talking together outside, and rummaging for a lantern, and swearing because they could not find it—but we had no interest in whatever had happened, and it only added to our comfort to think of those people out there at work in the murky night, and we snug in our nest with the curtains drawn. But presently, by the sounds, there seemed to be an examination going on, and then the driver's voice said.

"By George, the thoroughbrace is broke!"

This startled me broad awake—as an undefined sense of calamity is always apt to do I said to myself "Now, a thoroughbrace is probably part of a horse, and doubtless a vital part, too, from the dismay in the driver's voice Leg, maybe—and yet how could he break his leg waltzing along such a road as this? No, it can't be his leg. That is impossible, unless he was reaching for the driver. Now, what can be the thoroughbrace of a horse, I wonder? Well, whatever comes, I shall not air my ignorance in this crowd, anyway."

Just then the conductor's face appeared at a lifted to curtain, and his lantern glared in on us and our wall of mail matter. He said

"Gents, you'll have to turn out a spell Thoroughbrace is broke"

We climbed out into a chill drizzle and felt ever so homeless and dreary. When I found that the thing they called a "Thoroughbrace" was the massive combination of bolts and springs which the coach rocks itself in, I said to the driver.

"I never saw a thoroughbrace used up like that, to before, that I can remember. How did it happen?"

"Why, it happened by trying to make one coach carry three days' mail—that's how it happened," said he "And right here is the very direction which is wrote on all the newspaper-bags which was to be put out for the Injuns for to keep 'em quiet. It's most uncommon lucky, becuz it's so nation dark I should 'a' gone by unbeknowns if that air thoroughbrace hadn't broke.

I knew that he was in labor with another of those winks of his, though I could not see his face, because to he was bent down at work, and wishing him a safe delivery, I turned to and helped the rest get out the mail-sacks. It made a great pyramid by the roadside when it was all out. When they had mended the thoroughbrace we filled the two boots again, but put no mail on top, and only half as much inside as there was before. The conductor bent all the seats back down, and then filled the coach just half full of mul-bags from end to end We objected loudly to this, for it left us no seats. But the conductor was wiser than we, and said a bed was better than seats, and, moreover, this plan would protect his thoroughbraces. We never wanted any seats after that The lazy bed was infinitely preferable. I had many an exciting day, subsequently, lying on it reading the statutes and the dictionary, and wondering how the characters would turn out

The conductor said he would send back a guard from the next station to take charge of the abandoned mailbags, and we drove on

It was now just dawn, and as we stretched our cramped legs full length on the mail sacks, and gazed out through the windows across the wide wastes of greensward clad in cool, powdery mist to where there was an expectant look in the eastern horizon, our perfect enjoyment took the form of a tranquil and contented ecstasy. The stage whirled along at a spanking gait, the breeze flapping curtains and suspended coats in a most exhilarating way, the cradle swaved and swung luxuriously, the pattering of the horses' hoofs, the cracking of the driver's whip, and his "Hi-yi' g'lang!" were music, the spinning ground and the waltzing trees appeared to give us a mute hurrah as we went by, and then slack up and look after us with interest, or envy, or somerhing, and as we lay and smoked the pipe of peace and compared all this luxury with the years of tiresome city life that had gone before it, we felt that there was only one complete and satisfying happiness in the world, and we had found it

After breakfast, at some station whose name I have forgotten, we three climbed up on the seat behind the driver, and let the conductor have our bed for a nap -And by and by, when the sun made me drowsy, I lav down on my face on top of the coach, grasping the slender iron railing, and slept for an hour more. That will give one an appreciable idea of those matchless roads. Instinct will make a sleeping man grip a fast hold of the railing when the stage jolts, but when it only swings and sways, no grip is necessary. Overland drivers and conductors used to sit in their places and sleep thirty of forty minutes at a time, on good roads, while spinning along at the rate of eight or ten miles an hour I saw 9 them do it, often There was no danger about it; a sleeping man will seize the irons in time when the coach jolts. These men were hard worked, and it was not possible for them to stay awake all the time.

By and by we passed through Marysville, and over the Big Blue and Little Sandy thence about a mile, and entered Nebraska About a mile further on, we came to the Big Sandy—one hundred and eighty miles trom St Joseph

As the sun was going down, we saw the first specimen of an animal known familiarly over two thousand miles of mountain and desert-from Kansas clear to the Pacific Ocean-as the "jackass rabbit" He is well named He is just like any other rabbit, except that he is from one-third to twice as large, has longer legs in proportion to his size, and has the most preposterous ears that ever were mounted on any creature but a tackass When he is sitting quiet, thinking about his sins, or is absentminded or unapprehensive of danger, his majestic ears project above him conspicuously, but the breaking of a twig will scare him nearly to death, and then he tilts his ears back gently and starts for home. All you can see, then, for the next minute, is his long gray form stretched out straight and "streaking it" through the low sage-brush, head erect, eyes right, and ears just canted a little to the rear, but showing you where the animal is, all the time, the same as if he carried a 11b Now and then he makes a marvelous spring with his long legs, high over the stunted sage-brush, and scores a leap that would make a horse envious Presently, he comes down to a long, graceful "lope," and shortly he mysteriously disappears. He has crouched behind a sage-brush, and will sit there and listen and tremble until you get within six feet of him, when he will get under way again But one must shoot at this creature once, if he wishes to see him throw his heart into his heels, and do the best he knows how He is frightened clear through, now, and he lays his long ears down on his back, straightens himself out like a yard-stick every spring he makes, and scatters miles behind him with an casy indifference that is enchanting

Our party made this specimen "hump himself," as the conductor said. The Secretary started him with a shot from the Colt, I commenced spitting at him with mi weapon, and all in the same instant the old "Allen's" whole broadside let go with a rattling crash, and it is not putting it too strong to say that the rabbit was frantic! He dropped his ears, set up his tail, and left for San Francisco at a speed which can only be described as a flash and a vanish! Long after he was out of sight we could hear him whiz

I do not remember where we first came across "sage-brush," but as I have been speaking of it I may as well describe it. This is easily done, for if the reader can so imagine a gnarled and venerable live oak tree reduced to a little shrub two feet high, with its rough bark, its foliage, its twisted boughs, all complete, he can picture the "sage-brush exactly Often, on lazy afternoons in the mountains I have lain on the ground with my face under a sage-brush, and entertained myself with fancying that the gnats among its foliage were lilliputian birds, and that the ants marching and countermarching about its base were lilliputian flocks and herds, and myself some vast loafer from Brobdingnag waiting to catch a 60 little citizen and eat him

It is an imposing monarch of the forest in exquisite miniature, is the "sage-brush". Its foliage is a grayish green, and gives that tint to desert and mountain. It smells like our domestic sage, and 'sage-tea" made from it tastes like the sage-tea which all boys are so well acquainted with. The sage-brush is a singularly hardy plant, and grows right in the midst of deep sand, and among barren rocks, where nothing else in the vegetable world would try to grow, except "bunch-grass". The 70 sage-bushes grow from three to six or seven feet apart, all over the mountains and deserts of the Far West, clear to the borders of California There is not a tree of any kind in the deserts, for hundreds of miles-there is no vegetation at all in a regular desert, except the sagebrush and its cousin the "greasewood," which is so much like the sage-brush that the difference amounts to little Camp-fires and hot suppers in the deserts would be impossible but for the friendly sage-brush. Its trunk is as large as a boy's wrist (and from that up to a man's 80 arm), and its crooked branches are half as large as its trunk-all good, sound, hard wood, very like oak

When a party camps, the first thing to be done is to cut sage-brush, and in a few minutes there is an opulent pile of it ready for use. A hole a foot wide, two feet deep, and two feet long, is dug, and sage-brush chopped up and burned in it till it is full to the brim with glowing coals, then the cooking begins, and there is no smoke, and consequently no swearing. Such a fire will keep all night, with very little replenishing, and it makes a very sociable camp-fire, and one around which the most impossible reminiscences sound plausible, instructive, and profoundly entertaining

Sage-brush is very fair fuel, but as a vegetable it is a distinguished failure. Nothing can abide the taste of it but the jackass and his illegitimate child, the mule. But their testimony to its nutritiousness is worth nothing, for they will eat pine knots, or anthracite coal, or brass filings, or lead pipe, or old bottles, or anything that comes handy, and then go off looking as grateful as if they had had oysters for dinner Mules and donkeys and camels have appetites that anything will relieve temporarily, but nothing satisfy. In Syria, once, at the head-10 waters of the Jordan, a camel took charge of my overcoat while the tents were being pitched, and examined it with a critical eye, all over, with as much interest as if he had an idea of getting one made like it, and then, after he was done figuring on it as an article of apparel. he began to contemplate it as an article of diet. He put his foot on it, and lifted one of the sleeves out with his teeth, and chewed and chewed at it, gradually taking it in, and all the while opening and closing his eyes in a kind of religious ecstasy, as if he had never tasted any-20 thing as good as an overcoat before in his life. Then he smacked his lips once or twice, and reached after the other sleeve Next he tried the velvet collar, and smiled a smile of such contentment that it was plain to see that he regarded that as the daintiest thing about an overcoat The tails went next, along with some percussion caps and cough candy, and some fig-paste from Constantinople And then my newspaper correspondence dropped out, and he took a chance in that-manuscript letters written for the home papers. But he was treading on dangerous ground, now He began to come across solid wisdom in those documents that was rather weights on his stomach, and occasionally he would take a joke that would shake him up till it loosened his teeth, it was getting to be perilous times with him, but he held his giip with good courage and hopefully, till at last he began to stumble on statements that not even a camel could swallow with impunity. He began to gag and gasp, and his eyes to stand out, and his forelegs to spread, and in about a quarter of a minute he fell over as stiff as a carpenter's workbench, and died a death of indescribable agony. I went and pulled the manuscript out of his mouth, and found that the sensitive creature had choked to death on one of the mildest and gentlest statements of fact that I ever laid before a trusting

I was about to say, when diverted from my subject that occasionally one finds sage-bushes five or six terhigh, and with a spread of branch and foliage in proportion, but two or two and a half feet is the usual height

From

The Gilded Age

During 1873 Charles Dudley Warner (1829-1900), the author of a number of books, and his family were neighbors of the Clemens family in Hartford. One February evening when the Warners were dining with the Clemenses, Warner and his host said stern things about contemporary novels. Urged by their wives to show what they could do in the field, the two men accepted the challenge and collaborated on The Gilded Age (1873). The novel is remarkably good in some ways, remarkably bad in others.

Some characterizations, the account of the speculative activity of the period, and the indictments of corruption in government are excellent, but the rest is melodramatic and needlessly complicated. In some of the best parts, such as Chapters VII and VIII, here reprinted, Clemens created one of his great characters, Colonel Sellers. As the first passage opens, Washington Hawkins, a relative of the Colonel, arrives in Hawkeye, where the Colonel lives

Chapter VII

COLONEL SELLERS'S SCHEMES FOR MONEY-MAKING

Bearing Washington Hawkins and his fortunes, the stage-coach tore out of Swansea at a fearful gait, with horn tooting gaily and half the town admiring from doors and windows But it did not tear any more after it got to the outskirts, it dragged along stupidly enough, then -till it came in sight of the next hamlet, and then the bugle tooted gaily again, and again the vehicle went tearing by the houses. This sort of conduct marked every entry to a station and every exit from it, and so in those days children grew up with the idea that stagecoaches always tore and always tooted, but they also grew up with the idea that pirates went into action in their Sunday clothes, carrying the black flag in one hand and pistoling people with the other, merely because they were so represented in the pictures but these illusons vanished when later years brought their disenchanting wisdom. They learned then that the stagecoach is but a poor, plodding, vulgar thing in the solitudes of the highway, and that the pirate is only seedy, unfantastic "rough," when he is out of the pictures

Toward evening, the stage-coach came thundering no Hawkeye with a perfectly triumphant ostentation—which was natural and proper, for Hawkeye was a pretty large town for interior Missouri. Washington, very stiff ind tired and hungry, climbed out, and wondered how he was to proceed now. But his difficulty was quickly solved. Colonel Selleis came down the street on a run and arrived panting for breath. He said

Lord bless you-I'm glad to see you, Washingtonperfectly delighted to see you, my boy! I got your message Been on the lookout for you Heard the stage horn, but had a party I couldn't shake off-man that's got an enormous thing on hand-wants me to put some capital into it-and I tell you, my boy, I could do worse, I could do a deal worse No, now, let that luggage alone, Ill fix that Here, Jerry, got anything to do? All rightshoulder this plunder and follow me Come along, Washington Lord, I'm glad to see you! Wife and the children are just perishing to look at you Bless you, they won't know you, you've grown so Folks all well, l suppose? That's good-glad to hear that We're alwavs going to run down and see them, but I'm into so many operations, and they're not things a man feels like trusting to other people, and so somehow we keep putting it off Fortunes in them! Good gracious, it's the Country to pile up wealth in! Here we are-here's where the Sellers dynasty hangs out Dump it on the doorstep, lerry-the blackest Negro in the state, Washington, but got a good heart-mighty likely boy, is Jerry. And now I suppose you've got to have ten cents, Jerry. That's all right-when a man works for me-when a man-in the other pocket, I reckon-when a man-why, where 50 the mischief is that portmonnaie!-when a-well now that's odd-Oh now I remember, must have left it at the bank, and b' George I've left my check-book, too-Polly says I ought to have a nurse-well, no matter Let me have a dime, Washington, if you've got-ah, thanks Now clear out, Jerry, your complexion has brought on the twilight half an hour ahead of time Pretty fair joke -pretty fair Here he is, Polly! Washington's come, children!-come now, don't eat him up-finish him in the house Welcome, my boy, to a mansion that is proud 60 to shelter the son of the best man that walks on the ground Si Hawkins has been a good friend to me, and I believe I can say that whenever I've had a chance to put him into a good thing I've done it, and done it pretty cheerfully, too I put him into that sugar speculation-what a grand thing that was, if we hadn't held on too long!"

True enough, but holding on too long had utterly ruined both of them, and the saddest part of it was, that they never had had so much money to lose before, 70 for Sellers's sale of their mule crop that year in New Orleans had been a great financial success If he had kept out of sugar and gone back home content to stick to mules it would have been a happy wisdom. As it was, he managed to kill two birds with one stone—that is to say, he killed the sugar speculation by holding for high rates till he had to sell at the bottom figure, and that calamity killed the mule that laid the golden eggwhich is but a figurative expression and will be so understood Sellers had returned home cheerful but 80 empty-handed, and the mule business lipsed into other hands The sale of the Hawkins property by the sheriff had followed, and the Hawkins hearts been torn to see Uncle Dan'l and his wife pass from the auctionblock into the hands of a Negro trader and depart for the remote South to be seen no more by the family It had seemed like seeing their own flesh and blood sold into banishment

Washington was greatly pleased with the Sellers mansion. It was a two-story-and-a-half brick, and much more 90 stylish than any of its neighbors. He was borne to the family sitting-room in triumph by the swarm of little Sellerses, the parents following with their arms about each other's waists. The whole family were poorly and cheaply dressed, and the clothing, although neat and clean, showed many evidences of having seen long service. The Colonel's "stovepipe" hat was napless and shiny with much polishing, but nevertheless it had an almost convincing expression about it of having been just purchased new. The rest of his clothing was napless and shiny, too, but it had the air of being entirely satisfied with itself and blandly sorry for other people's clothes. It was growing rather dark in the house, and the evening air was chilly, too. Sellers said.

"Lay off your overcoat, Washington, and draw up to the stove and make yourself at home—just consider yourself under your own shingles, my boy—I'll have a fire going, in a jiffy Light the lamp, Polly, dear, and let's have things cheerful—just as glad to see you, Washington, as if you'd been lost a century and we'd found you again!"

By this time the Colonel was conveying a lighted match into a poor little stove. Then he propped the stove-door to its place by leaning the poker against it, for the hinges had retired from business. This door framed a small square of isinglass, which now warmed up with a faint glow. Mrs Sellers lit a cheap showy lamp, which dissipated a good deal of the gloom, and then everybody gathered into the light and took the stove into close companionship.

The children climbed all over Sellers, tondled him, petted him, and were lavishly petted in return. Out from this tugging, laughing, chattering disguise of legs and arms and little faces, the Colonel's voice worked its way and his tireless tongue ran blithely on without interruption, and the purring little wife, diligent with her knitting, sat near at hand and looked happy and proud and grateful, and she listened as one who listens to oracles and gospels and whose grateful soul is being refreshed with the bread of life. By and by the children quieted down to listen, clustered about their father, and resting their elbows on his legs, they hung upon his words as if he were uttering the music of the spheres.

A dreary old haircloth sofa against the wall, a few damaged chairs, the small table the lamp stood on; the crippled stove—these things constituted the furniture of the room. There was no carpet on the floor; on the wall were occasional square-shaped interruptions of the general tint of the plaster which betrayed that there used to be pictures in the house—but there were none.

now. There were no mantel ornaments, unless one might bring himself to regard as an ornament a clock which never came within fifteen strokes of striking the right time, and whose hands always hitched together at twenty-two minutes past anything and traveled in company the rest of the way home.

"Remarkable clock!" said Sellers, and got up and wound it "I've been offered-well, I wouldn't expect you to believe what I've been offered for that clock Old Governor Hager never sees me but he says, 'Come, now Colonel, name your price—I must have that clock!' But my goodness I'd as soon think of selling my wife As I was saying to-silence in the court, now, she's begun to strike! You can't talk against her-you have to just be patient and hold up till she's said her say Ah-well, as I was saying, when-she's beginning again' Nineteen twenty, twenty-one, twenty-two, twen-ah, that's all Yes, as I was saying to old Judge-go it, old girl, done mind me Now how is that? Isn't that a good, spirited tone? She can wake the dead! Sleep? Why you might as well try to sleep in a thunder factory. Now just listen at that She'll strike a hundred and fifty, now, without stopping-you'll see There ain't another clock like that in Christendom"

Washington hoped that this might be true, for the din was distracting—though the family, one and all, seemed filled with joy, and the more the clock "buckled down to her work" as the Colonel expressed it, and the more insupportable the clatter became, the more enchanted they all appeared to be When there was silence, Mrs Sellers lifted upon Washington a face that beamed with a childlike pride, and said

"It belonged to his grandmother

The look and the tone were a plain call for admiring surprise, and therefore Washington said—(it was the only thing that offered itself at the moment)

"Indeed!"

"Yes, it did, didn't it, father!" exclaimed one of the twins "She was my great-grandmother—and George's too, wasn't she, father! You never saw her, but Sis has seen her, when Sis was a baby—didn't you, Sis' Sis has seen her niost a hundred times. She was awtul deef—she's dead, now. Ain't she, father!"

All the children chimed in, now, with one general Babel of information about deceased—nobody offering to read the riot act or seeming to discountenance the insurrection or disapprove of it in any way—but the t_{head} twin drowned all the turmoil and held his own t_{gainst} the field

It's our clock, now—and it's got wheels inside of it, and a thing that flutters every time she strikes—don't the father! Great-grandmother died before hardly any of us were born—she was an Old-School Baptist and had warts all over her—you ask father if she didn't She had in uncle once that was baldheaded and used to have its, he wasn't our uncle, I don't know what he was to us—some kin or another I reckon—father's seen him thousand times—hain't you father! We used to have a calf that et apples and just chawed up dishrags like nothing, and if you stay here you'll see lots of funerals—won't he, Sis! Did you ever see a house afire! I have! Once me and Jim Terry—"

But Sellers began to speak now, and the storm ceased He began to tell about an enormous speculation he was thinking of embarking some capital in-a speculation which some London bankers had been over to consult with him about-and soon he was building glittering pyramids of coin, and Washington was presently growing opulent under the magic of his eloquence But at the same time Washington was not able to ignore the cold entirely. He was nearly as close to the stove as he could get, and yet he could not persuade himself that he felt the slightest heat, notwithstanding the isinglass door was still gently and serenely glowing. He tried to get trifle closer to the stove, and the consequence was, he tripped the supporting poker and the stove-door tumbled to the floor And then there was a revelation—there was nothing in the stove but a lighted tallow candle

The poor youth blushed and felt as if he must die with shame But the Colonel was only disconcerted for moment—he straightway found his voice again

A little idea of my own, Washington—one of the greatest things in the world! You must write and tell your tather about it—don't forget that, now I have been reading up some European scientific reports—friend of mine, Count Fugier, sent them to me—sends me all sorts of things from Paris—he thinks the world of me, Fugier loes Well, I saw that the Academy of France had been testing the properties of heat, and they came to the conclusion that it was a non-conductor or something like that, and of course its influence must necessarily be deadly in nervous organizations with excitable temperaments, especially where there is any tendency toward rheumatic affections. Bless you, I saw in a moment what was the matter with us, and says I, out goes your fires'—no more slow torture and certain death for me, sir What you want is the appearance of heat, not the so heat itself—that's the idea Well, how to do it was the next thing I just put my head to work, pegged away a couple of days, and here you are! Rheumatism? Why a man can't any more start a case of rheumatism in this house than he can shake an opinion out of a mummy! Stove with a candle in it and a transparent door—that's it—it has been the salvation of this family Don't you fail to write your father about it, Washington And tell him the idea is mine—I'm no more conceited than most people, I reckon, but you know it is human nature for a man to want credit for a thing like that."

Washington said with his blue lips that he would, but he said in his secret heart that he would promote no such iniquity. He tried to believe in the healthfulness of the invention, and succeeded tolerably well, but after all he could not feel that good health in a frozen body was any real improvement on the rheumatism.

Chapter VIII

COLONEL SELLERS ENTERTAINS WASHINGTON HAWKINS

The supper at Colonel Sellers's was not sumptuous, in the beginning, but it improved on acquaintance. That is to say that what Washington regarded at first sight as 70 mere lowly potatoes, presently became awe-inspiring agricultural productions that had been reared in some ducal garden beyond the sea, under the sacred eye of the duke himself, who had sent them to Sellers, the bread was from corn which could be grown in only one favored locality in the earth and only a favored few could get it, the Rio coffee, which at first seemed execrable to the taste, took to itself an improved flavor when Washington was told to drink it slowly and not harry what should be a lingering luxury in order to 80 be fully appreciated—it was from the private stores of a Brazilian nobleman with an unrememberable name The Colonel's tongue was a magician's wand that turned dried apples into figs and water into wine as easily as it could change a hovel into a palace and present poverty into imminent future riches

Washington slept in a cold bed in a carpetless room and woke up in a palace in the morning, at least the palace lingered during the moment that he was rubbing his eyes and getting his bearings—and then it disappeared and he recognized that the Colonel's inspiring talk had been influencing his dreams. Fatigue had made him sleep late, when he entered the sitting-room he noticed that the old haircloth sofa was absent, when he sat down to breakfast the Colonel tossed six or seven dollars in bills on the table, counted them over, said he was a little short and must call upon his banker, then returned the bills to his wallet with the indifferent air of a man who is used to money. The breakfast was not an improvement upon the supper, but the Colonel talked it up and transformed it into an oriental feast. By and by, he said

"I intend to look out for you, Washington, my boy I hunted up a place for you yesterday, but I am not referring to that, now-that is a mere livelihood-mere bread and butter, but when I say I mean to look out 20 for you I mean something very different. I mean to put things in your way that will make a mere livelihood a trifling thing. I'll put you in a way to make more money than you'll ever know what to do with You'll be right here where I can put my hand on you when anything turns up I've got some prodigious operations on foot, but I'm keeping quiet, mum's the word, your old hand don't go around powwowing and letting everybody see his k'yards and find out his little game. But all in good time. Washington, all in good time. You'll see. Now, 30 there's an operation in corn that looks well. Some New York men are trying to get me to go into it-buy up all the growing crops and just boss the market when they mature—ah, I tell you it's a great thing. And it only costs a trifle, two millions or two and a half will do it I haven't exactly promised yet-there's no hurry-the more indifferent I seem, you know, the more anxious those fellows will get. And then there is the hog speculation-that's bigger still. We've got quiet men at work, (he was very impressive here,) "mousing around, to get an propositions out of all the farmers in the whole West and Northwest for the hog crop, and other agents quietly getting propositions and terms out of all the manufactories-and don't you see, if we can get all the hogs and all the slaughter-houses into our hands on the dead quiet-whew! it would take three ships to carry the money I've looked into the thing-calculated all the chances for and all the chances against, and though I shake my head and hesitate and keep on thinking, apparently, I've got my mind made up that if the thing can be done on a capital of six millions, that's the horse to put up money on! Why, Washington—but what's the use of talking about it—any man can see that there's whole Atlantic oceans of cash in it, gulfs and bays thrown in. But there's a bigger thing than that yet—a bigger—"

"Why, Colonel, you can't want anything bigger" said Washington, his eyes blazing "Oh, I wish I could go into either of those speculations—I only wish I had money—I wish I wasn't cramped and kept down and fettered with poverty, and such prodigious chances lying 12 right here in sight! Oh, it is a fearful thing to be poor But don't throw away those things—they are so splendid and I can see how sure they are Don't throw them away for something still better and maybe fail in it! I wouldn't, Colonel I would stick to these I wish father were here and were his old self again. Oh, he never in his life had such chances as these are Colonel, you can't improve on these—no man can improve on them!

A sweet, compassionate smile played about the Colonel's features, and he leaned over the table with the 7 air of a man who is "going to show you" and do it without the least trouble

"Why Washington, my boy, these things are nothing They look large—of course they look large to a novice but to a man who has been all his life accustomed to large operations—pshaw! They're well enough to while away an idle hour with, or furnish a bit of enjoyment that will give a trifle of idle capital a chance to eirn its bread while it is waiting for something to do but—now just listen a moment—just let me give you an idea of what we old veterans of commerce call 'business' Here's the Rothschilds' proposition—this is between you and me, you understand—"

Washington nodded three or four times impatiently and his glowing eyes said, "Yes, yes—hurry—I under stand—"

"—for I wouldn't have it get out for a fortune They want me to go in with them on the sly—agent was here two weeks ago about it—go in on the sly" (voice down to an impressive whisper, now) "and buy up a hundred and thirteen wildcat banks in Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky Illinois, and Missouri—notes of these banks are at all sorts of discount now—average discount of the hundred and thirteen is forty-four per cent,—buy them all up, vou see, and then all of a sudden let the car out of the bag! Whiz! the stock of every one of those wildcats would spin up to a tremendous premium before ou could turn a handspring—profit on the speculation on a dollar less than forty millions!" (An eloquent pause, while the marvelous vision settled into W's tocus) "Where's your hogs now! Why, my dear innocent boy, we would just sit down on the front doorsteps and peddle banks like lucifer matches!"

Washington finally got his breath and said

Oh, it is perfectly wonderful! Why couldn't these things have happened in father's day? And I—it's of no use—they simply lie before my face and mock me There is nothing for me but to stand helpless and see other people reap the astonishing harvest.

"Never mind Washington, don't you worry I'll fix you There's plenty of chances How much money have you got?"

In the presence of so many millions, Washington a could not keep from blushing when he had to confess that he had eighteen dollars in the world

"Well, all right-don't despair Other people have been obliged to begin with less. I have a small idea that may develop into something for us both, all in good time Keep your money close and add to it I'll make it breed I've been experimenting (to pass away the time) on a little preparation for curing sore eyes—a kind of decoction nine-tenths water and the other tenth drugs that don't cost more than a dollar a barrel, I'm still experimenting, there's one ingredient wanted yet to perfect the thing, and somehow I can't just manage to hit upon the thing that's necessary, and I don't dare talk with a chemist, of course But I'm progressing, and before many weeks I wager the country will ring with the tame of Beriah Sellers's Infallible Imperial Oriental Optic Liniment and Salvation for Sore Eyes-the Medical Wonder of the Age! Small bottles fifty cents, large ones a dollar Average cost, five and seven cents for the two sizes. The first year sell, say, ten thousand bottles in Missouri, seven thousand in Iowa, three thousand in Arkansas, four thousand in Kentucky, six thousand in Illinois, and say twenty-five thousand in the rest of the country Total, fifty-five thousand bottles, profit clear of all expenses, twenty thousand dollars at the very lowest calculation All the capital needed is to manufacture the first two thousand bottles-say a hundred and fifty dollars-then the money would begin to flow in

The second year, sales would reach two hundred thousand bottles—clear profit, say seventy-five thousand dollars—and in the mean time the great factory would be building in St. Louis, to cost, say, one hundred thousand dollars. The third year we could easily sell one million bottles in the United States and—"

"O, splendid" said Washington "Let's commence right away—let's—"

"—one million bottles in the United States—profit at least three hundred and fifty thousand dollars—and then it would begin to be time to turn our attention toward the real idea of the business

"The real idea of it! Ain't three hundred and fifty 60 thousand dollars a year a pretty real—"

"Stuff! Why, what an infant you are, Washingtonwhat a guileless, short-sighted, easily contented innocent you are my poor little country-bred knownothing! Would I go to all that trouble and bother for the poor crumbs a body might pick up in this country? Now do I look like a man who-does my history suggest that I am a man who deals in trifles, contents himself with the narrow horizon that hems in the common herd, sees no further than the end of his nose? Now, 70 you know that that is not me-couldn't be me You ought to know that if I throw my time and abilities into a patent medicine, it's a patent medicine whose field of operations is the solid earth! its clients the swarming nations that inhabit it! Why what is the republic of America for an eye-water country? Lord bless you, it is nothing but a barren highway that you've got to cross to get to the true eye-water market! Why, Washington, in the Oriental countries people swarm like the sands of the desert, every square mile of ground 80 upholds its thousands upon thousands of struggling human creatures-and every separate and individual devil of them's got the ophthalmia! It's as natural to them as noses are-and sin It's born with them, it stays with them, it's all that some of them have left when they die Three years of introductory trade in the Orient and what will be the result? Why, our headquarters would be in Constantinople and our hindquarters in Further India! Factories and warehouses in Cairo, Ispahan, Bagdad, Damascus, Jerusalem, Yedo, 90 Peking, Bangkok, Delhi, Bombay, and Calcutta' Annual income-well, God only knows how many millions and millions apiece!"

Washington was so dazed, so bewildered-his heart and his eyes had wandered so far away among the strange lands beyond the seas, and such avalanches of coin and currency had fluttered and jingled confusedly down before him, that he was now as one who has been whirling round and round for a time, and, stopping all at once, finds his surroundings still whirling and all objects a dancing chaos. However, little by little the Sellers family cooled down and crystallized into shape, and the poor room lost its glitter and 10 resumed its poverty. Then the youth found his voice and begged Sellers to drop everything and hurry up the eve-water, and he got his eighteen dollars and tried to force it upon the Colonel-pleaded with him to take it -implored him to do it But the Colonel would not, said he would not need the capital (in his native magnificent way he called that eighteen dollars capital) till the eve-water was an accomplished fact. He made Washington easy in his mind, though, by promising that he would call for it just as soon as the invention 20 was finished, and he added the glad tidings that nobody but just they two should be admitted to a share in the speculation

When Washington left the breakfast-table he could have worshiped that man. Washington was one of that kind of people whose hopes are in the very clouds one day, and in the gutter the next. He walked on air, now The Colonel was ready to take him around and introduce him to the employment he had found for him, but Washington begged for a few moments in which 30 to write home, with his kind of people, to ride today's new interest to death and put off vesterday's till another time, is nature itself. He ran up-stairs and wrote glowingly, enthusiastically, to his mother about the hogs and the corn, the banks and the eye-water-and added a few inconsequential millions to each project And he said that people little dreamed what a man Colonel Sellers was, and that the world would open its eves when it found out. And he closed his letter thus

So make yourself perfectly easy, mother—in a little while you shall have everything you want, and more I am not likely to stint you in anything. I fancy This money will not be for me, alone, but for all of us I want all to share alike, and there is going to be far more for each than one person can spend Break it to father cautiously—you understand the need of that—break it to him cautiously, for he has had such cruel hard fortune, and is so stricken by it that great good news might prostrate him more surely than even bad, for he is used to the bad but is grown sadly unaccustomed to the other Tell Laura—tell all the children. And write to Clay about it if he is not with you yet. You may tell Clay that whatever I get he can freely share in—freely. He knows that its true—there will be no need that I should swear to that to make him believe it. Good-by—and mind what I say. Rest perfectly easy, one and all of you, for our troubles are nearly at an end.

Poor lad, he could not know that his mother would cry some loving, compassionate tears over his letter and put off the family with a synopsis of its contents which conveyed a deal of love to them but not much idea of his prospects or projects. And he never dreamed that such a joyful letter could sadden her and fill her night with sighs, and troubled thoughts, and bodings of the future, instead of filling it with peace and blessing it with restful sleep.

When the letter was done, Washington and the Colonel sallied forth, and as they walked along Washing ton learned what he was to be. He was to be a clerk in a real-estate office. Instantly the fickle youth's dreams forsook the magic eye-water and flew back to the Tennessee Land. And the gorgeous possibilities of that great domain straightway began to occupy his imagination to such a degree that he could scarcely manage to keep even enough of his attention upon the Colonel's talk to retain the general run of what he was saying. He was glad it was a real-estate office—he was a made man now, sure

The Colonel said that General Boswell was a rich man and had a good and growing business, and that Wash ington's work would be light and he would get forth dollars a month and be boarded and lodged in the General's family—which was as good as ten dollars more and even better, for he could not live as well even at the "City Hotel" as he would there, and yet the hotel charged fifteen dollars a month where a man had a good room

General Boswell was in his office, a comfortable-looking place, with plenty of outline maps hanging about the walls and in the windows, and a spectacled man was marking out another one on a long table. The office was in the principal street. The General received Washington with a kindly but reserved politeness Washington rather liked his looks. He was about fifty years old, dignified, well preserved, and well dressed. After the Colonel took his leave, the General talked while with Washington—his talk consisting chiefly of instructions about the clerical duties of the place.

He seemed satisfied as to Washington's ability to take to care of the books, he was evidently a pretty fair theoretical bookkeeper, and experience would soon harden theory into practice. By and by dinner-time came, and the two walked to the General's house, and now Washington noticed an instinct in himself that moved him to keep not in the General's rear, exactly, but yet not at his side—somehow the old gentleman's dignity and reserve did not inspire familiarity.

From

Old Times on the Mississippi

Out for a long walk in the woods with his friend the Rev Joseph Twichell in 1874, Clemens got to reminiscing about "old Mississippi days of steamboating glory and grandeur as I saw them——from the pilot-house" "What a virgin subject to hurl into a magazine!" said Twichell When Clemens wrote about the experience to his friend William Dean Howells, editor of the Atlantic, Howells urged him to write a series of reminiscences "Old Times on the Mississippi appeared in six installments between January and July 1875. In 1883 the articles, augmented with new material, were published as Life on the Mississippi, in which "A Daring Deed" became Chapter VII and "Continued Perplexities" became Chapter IX

The following passages are part of Clemens account of his apprenticeship as a pilot. The first paragraph—a ransitional paragraph—is omitted from "A Daring Deed"

A DARING DEED

The pilot-house was full of pilots, going down to look at the river" What is called the "upper river" the two hundred miles between St Louis and Cairo, where the Ohio comes in) was low, and the Mississippi changes its channel so constantly that the pilots used to always find it necessary to run down to Cairo to take a fresh look, when their boats were to lie in port a week, that is, when the water was at a low stage. A deal of this 'looking at the river' was done by poor fellows who seldom had a berth, and whose only hope of getting one 10 lay in their being always freshly posted and therefore ready to drop into the shoes of some reputable pilot. for a single trip, on account of such pilot's sudden illness, or some other necessity. And a good many of them constantly ran up and down inspecting the river, not because they ever really hoped to get a berth, but because (they being guests of the boat) it was cheaper to "look at the river" than stay ashore and pay board. In time these fellows grew dainty in their tastes, and only infested boats that had an established reputation for 20 setting good tables. All visiting pilots were useful, for they were always ready and willing, winter or summer, night or day, to go out in the yawl and help buoy the channel or assist the boat's pilots in any way they could They were likewise welcomed because all pilots are tireless talkers, when gathered together, and as they talk only about the river they are always understood and are always interesting. Your true pilot cares nothing about anything on earth but the river, and his pride in his occupation surpasses the pride of kings

We had a fine company of these river inspectors along this trip. There were eight or ten, and there was abundance of room for them in our great pilot-house. Two or three of them wore polished silk hats, elaborate shirt-fronts, diamond breastpins, kid gloves, and patent-leather boots. They were choice in their English, and bore themselves with a dignity proper to men of solid means and prodigious reputation as pilots. The others were more or less loosely clad, and wore upon their heads tall felt cones that were suggestive of the days of the Commonwealth.

I was a cipher in this august company, and felt subdued, not to say torpid 1 was not even of sufficient consequence to assist at the wheel when it was necessary to put the tiller hard down in a hurry, the guest that stood nearest did that when occasion required—and this was pretty much all the time, because of the crookedness of the channel and the scant water I stood in a corner, and the talk I listened to took the hope all out of me One visitor said to another

"Jim, how did you run Plum Point, coming up?"

"It was in the night, there, and I ran it the way one of the boys on the Diana told me, started out about fifty yards above the wood-pile on the false point, and held on the cabin under Plum Point till I raised the reef—quarter less twain—then straightened up for the middle bar till I got well abreast the old one-limbed cottonwood in the bend, then got my stern on the cottonwood, and head on the low place above the point, and came through a-booming—nine and a half."

"Pretty square crossing, an't it?"

"Yes, but the upper bar's working down fast"

Another pilot spoke up and said

"I had better water than that, and ran it lower down, started out from the false point—mark twain—raised the second reef abreast the big snag in the bend, and parter less twain."

One of the gorgeous ones remarked

"I don't want to find fault with your leadsmen, but that's a good deal of water for Plum Point, it seems to me"

There was an approving nod all around as this quiet snub dropped on the boaster and "settled" him. And so they went on talk-talk-talking Meantime, the thing that was running in my mind was, "Now, if my ears hear aright, I have not only to get the names of all the 40 towns and islands and bends, and so on, by heart, but I must even get up a warm personal acquaintanceship with every old snag and one-limbed cottonwood and obscure wood-pile that ornaments the banks of this river for twelve hundred miles, and more than that, I must actually know where these things are in the dark, unless these guests are gifted with eyes that can pierce through two miles of solid blackness. I wish the piloting business was in Jericho and I had never thought of it"

At dusk Mr Bixby tapped the big bell three times (the signal to land), and the captain emerged from his drawing-room in the forward end of the "texas," and looked up inquiringly Mr Bixby said

"We will lay up here all night, captain"

'Very well, sir"

That was all The boat came to shore and was tied up for the night. It seemed to me a fine thing that the pilot could do as he pleased, without asking so grand a captain's permission. I took my supper and went immediately to bed, discouraged by my day's observations and experiences. My late voyage's note-booking was but a confusion of meaningless names. It had tangled me all up in a knot every time I had looked at it in the daytime. I now hoped for respite in sleep, but no, it reveled all through my head till sunrise again, a frantic and tireless nightmare.

Next morning I felt pretty rusty and low-spirited We went booming along, taking a good many chances, for we were anxious to "get out of the river" (as getting out to Cairo was called) before night should overtake us But Mr Bixby's partner, the other pilot, presently grounded the boat, and we lost so much time getting her off that it was plain the darkness would overtake us a good long way above the mouth. This was a great misfortune, especially to certain of our visiting pilots, whose boats would have to wait for their return, no matter how long that might be It sobered the pilothouse talk a good deal Coming up-stream, pilots did not mind low water or any kind of darkness, nothing stopped them but fog But down-stream work was different, a boat was too nearly helpless, with a stiff current pushing behind her, so it was not customary to run down-stream at night in low water

There seemed to be one small hope, however if we could get through the intricate and dangerous Hat Island crossing before night, we could venture the rest for we would have plainer sailing and better water But it would be insanity to attempt Hat Island at night. So there was a deal of looking at watches all the rest of the day, and a constant ciphering upon the speed we were making. Hat Island was the eternal subject, sometimes hope was high and sometimes we were delayed in a bad crossing, and down it went again. For hours all hands lay under the burden of this suppressed excitement it was even communicated to me, and I got to teeling so solicitous about Hat Island, and under such in awful pressure of responsibility, that I wished I rought have five minutes on shore to draw a good, full, telieving breath, and start over again. We were standing no regular watches Each of our pilots ran such portions of the river as he had run when coming upream, because of his greater familiarity with it, but both remained in the pilot-house constantly

An hour before sunset Mr Bixby took the wheel, and Mt W stepped aside For the next thirty minutes every man held his watch in his hand and was restless, silent, ad uneasy. At last somebody said, with a doomful sigh

"Well, yonder's Hat Island—and we can't make it" All the watches closed with a snap, everybody sighed tad muttered something about its being "too bad, too bid-ah, if we could only have got here half an hour sooner" and the place was thick with the atmosphere of disappointment Some started to go out, but loitered, beiring no bell-tap to land. The sun dipped behind the horizon, the boat went on Inquiring looks passed from one guest to another, and one who had his hand on the door-knob and had turned it, waited, then presently took away his hand and let the knob turn back again We bore steadily down the bend More looks were exchanged, and nods of surprised admiration -but no words Insensibly the men drew together behind Mr Bixby as the sky darkened and one or two dim stars came out. The dead silence and sense of waiting became oppressive Mr Bixby pulled the cord, and two deep, mellow notes from the big bell floated off on the night. Then a pause, and one more note was struck The watchman's voice followed, from the hurricane-deck

"Labboard lead, there! Stabboard lead!"

The cries of the leadsmen began to rise out of the distance, and were gruffly repeated by the word-passers on the hurricane-deck

"M-a-r-k three' M-a-r-k three' Quarter-less-three' Half twain' Quarter twain' M-a-r-k twain' Quarterless-"

Mr Bixby pulled two bell-ropes, and was answered by faint jinglings far below in the engine-room, and our speed slackened The steam began to whistle through the gauge-cocks The cries of the leadsmen went on-and it is a weird sound, always, in the night Every pilot in the lot was watching now, with fixed eyes, and talking under his breath. Nobody was calm and easy but Mr Bixby He would put his wheel down and stand 50 on a spoke, and as the steamer swung into her (to me) utterly invisible marks-for we seemed to be in the midst of a wide and gloomy sea-he would meet and fasten her there Out of the murmur of half-audible talk, one caught a coherent sentence now and thensuch as

"There, she's over the first recf all right!"

After a pause another subdued voice

"Her stern's coming down just exactly right, by George"

"Now she's in the marks, over she goes!" Somebody else muttered

"Oh, it was done beautiful--beautiful"

Now the engines were stopped altogether, and we drifted with the current. Not that I could see the boat drift, for I could not, the stars being all gone by this time. This drifting was the dismalest work, it held one's heart still Presently I discovered a blacker gloom than that which surrounded us. It was the head of the island We were closing right down upon it. We entered its 70 deeper shadow, and so imminent seemed the peril that I was likely to suffocate, and I had the strongest impulse to do something, anything, to save the vessel But still Mr Bixby stood by his wheel, silent, intent as a cat, and all the pilots stood shoulder to shoulder at his back

"She'll not make it!" somebody whispered

The water grew shoaler and shoaler, by the leadsman's cries, till it was down to "Eight-and-a-half! E-i-g-h-t feet! E-i-g-h-t feet! 80 Seven-and--"

Mr Bixby said warningly through his speaking-tube to the engineer

"Stand by, now!"

"Ay, ay, sir!"

"Seven-and-a-half! Seven feet! Six-and---"

We touched bottom! Instantly Mr Bixby set a lot of bells ringing, shouted through the tube, "Now, let her have it-every ounce you've got!" then to his partner, "Put her hard down! snatch her! snatch her!" The boat 90 rasped and ground her way through the sand, hung upon the apex of disaster a single tremendous instant, and then over she went! And such a shout as went up at Mr. Bixby's back never loosened the roof of a pilothouse before!

There was no more trouble after that Mr. Bixby was a hero that night; and it was some little time, too, before his exploit ceased to be talked about by river-men.

Fully to realize the marvelous precision required in laying the great steamer in her marks in that murky waste of water, one should know that not only must she pick her intricate way through snags and blind reefs, and then shave the head of the island so closely as to brush the overhanging foliage with her stern, but at one place she must pass almost within arm's reach of a sunken and invisible wreck that would snatch the hull timbers from under her if she should strike it, and destroy a quarter of a million dollars' worth of steamboat and cargo in five minutes, and maybe a hundred and fifty human lives into the bargain

The last remark I heard that night was a compliment to Mr Bixby, uttered in soliloquy and with unction by one of our guests He said

"By the Shadow of Death, but he's a lightning pilot!"

CONTINUED PERPLEXITIES

I promptly put such a strain on my memory that by and by even the shoal water and the countless crossing-marks began to stay with me But the result was just the same I never could more than get one knotty thing learned before another presented itself. Now I had often seen pilots gazing at the water and pretending to read it as if it were a book, but it was a book that told me nothing. A time came at last, however, when Mr Bixby seemed to think me far enough advanced to bear a lesson on water-reading. So he began.

"Do you see that long, slanting line on the face of the water? Now, that's a reef. Moreover, it's a bluff reef. There is a solid sand-bar under it that is nearly as straight up and down as the side of a house. There is plenty of water close up to it, but mighty little on top of it. If you were to hit it you would knock the boat's brains out. Do you see where the line fringes out at the 40 upper end and begins to fade away?"

"Yes, sir"

"Well, that is a low place, that is the head of the reef You can climb over there, and not hurt anything Cross over, now, and follow along close under the reef—easy water there—not much current."

I followed the reef along till I approached the fringed end. Then Mr. Bixby said:

"Now get ready. Wait till I give the word She won t want to mount the reef; a boat hates shoal water Stand by—wait—wait—keep her well in hand Now cramp her down! Snatch her! snatch her!"

He seized the other side of the wheel and helped to spin it around until it was hard down, and then we held it so. The boat resisted, and refused to answer for a while, and next she came surging to starboard, mounted the reef, and sent a long, angry ridge of water foaming away from her bows.

"Now watch her, watch her like a cat, or she'll get away from you When she fights strong and the tiller slips a little, in a jerky, greasy sort of way, let up on a her a trifle, it is the way she tells you at night that the water is too shoal, but keep edging her up, on the bar now, there is a bar under every point, because the water that comes down around it forms an eddy and allows the sediment to sink. Do you see those fine lines on the face of the water that branch out like the ribs of a fan? Well, those are little reefs, you want to just miss the ends of them, but run them pretty close Now look out-look out! Don't you crowd that slick, greasylooking place, there ain't nine feet there, she wont? stand it She begins to smell it, look sharp, I tell you' Oh, blazes, there you go! Stop the starboard wheel! Quick! Ship up to back! Set her back!

The engine bells jingled and the engines answered promptly, shooting white columns of steam far aloft out of the 'scape-pipes, but it was too late. The boat had "smelt" the bar in good earnest, the foamy ridges that radiated from her bows suddenly disappeared, a great dead swell came rolling forward, and swept ahead of her she careened far over to larboard, and went tearing awab toward the shore as if she were about scared to death. We were a good mile from where we ought to have been when we finally got the upper hand of her again.

During the afternoon watch the next day, Mr. Bixby asked me if I knew how to run the next few miles I said.

"Go inside the first snag above the point, outside the next one, start out from the lower end of Higgins's woodyard, make a square crossing, and—"

That's all right. I'll be back before you close up on the next point."

But he wasn't He was still below when I rounded it ad entered upon a piece of the river which I had some pisgivings about I did not know that he was hiding behind a chimney to see how I would perform. I went gady along, getting prouder and prouder, for he had never left the boat in my sole charge such a length of ome before I even got to "setting" her and letting the wheel go entirely, while I vaingloriously turned my back ad inspected the stern marks and hummed a tune, sort of easy indifference which I had prodigiously admired in Bixby and other great pilots Once I inspected rather long, and when I faced to the front again my heart flew into my mouth so suddenly that if I hadn't clapped my teeth together I should have lost it One of those frightful bluff reefs was stretching its deadly length right across our bows! My head was gone in a moment, I did not know which end I stood on, I gasped and could not get my breath, I spun the wheel down with such rapidity that it wove itself together like a spider's web, the boat answered and turned square away from the reef, but the reef followed her! I fled, but still it followed, still it kept-right across my bows! I never looked to see where I was going, I only fled The awful crash was imminent Why didn't that villain come? If I committed the crime of ringing a bell I might get thrown overboard. But better that than kill the boat. So in blind desperation, I started such a ratding "shivaree" down below as never had astounded in engineer in this world before, I fancy Amidst the trenzy of the bells the engines began to back and fill in a curious way, and my reason forsook its throne-we were about to crash into the woods on the other side of the river Just then Mr Bixby stepped calmly into view on the hurricane-deck. My soul went out to him in cratitude My distress vanished, I would have felt safe on the brink of Niagara with Mr Bixby on the hurricane-Jeck. He blandly and sweetly took his toothpick out of · %5 mouth between his fingers, as if it were a cigar we were just in the act of climbing an overhanging big rce, and the passengers were scudding astern like ratsnd lifted up these commands to me ever so gently Stop the starboard! Stop the larboard! Set her back a both!

The boat hesitated, halted, pressed her nose among the boughs a critical instant, then reluctantly began to back away

"Stop the larboard! Come ahead on it! Stop the starboard! Come ahead on it! Point her for the bar!"

I sailed away as setenely as a summer's morning. Mr. Bixby came in and said, with mock simplicity

"When you have a hail, my boy, you ought to tap the big bell three times before you land, so that the engineers can get ready"

I blushed under the sarcasm, and said I hadn't had any hail

"Ah! Then it was for wood, I suppose The officer of the watch will tell you when he wants to wood up"

I went on consuming, and said I wasn't after wood "Indeed? Why, what could you want over here in the bend, then? Did you ever know of a boat following a bend up-stream at this stage of the river?"

"No, sir—and I wasn't trying to follow it 1 was getting away from a bluff reef."

"No, it wasn't a bluff reef, there isn't one within three miles of where you were"

"But I saw it It was as bluff as that one yonder"

70

"Just about Run over it!"

"Do you give it as an oider?"

"Yes Run over it!"

"If I don't, I wish I may die"

"All right, I am taking the responsibility"

I was just as anxious to kill the boat, now, as I had been to save it before I impressed my orders upon my memory, to be used at the inquest, and made a straight break for the reef As it disappeared under our bows I held my breath, but we slid over it like oil

"Now, don't you see the difference? It wasn't anything but a wind reef - The wind does that"

"So I see But it is exactly like a bluff reef How am I ever going to tell them apart?"

"I can't tell you It is an instinct By and by you will just naturally know one from the other, but you never will be able to explain why or how you know them apart"

It turned out to be true The face of the water, in time, became a wonderful book—a book that was a dead language to the uneducated passenger, but which told its mind to me without reserve, delivering its most 50 cherished secrets as clearly as if it uttered them with a voice. And it was not a book to be read once and thrown aside, for it had a new story to tell every day Throughout the long twelve hundred miles there was never a page that was void of interest, never one that you could leave unread without loss, never one that you would want to skip, thinking you could find higher enjoyment in some other thing. There never was so wonderful a book written by man, never one whose interest was so absorbing, so unflagging, so sparklingly renewed with every reperusal The passenger who could not read it was charmed with a peculiar sort of faint dimple on its surface (on the tare occasions when he did not overlook it altogether), but to the pilot that was an italicized passage, indeed, it was more than that, it was a legend of the largest capitals, with a string of shouting exclamation-points at the end of it, for it meant that a wreck or a rock was buried there that could tear the life out of the strongest vessel that ever floated It is the faintest and simplest expression the water ever makes, and the most hideous to a pilot's eye. In truth, the passenger 20 who could not read this book saw nothing but all manner of pretty pictures in it, painted by the sun and shaded by the clouds, whereas to the trained eye these were not pictures at all, but the grimmest and most dead-earnest of reading-matter

Now when I had mastered the language of this water, and had come to know every trifling feature that bordered the great river as familiarly as I knew the letters of the alphabet, I had made a valuable acquisition. But I had lost something, too I had lost something which 30 could never be restored to me while I lived All the grace, the beauty, the poetry, had gone out of the majestic river! I still kept in mind a certain wonderful sunset which I witnessed when steamboating was new to me A broad expanse of the river was turned to blood, in the middle distance the red hue brightened into gold, through which a solitary log came floating, black and conspicuous, in one place a long, slanting mark lay sparkling upon the water, in another the surface was broken by boiling, tumbling rings, that were as 10 many-tinted as an opal, where the ruddy flush was faintest, was a smooth spot that was covered with graceful circles and radiating lines, ever so delicately traced, the shore on our left was densely wooded, and the somber shadow that fell from this forest was broken in one place by a long, ruffled trail that shone like silver, and high above the forest wall a clean-stemmed dead tree waved a single leafy bough that glowed like a flame in the unobstructed splendor that was flowing from the sun There were graceful curves, reflected images, woods heights, soft distances, and over the whole scene, far and near, the dissolving lights drifted steadily, enriching it every passing moment with new marvels of coloring

I stood like one bewitched I drank it in, in a speechless rapture The world was new to me, and I had never seen anything like this at home. But as I have said, a day came when I began to cease from noting the glories and the charms which the moon and the sun and the twilight wrought upon the river's face, another day came when I ceased altogether to note them. Then, if that sunset scene had been repeated. I should have looked upon it without rapture, and should have commented upon it, inwardly, after this fashion "This sun means that we are going to have wind to-morrow, that floating log means that the river is rising, small thanks to it, that slanting mark on the water refers to a bluff reef which is going to kill somebody's steamboat one of these nights if it keeps on stretching out like that, those tumbling 'boils' show a dissolving bar and a changing channel there, the lines and circles in the slick water over yonder are a warning that that troublesome place is shoaling up dangerously, that silver streak in the shadow of the forest is the 'break' from a new snag, and he has located himself in the very best place he could have found to fish for steamboats, that tall dead tree, with a single living branch, is not going to last long, and then how is a body ever going to get through this blind place at night without the friendly old landmark?

No, the romance and beauty were all gone from the river. All the value any feature of it had for me now was the amount of usefulness it could furnish toward compassing the safe piloting of a steamboat. Since those days, I have pitted doctors from my heart. What does the lovely flush in a beauty's cheek mean to a doctor but a "break" that ripples above some deadly disease. Are not all her visible charms sown thick with what are to him the signs and symbols of hidden decay? Does he ever see her beauty at all, or doesn't he simply view her professionally, and comment upon her unwholesome condition all to himself? And doesn't he sometimes wonder whether he has gained most or lost most by learning his trade?

A Tramp Abroad

Baker's Blue-Jay Yarn

This selection is part of Chapter II and all of Chapter III of A Tramp Abroad (1880) The storyteller is modeled after Jim Gillis, the old character at whose hut Clemens was a delighted visitor for a time in the sixties

Notable in the handling is the transition from the actual world of the Neckar hills to the fantastic world where bluelays talk Notable, too, as Mr De Voto remarks, are the origin and the artistry of this mock oral tale "Its material comes from the Negro's bestiary, interstitial with the life of his [Clemens'] boyhood in Hannibal, and in this way the humor rises from fantasy, from the imaginative mythmaking of the slaves and the frontier But also, Jim Baker, the narrator, exists, he is a creation from the world of reality He lives, and no fantasy has gone into his creation, but only the sharp perception of an individual His patient, explanatory mind actually works before our eyes and no one can doubt him. His speech has been caught so cunningly that its rhythms produce complete conviction Fantasy is thus an instrument of realism and the humor of Mark Twain merges into the fiction that is his highest

If any particular piece of humor is typical of the American brand, this is the one Here, in admirable proportions, are combined the satirical philosophy of the horse-sense school, the realistic portrayal of earthy characters, and the fantasy blended of poetry and vulgarity which runs through much of our humor

One never tires of poking about in the dense woods that clothe all these lofty Neckar hills to their tops. The great deeps of a boundless forest have a beguling and impressive charm in any country, but German legends and fairy tales have given these an added charm. They have peopled all that region with gnomes, and dwarfs, and all sorts of mysterious and uncanny creatures. At the time I am writing of, I had been reading so much of this literature that sometimes I was not sure but I was beginning to believe in the gnomes and fairies as 10 realities.

One afternoon I got lost in the woods about a mile from the hotel, and presently fell into a train of dreamy thought about animals which talk, and kobolds, and enchanted folk, and the rest of the pleasant legendary stuff, and so, by stimulating my fancy, I finally got to imagining I glimpsed small flitting shapes here and there down the columned aisles of the forest. It was a place which was peculiarly meet for the occasion. It was a pine wood, with so thick and soft a carpet of brown 20 needles that one's footfall made no more sound than if he were treading on wool, the tree-trunks were as round and straight and smooth as pillars, and stood close together, they were bare of branches to a point about twenty-five feet above ground, and from there upward so thick with boughs that not a ray of sunlight could pierce through The world was bright with sunshine outside, but a deep and mellow twilight reigned in there, and also a silence so profound that I seemed to hear my own breathings

When I had stood ten minutes, thinking and imagining, and getting my spirit in tune with the place, and in the right mood to enjoy the supernatural, a raven suddenly uttered a hoarse croak over my head. It made me start, and then I was angry because I started I looked up, and the creature was sitting on a limb right over me, looking down at me I felt something of the same sense of humiliation and injury which one feels when he finds that a human stranger has been clandestinely inspecting him in his privacy and mentally commenting 40 upon him. I eyed the raven, and the raven eyed me Nothing was said during some seconds Then the bird stepped a little way along his limb to get a better point of observation, lifted his wings, stuck his head far down below his shoulders toward me, and croaked again -a croak with a distinctly insulting expression about it If he had spoken in English he could not have said any more plainly than he did say in raven, "Well, what do you want here?" I felt as foolish as if I had been caught in some mean act by a responsible being, and reproved 50 for it However, I made no reply; I would not bandy words with a raven. The adversary waited a while, with his shoulders still lifted, his head thrust down between them, and his keen bright eye fixed on me, then he threw out two or three more insults, which I could not understand, further than that I knew a portion of them consisted of language not used in church

I still made no reply Now the adversary raised his head and called There was an answering croak from a little distance in the wood,-evidently a croak of 10 inquiry The adversary explained with enthusiasm, and the other raven dropped everything and came. The two sat side by side on the limb and discussed me as freely and offensively as two great naturalists might discuss a new kind of bug. The thing became more and more embarrassing They called in another friend This was too much I saw that they had the advantage of me, and so I concluded to get out of the scrape by walking out of it They enjoyed my defeat as much as any low white people could have done. They craned their necks 20 and laughed at me (for a raven can laugh, just like a man), they squalled insulting remarks after me as long as they could see me They were nothing but ravens-I knew that,-what they thought about me could be a matter of no consequence,-and yet when even a raven shouts after you, "What a hat!" "Oh, pull down your vest!" and that sort of thing, it hurts you and humiliates you and there is no getting around it with fine reasoning and pretty arguments

Animals talk to each other, of course There can be 30 no question about that, but I suppose there are very few people who can understand them. I never knew but one man who could I knew he could, however, because he told me so himself. He was a middle-aged, simplehearted miner who had lived in a lonely corner of California, among the woods and mountains, a good many years, and had studied the ways of his only neighbors, the beasts and the birds, until he believed he could accurately translate any remark which they made This was Jim Baker. According to Jim Baker, some animals 40 have only a limited education, and use only very simple words, and scarcely ever a comparison or a flowery figure, whereas, certain other animals have a large vocabulary, a fine command of language and a ready and fluent delivery, consequently these latter talk a great deal, they like it, they are conscious of their talent, and they enjoy "showing off" Baker said, that after long and careful observation, he had come to the conclusion that the bluejays were the best talkers he had found among birds and beasts Said he

"There's more to a bluejay than any other creature so He has got more moods, and more different kinds of feelings than other creatures, and, mind you, whatever a bluejay feels, he can put into language And no mere commonplace language, either, but rattling, out-andout book-talk-and bristling with metaphor, too-just bristling! And as for command of language-why 101 never see a bluejay get stuck for a word No man ever did They just boil out of him! And another thing I've noticed a good deal, and there's no bird, or cow, or anything that uses as good grammar as a bluejay You may say a cat uses good grammar Well, a cat doesbut you let a cat get excited once, you let a cat get to pulling fur with another cat on a shed, nights, and you'll hear grammar that will give you the lockjaw Ignorant people think it's the noise which fighting cats make that is so aggravating, but it ain't so, it's the sickening grammar they use Now I've never heard a jay use bad grammar but very seldom, and when they do, they are as ashamed as a human, they shut right down and leave

"You may call a jay a bird Well, so he is, in a men ure-because he's got feathers on him, and don't belong to no church, perhaps, but otherwise he is just as much a human as you be And I'll tell you for why A jav s gifts and instincts, and feelings, and interests, cover the whole ground A jay hasn't got any more principle than a Congressman A jay will lie, a jay will steal, a jay will deceive, a jay will betray, and four times out of five a jay will go back on his solemnest promise. The sacredness of an obligation is a thing which you can't cram into no bluejay's head. Now, on top of all this, there's another thing, a jay can out-swear any gentleman in the mines You think a cat can swear Well, a cat can; but you give a bluejay a subject that calls for his reserve-powers, and where is your cat? Don't talk to mi -I know too much about this thing And there's yer another thing, in the one little particular of scoldingjust good, clean, out-and-out scolding—a bluejay can lay over anything, human or divine Yes, sir, a jay is everything that a man is A jay can crv. a jay can laugh a jay can feel shame, a jay can reason and plan and discuss, a jay likes gossip and scandal, a jay has got sense of humor, a jay knows when he is an ass just as well as you do-maybe better If a jay ain't human, he better take in his sign, that's all Now I'm going to tell

"When I first begun to understand jay language correctly, there was a little incident happened here Seven years ago, the last man in this region but me moved a log house, with a plank roof-just one big room, and no more, no ceiling-nothing between the rafters and the floor Well, one Sunday morning I was sitting out here in front of my cabin, with my cat, taking the sun, and looking at the blue hills, and listening to the leaves justling so lonely in the trees, and thinking of the home away yonder in the states, that I hadn't heard from in thirteen years, when a bluejay lit on that house, with an acorn in his mouth, and says, 'Hello, I reckon I've struck something. When he spoke, the acorn dropped out of his mouth and rolled down the roof, of course. but he didn't care, his mind was all on the thing he had struck. It was a knot-hole in the roof. He cocked his head to one side, shut one eye and put the other one to the hole, like a 'possum looking down a jug, then he glanced up with his bright eyes, gave a wink or two with his wings-which signifies gratification, you understand,-and says, 'It looks like a hole, it's located like a hole,-blamed if I don't believe it is a hole!"

Then he cocked his head down and took another look, he glances up perfectly joyful, this time, winks his wings and his tail both, and says, 'Oh, no, this ain't no fat thing, I reckon! If I ain't in luck!-why it's a perfectly elegant hole!' So he flew down and got that acorn, and fetched it up and dropped it in, and was just tilting his head back, with the heavenliest smile on his tace, when all of a sudden he was paralyzed into a listening attitude and that smile faded gradually out of his countenance like breath off'n a razor, and the queerest look of surprise took its place. Then he says, 'Why, I didn't hear it fall!' He cocked his eye at the hole gain, and took a long look, raised up and shook his head, stepped around to the other side of the hole and - took another look from that side, shook his head again He studied a while, then he just went into the detailswalked round and round the hole and spied into it from every point of the compass. No use Now he took a thinking attitude on the comb of the roof and scratched the back of his head with his right foot a minute, and finally says, 'Well, it's too many for me. that's certain, must be a mighty long hole, however, I ain't got no time to fool around here, I got to 'tend to business, I reckon it's all right—chance it, anyway.'

"So he flew off and fetched another acorn and dropped 50 it in, and tried to flirt his eye to the hole quick enough to see what become of it, but he was too late. He held his eye there as much as a minute; then he raised up and sighed, and says, 'Confound it, I don't seem to understand this thing, no way, however, I'll tackle her again' He fetched another acorn, and done his level best to see what become of it, but he couldn't He says, Well, I never struck no such a hole as this before, I'm of the opinion it's a totally new kind of a hole' Then he begun to get mad. He held in for a spell, walking up 60 and down the comb of the root and shaking his head and muttering to himself, but his feelings got the upper hand of him, presently, and he broke loose and cussed himself black in the face. I never see a bird take on so about a little thing. When he got through he walks to the hole and looks in again for half a minute, then he says, 'Well, you're a long hole, and a deep hole, and a mighty singular hole altogether-but I've started in to fill you, and I'm d-d if I don't fill you, if it takes a hundred years!'

"And with that, away he went You never see a bird work so since you was born. He laid into his work like a nigger, and the way he hove acorns into that hole for about two hours and a half was one of the most exciting and astonishing spectacles I ever struck He never stopped to take a look any more-he just hove 'em in and went for more Well, at last he could hardly flop his wings, he was so tuckered out. He comes adrooping down, once more, sweating like an ice-pitcher, drops his acorn in and says, 'Now I guess I've got the 80 bulge on you by this time!' So he bent down for a look If you'll believe me, when his head come up again he was just pale with rage. He says, 'I've shoveled acorns enough in there to keep the family thirty years, and if I can see a sign of one of 'em I wish I may land in a museum with a belly full of sawdust in two minutes!"

"He just had strength enough to crawl up on to the comb and lean his back agin the chimbly, and then he collected his impressions and begun to free his mind. I see in a second that what I had mistook for profanity 90 in the mines was only just the rudiments, as you may say.

"Another jay was going by, and heard him doing his devotions, and stops to inquire what was up The sufferer told him the whole circumstance, and says, 'Now yonder's the hole, and if you don't believe me, go and look for yourself' So this fellow went and looked, and comes back and says, 'How many did you say you put in there?' 'Not any less than two tons,' says the sufferer The other jay went and looked again. He couldn't seem to make it out, so he raised a yell, and three more jays come. They all examined the hole, they all made the suffere tell it over again, then they deal discussed it, and got off as many leather-headed opinions about it as an average crowd of humans could have done.

They called in more jays, then more and more, till pretty soon this whole region peared to have a blue flush about it. There must have been five thousand of them, and such another jawing and disputing and fipping and cussing, you never heard. Every jay in the whole lot put his eye to the hole and delivered a more chuckle-headed opinion about the mystery than the jay that went there before him. They examined the house all over, too. The door was standing half open, and at last one old jay happened to go and light on it and look in. Of course, that knocked the mystery galley-west in a second. There lay the acorns, scattered all over the floor. He flopped his wings and raised a whoop 'Come here!' he says, 'Come here, everybody, hang'd if this fool hasn't been trying to fill up a house with acorns!' They all came a-swooping down like a blue cloud, and as each fellow lit on the door and took a glance, the whole absurdity of the contract that that first jay had tackled hit him home and he fell over backwards suffocating with laughter, and the next jay took his place and done the same

"Well, sir, they roosted around here on the housetop and the trees for an hour, and guffawed over that thing like human beings. It ain't any use to tell me a bluejay hasn't got a sense of humor, because I know better. And memory, too. They brought jays here from all over the United States to look down that hole, every summer for three years. Other birds, too. And they could all see the point, except an owl that come from Nova Scotia to visit the Yo Semite, and he took this thing in on his way back. He said he couldn't see anything funny in it. But then he was a good deal disappointed about Yo Semite, too."

From

Life on the Mississippi

Chapter III

FRESCOES FROM THE PAST

A chapter written for Huckleberry Finn, but never included in it, is the one which follows. Clemens placed it in Chapter III of Life on the Mississippi, with introductory remarks which throw some light on his conception of the nature of The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn. The "tall talk" and the fanciful yarning in the passage are among Clemens' happiest achievements in this vein. The boasts of Bob and the Pet Child of Calamity represent a convention in the prewar humor of the frontier—the convention whereby authors pictured contestants preceding all fights with similar proclamations about their prowess. The author evidently remembered and recorded some of the favorite phrases of the Hannibal town drunkard whom he had known when he was a boy Just why Clemens left this passage out of Huckleberry Finn has puzzled his critics, since it is rich in invention and humor

By way of illustrating keelboat talk and manners, and that now departed and hardly-remembered raft-life. I will throw in, in this place, a chapter from a book which I have been working at, by fits and starts, during the past five or six years, and may possibly finish in the course of five or six more. The book is a story which details some passages in the life of an ignorant village boy. Huck Finn, son of the town drunkard of my time out. West, there He has run away from his persecuting father, and from a persecuting good widow who wishes to make a nice, truth-telling, respectable boy of him, and with him a slave of the widow's has also escaped. They have found a fragment of a lumber-raft (it is high water and dead summer-time), and are floating down the river by night, and hiding in the willows by day—bound for Cairo, whence the Negro will seek freedom in the heart of the free states But, in a fog, they pass Cairo without knowing it By and by they begin to suspect the truth, and Huck Finn is persuaded to end the dismal suspense by swimming down to a huge raft which they have seen in the distance ahead of them, creeping iboard under cover of the darkness, and gathering the needed information by eavesdropping

But you know [writes Huck] a young person can to what very well when he is impatient to find a thing out We talked it over, and by and by Jim said it was such a black night, now, that it wouldn't be no risk to swim down to the big raft and crawl aboard and listen—they would talk about Cairo, because they would be calculating to go ashore there for a spree, maybe, or anyway they would send boats ashore to buy whisky or fresh meat or something. Jim had a wonderful level head, tor a nigger he could most always start a good plan when you wanted one

I stood up and shook my rags oft and jumped into the river, and struck out for the raft's light By and by, when I got down nearly to her, I eased up and went slow and cautious But everything was all right-nobody at the sweeps So I swum down along the raft till I was most abreast the camp-fire in the middle, then I crawled aboard and inched along and got in among some bundles ot shingles on the weather side of the fire There was ., thirteen men there-they was the watch on deck of course And a mighty rough-looking lot, too They had a jug and tin cups, and they kept the jug moving One man was singing-roaring, you may say, and it wasn t a nice song-for a parlor, anyway He roared through his nose, and strung out the last word of every line very long When he was done they all fetched a kind of Injun warwhoop, and then another was sung It begun

> "There was a woman in our towdn, In our towdn did dwed'l [dwell], She loved her husband dear-i-lee, But another man twyste as wed l

Singing too, riloo, riloo, riloo,
Ri-too, riloo, rilay - - - e,
She loved her husband dear-i-lee,
But another man twyste as wed?

And so on—fourteen verses It was kind of poor, and when he was going to start on the next verse one of them said it was the tune the old cow died on, and another one said "Oh, give us a rest!" And another one told him to take a walk. They made fun of him till he got mad and jumped up and begun to cuss the crowd, and said he could lam any thief in the lot

They was all about to make a break for him, but the biggest man there jumped up and says

"Set whar you are, gentlemen Leave him to me, he's my meat"

Then he jumped up in the air three times, and cracked his heels together every time. He flung off a buckskin coat that was all hung with fringes, and says, "You lay that tell the chawin-up's done", and flung his hat down, 60 which was all over ribbons, and says, "You lay that tell his sufferin's is over."

Then he jumped up in the air and cracked his heels together again, and shouted out

"Whoo-oop! I'm the old original iron-hawed, brass-mounted, copper-bellied corpse-maker from the wilds of Arkansaw! Look at me! I'm the man they call Sudden Death and General Desolation! Sired by a hurricane, dam'd by an earthquake, half-brother to the cholera, nearly related to the smallpox on the mother's side! 70 Look at me! I take nineteen alligators and a bar'l of whisky for breakfast when I'm in robust health, and a bushel of rattlesnakes and a dead body when I'm ailing I split the everlasting rocks with my glance, and I squench the thunder when I speak! Whoo-oop! Stand back and give me room according to my strength! Blood's my natural drink, and the wails of the dying is music to my ear Cast your eye on me, gentlemen! and lay low and hold your breath, for I'm bout to turn myself loose!"

All the time he was getting this off, he was shaking 80 his head and looking fierce, and kind of swelling around in a little circle, tucking up his wristbands, and now and then straightening up and beating his breast with his fist, saying, 'Look at me, gentlemen'.' When he got through, he jumped up and cracked his heels together three times, and let off a roaring "Whoo-oop! I'm the bloodiest son of a wildcat that lives!"

Then the man that had started the row tilted his old slouch hat down over his right eye, then he bent stooping forward, with his back sagged and his south end sticking 90 out far and his fists a-shoving out and drawing in in front of him, and so went around in a little circle about three times, swelling himself up and breathing hard. Then he straightened, and jumped up and cracked his heels together three times before he lit again (that made them cheer), and he began to shout like this

"Whoo-oop! bow your neck and spread, for the kingdom of sorrow's a-coming! Hold me down to the earth, for I teel my powers a-working! whoo-oop! Im a child of sin, don't let me get a start! Smoked glass, here, for all! Don't attempt to look at me with the naked eye, ,0 gentlemen' When I'm playful I use the meridians of longitude and parallels of latitude for a seine, and drag the Atlantic Ocean for whales! I scratch my head with the lightning and purr myself to sleep with the thunder! When I'm cold, I bile the Gulf of Mexico and bathe in it, when I'm hot I fan myself with an equinoctial storm, when I'm thirsty I reach up and suck a cloud dry like a sponge, when I range the earth hungry, famine follows in my tracks! Whoo-oop! Bow your neck and spread! I put my hand on the sun's face and make it 20 night in the earth, I bite a piece out of the moon and hurry the seasons, I shake myself and crumble the mountains! Contemplate me through leather-don't use the naked eye! The massacre of isolated communities is the pastime of my idle moments, the destruction of nationalities the serious business of my life! The boundless vastness of the great American desert is my enclosed property, and I bury my dead on my own premises!" He jumped up and cracked his heels together three times before he lit (they cheered him again), and as he 30 come down he shouted out "Whoo-oop! bow your neck and spread, for the Pet Child of Calamity's a-coming!"

Then the other one went to swelling around and blowing again—the first one—the one they called Bob, next, the Child of Calamity chipped in again, swelling round and round each other and punching their fists most into each other's faces, and whooping and jawing like Injuns, then Bob called the Child names, and the Child called him names back again; next, Bob called him a heap rougher names, and the Child come back at him with the very worst kind of language, next, Bob knocked the Child's hat off, and the Child picked it up and kicked Bob's ribbony hat about six foot, Bob went and got it and said never mind, this warn't going to be the last of this thing, because he was a man that never forgot and never forgive, and so the Child better look out, for there was a time a-coming, just as sure as he was a living man, that he would have to answer to him with the best blood in his body. The Child said no man was willinger than he for that time to come, and he would give Bob fair warning, now, never to cross his path again, for he could a never rest till he had waded in his blood, for such was his nature, though he was sparing him now on account of his family, if he had one

Both of them was edging away in different directions, growling and shaking their heads and going on about what they was going to do, but a little black-whiskered chap skipped up and says

"Come back here, you couple of chicken-livered cowards, and I'll thrash the two of ye!"

And he done it, too He snatched them, he jerked them . this way and that, he booted them around, he knocked them sprawling faster than they could get up Why, it warn't two minutes till they begged like dogs-and how the other lot did yell and laugh and clap their hands all the way through, and shout, "Sail in, Corpse-Maker" "Hi' at him again, Child of Calamity!" "Bully for you, little Davy!" Well, it was a perfect pow-wow for a while, Bob and the Child had red noses and black eyes when they got through Little Davy made them own up that they was sneaks and cowards and not fit to eat -with a dog or drink with a nigger, then Bob and the Child shook hands with each other, very solemn, and said they had always respected each other and was will ing to let bygones be bygones So then they washed their faces in the river, and just then there was a loud order to stand by for a crossing, and some of them went forward to man the sweeps there, and the rest went aft to handle the after sweeps

I lay still and waited for fifteen minutes, and had a smoke out of a pipe that one of them left in reach, then the crossing was finished, and they stumped back and had a drink around and went to talking and singing again. Next they got out an old fiddle, and one played and another patted juba, and the rest turned themselves loose on a regular old-fashioned keelboat breakdown. They couldn't keep that up very long without getting winded, so by and by they settled around the jug again.

They sung "Jolly, Jolly Raftsman's the Life for Me," with a rousing chorus, and then they got to talking about differences betwixt hogs, and their different kind of habits, and next about women and their different kind of ways, and next about the best ways to put out houses that was afire, and next about what ought to be done with the Injuns; and next what a king had to do, and how much he got, and next about how to make cats fight, and next what to do when a man has fits, and next about the differences betwixt clear-water rivers and muddy-water ones. The man they called Ed said the muddy Mississippi water was wholesomer to drink than the clear water of the Ohio; he said if you let a pint of k valler Mississippi water settle, you would have about a half to three-quarters of an inch of mud in the bottom, according to the stage of the river, and then it warn't no better than Ohio water-what you wanted to do was to keep it stirred up-and when the river was low, keep mud on hand to put in and thicken the water up the way it ought to be

The Child of Calamity said that was so; he said there was nutritiousness in the mud, and a man that drunk Mississippi water could grow corn in his stomach if he wanted to He says:

"You look at the graveyards; that tells the tale. Trees won't grow worth shucks in a Cincinnati graveyard, but in a Sent Louis graveyard they grow upwards of eight hundred foot high. It's all on account of the water the people drunk before they laid up. A Cincinnati corpse don't richen a soil any."

And they talked about how Ohio water didn't like to mix with Mississippi water. Ed said if you take the Mississippi on a rise when the Ohio is low, you'll find a wide band of clear water all the way down the east side of the Mississippi for a hundred mile or more, and the minute you get out a quarter of a mile from shore and pass the line, it is all thick and yaller the rest of the way across. They talked about how to keep tobacco from getting mouldy, and from that they went to ghosts and told about a lot that other folks had seen, but Ed says.

"Why don't you tell something that you've seen your-selves? Now let me have a say. Five years ago I was on a raft as big as this, and right along here it was a bright moonshiny night, and I was on watch and boss of the stabboard oar forrard, and one of my pards was a man named Dick Allbright, and he come along to where I was sitting, forrard—gaping and stretching, he was—and stooped down on the edge of the raft and washed his face in the river, and come and set down by me and got out his pipe, and had just got it filled, when he looks up and says.

"'Why looky-here, he says, 'ain't that Buck Miller's place, over yander in the bend?"

"'Yes,' says I, 'it is—why?' He laid his pipe down and leaned his head on his hand, and says

"'I thought we'd be furder down.' I says

"I thought it, too, when I went off watch'—we was standing six hours on and six off—'but the boys told me.' I says, 'that the raft didn't seem to hardly move, for the last hour,' says I, 'though she's a-slipping along all right now,' says I He give a kind of a groan, and says:

"'I seed a raft act so before, along here, he says, 'pears to me the current has most quit above the head of this 60 bend durin' the last two years.' he says

"Well, he raised up two or three times, and looked away off and around on the water. That started me at it, too. A body is always doing what he sees somebody else doing, though there mayn't be no sense in it. Pretty soon I see a black something floating on the water away.

Huckleberry Finn

off to stabboard and quartering behind us I see he was looking at it, too, I says

"'What's that?' He says, sort of pettish

"'Tain't nothing but an old empty bar'l'

"'An empty bar'l' says I. 'why,' says I, 'a spy-glass is a fool to your eyes How can you tell it's an empty bar'l' He says

"I don't know, I reckon it ain't a bar'l, but I thought it might be,' says he

'Yes, I says, 'so it might be, and it might be anything else, too, a body can't tell nothing about it, such a distance as that,' I says

"We hadn't nothing else to do, so we kept on watching it. By and by I says,

"'Why, looky-here, Dick Allbright, that thing's againing on us, I believe'

"He never said nothing The thing gained and gained, and I judged it must be a dog that was about tired out Well, we swung down into the crossing, and the thing floated across the bright streak of the moonshine, and by George it was a bar'l Says I

"'Dick Allbright, what made you think that thing was a bar'l, when it was half a mile off?' says I Says he

"'I don't know' Says I

"'You tell me, Dick Allbright' Says he

"Well, I knowed it was a bar'l, I've seen it before, lots has seen it, they says it's a ha'nted bar'l'

"I called the rest of the watch, and they come and stood there, and I told them what Dick said. It floated 30 right along abreast, now, and didn't gain any more. It was about twenty foot off. Some was for having it aboard, but the rest didn't want to. Dick Allbright said rafts that had fooled with it had got bad luck by it. The captain of the watch said he didn't believe in it. He said he reckoned the bar'l gained on us because it was in a little better current than what we was. He said it would leave by and by

"So then we went to talking about other things, and we had a song, and then a breakdown, and after that the captain of the watch called for another song, but it was clouding up now, and the bar'l stuck right that in the same place, and the song didn't seem to have much warm-up to it, somehow, and so they didn't finish it, and there warn't any cheers, but it sort of dropped flat, and nobody said anything for a minute. Then every-body tried to talk at once, and one chap got off a joke, but it warn't no use, they didn't laugh, and even the chap that made the joke didn't laugh at it, which ain't usual We all just settled down glum, and watched the bar'l, and was oneasy and oncomfortable. Well, sir, it is shut down black and still, and then the wind began to moan around, and next the lightning began to play and the thunder to grumble. And pretty soon there was a regular storm, and in the middle of it a man that was running aft stumbled and fell and sprained his ankle so that he had to lay up. This made the boys shake their heads. And every time the lightning come, there was that bar'l, with the blue lights winking around it. We was always on the lookout for it. But by and by, toward dawn, she was gone. When the day come we couldn't see her anywhere, and we warn't sorry, either

"But next night about half past nine, when there was songs and high jinks going on, here she comes again, and took her old roost on the stabboard side There warn't no more high jinks Everybody got solemn, nobody talked, you couldn't get anybody to do anything but set around moody and look at the bar'l. It begun to cloud up again. When the watch changed, the off watch stayed up, 'stead of turning in. The storm ripped and roared around all night, and in the middle of it another man tripped and sprained his ankle, and had to knock off. The bar'l left toward day, and nobody see it go.

"Everybody was sober and down in the mouth all day I don't mean the kind of sober that comes of leaving liquor alone—not that They was quiet, but they all drunk more than usual—not together, but each man sidled off and took it private, by himself

"After dark the off watch didn't turn in, nobody sung nobody talked, the boys didn't scatter around, neither they sort of huddled together, forrard, and for two hours they set there, perfectly still, looking steady in the one direction, and heaving a sigh once in a while And then, here comes the bar'l again. She took up her old place. She stayed there all night, nobody turned in. The storm come on again, after midnight. It got awful dark, and the rain poured down, hail, too, the thunder boomed and roared and bellowed, the wind blowed a hurricane, and the lightning spread over everything in big sheets of glare, and showed the whole raft as plain as day, and the river lashed up white as milk as far as you could see for miles, and there was that bar'l jiggering along, same as ever. The captain ordered the watch to man the after sweeps for a crossing, and nobody would go—no more sprained ankles for them, they said They wouldn't even walk aft. Well, then, just then the sky split wide open, with a crash, and the lightning killed two men of the after watch, and crippled two more Crippled them how, say you? Why, sprained their ankles!

The bar'l left in the dark betwixt lightnings, toward dawn. Well, not a body ear a bite at breakfast that morning. After that the men loafed around in twos and threes, and talked low together. But none of them herded with Dick Allbright. They all give him the cold shake. If he come around where any of the men was, they split up and sidled away. They wouldn't man the sweeps with him. The captain had all the skiffs hauled up on the raft, alongside of his wigwam, and wouldn't let the dead men be took ashore to be planted, he didn't believe a man that got ashore would come back, and he was right.

"After night come, you could see pretty plain that there was going to be trouble if that bar'l come again, there was such a muttering going on A good many wanted to kill Dick Allbright, because he'd seen the bar'l on other trips, and that had an ugly look Some wanted to put him ashore Some said 'Let's all go ashore in a pile, if the bar'l comes again'

This kind of whispers was still going on, the men being bunched together forrard watching for the bar'l, when lo and behold you here she comes again. Down she comes, slow and steady, and settles into her old tracks. You could a heard a pin drop. Then up comes the captain, and says

"Boys, don't be a pack of children and fools, I don t want this bar'l to be dogging us all the way to Orleans, and you don't Well, then, how's the best way to stop it? Burn it up—that's the way I'm going to fetch it aboard, he says And before anybody could say a word, in he went

"He swum to it, and as he come pushing it to the raft, the men spread to one side. But the old man got it aboard and busted in the head, and there was a baby in it! Yes, sir, a stark-naked baby. It was Dick Allbright's baby, he owned up and said so.

"Yes, he says, a-leaning over it, 'yes, it is my own lamented darling, my poor lost Charles William All-bright deceased, says he-for he could curl his rongue around the bulliest words in the language when he was of a mind to, and lay them before you without a jint started anywheres Yes, he said, he used to live up at 50 the head of this bend, and one night he choked his child, which was crying, not intending to kill it-which was prob'ly a lie-and then he was scared, and buried it in a bar'l, before his wife got home, and off he went, and struck the northern trail and went to rafting, and this was the third year that the barl had chased him He said the bad luck always begun light, and lasted till four men was killed, and then the bar'l didn't come any more after that He said if the men would stand it one more night—and was a-going on like that—but 60 the men had got enough. They started to get out a boat to take him ashore and lynch him, but he grabbed the little child all of a sudden and jumped overboard with it, hugged up to his breast and shedding tears, and we never see him again, poor old suffering soul, nor Charles William neither"

"Who was shedding tears' says Bob, "was it Allbright or the baby'"

"Why, Allbright, of course, didn't I tell you the baby was dead? Been dead three years—how could it cry?"

"Well, never mind how it could cry—how could it keep all that time?" says Davy "You answer me that"

"I don't know how it done it," says Ed "It done it, though—that's all I know about it"

"Say—what did they do with the bar'l?" says the Child of Calamity

"Why, they hove it overboard, and it sunk like a chunk of lead"

"Edward, did the child look like it was choked?" says one

"Did it have its hair parted?" says another

"What was the brand on that bar'l, Eddy?" says a fellow they called Bill

"Have you got the papers for them statistics, Edmund?" says Jimmy.

"Say, Edwin, was you one of the men that was killed by the lightning?" says Davy

"Him? Oh, no! he was both of em," says Bob Then they all haw-hawed

"Say, Edward, don't you reckon you'd better take a 90 pill? You look bad—don't you feel pale?" says the Child of Calamity

"Oh, come, now, Eddy," says Jimmy, "show up, you must 'a' kept part of that bar'l to prove the thing by Show us the bung-hole—do—and we'll all believe you"

"Say, boys," says Bill, "less divide it up Thar's thirteen of us I can swaller a thirteenth of the yarn, if you can worry down the rest"

Ed got up mad and said they could all go to some place which he ripped out pretty savage, and then walked off aft, cussing to himself, and they yelling and 10 jeering at him, and roaring and laughing so you could hear them a mile

"Boys, we'll split a watermelon on that," says the Child of Calamity, and he came rummaging around in the dark amongst the shingle bundles where I was, and put his hand on me I was warm and soft and naked, so he says "Ouch!" and jumped back

"Fetch a lantern or a chunk of fire here, boys—there's a snake here as big as a cow!"

So they run there with a lantern, and crowded up

"Come out of that, you beggar!" says one

"Who are you?" says another

"What are you after here? Speak up prompt, or overboard you go."

"Snake him out, boys Snatch him out by the heels"

I began to beg, and crept out amongst them trembling They looked me over, wondering, and the Child of Calamity says

"A cussed thief! Lend me a hand and less heave him so overboard!"

"No," says Big Bob, 'less get out the paint-pot and paint him a sky-blue all over from head to heel, and then heave him over"

"Good! that's it Go for the paint, Jimmy"

When the paint come, and Bob took the brush and was just going to begin, the others laughing and rubbing their hands, I begun to cry, and that sort of worked on Davy, and he says

"'Vast there He's nothing but a cub. I'll paint the 40 man that teches $^{\rm him}$ 1"

So I looked around on them, and some of them grumbled and growled, and Bob put down the paint, and the others didn't take it up

"Come here to the fire, and less see what you're up to here," says Davy "Now set down there and give an account of yourself How long have you been aboard here?"

"Not over a quarter of a minute, sir," says I.

"How did you get dry so quick?"

"I don't know, sir I'm always that way, mostly."

"Oh, you are, are you? What's your name?"

I warn't going to tell my name I didn't know what to say, so I just says

"Charles William Allbright, sir"

Then they roared—the whole crowd, and I was mighty glad I said that, because, maybe, laughing would get them in a better humor

When they got done laughing, Davy says

"It won't hardly do, Charles William You couldn't have growed this much in five year, and you was a baby when you come out of the bar'l, you know, and dead at that Come now, tell a straight story, and nobody ll hurr you, if you ain't up to anything wrong What is your name?"

"Aleck Hopkins, sir Aleck James Hopkins"

"Well, Aleck, where did you come from here?"

"From a trading-scow She lays up the bend yonder I was born on her Pap has traded up and down here all his life, and he told me to swim off here, because when you went by he said he would like to get some of you to speak to a Mr Jonas Turner, in Cairo, and tell him—"

"Oh, come!"

"Yes, sır, ıt's as true as the world Pap he says—"

"Oh, your grandmother!"

They all laughed, and I tried again to talk, but they broke in on me and stopped me

"Now, looky-here," says Davy, "you're scared, and so you talk wild Honest, now do you live in a scow, or is it a he?"

"Yes, sir, in a trading-scow She lays up at the head of the bend But I warn't born in her. It's our first trip

"Now you re talking! What did you come aboard here for? To steal?"

"No, sir, I didn't It was only to get a ride on the raft All boys does that"

"Well, I know that But what did you hide for?"

"Sometimes they drive the boys off"

"So they do They might steal Looky-here, if we let you off this time, will you keep out of these kind of scrapes hereafter?"

"'Deed I will, boss You try me"

"All right, then. You ain't but little ways from shore

Overboard with you, and don't you make a fool of vourself another time this way. Blast it, boy, some raftsmen would rawhide you till you were black and blue!

I didn't wait to kiss good-by, but went overboard and broke for shore When Jim come along by and by, the big raft was far away out of sight around the point I swim out and got aboard, and was mighty glad to see home again

The boy did not get the information he was after, but his adventure has furnished the glimpse of the departed raftsman and keelboatman which I desire to offer in this place

Chapter XXXVIII

THE HOUSE BEAUTIFUL

Because Old Times on the Mississippi was not lengthy enough to fill a large book of the sort sold by subscription, Clemens hit upon the idea of supplementing it with an account of a visit, made in 1882, to the river. He took the trip and wrote the story of the journey. This account was presented in Chapters XXI-LX of Life on the Mississippi, published in 1883. In the chapter which follows, he includes a description of the exterior and the interior of an ante-bellum Southern mansion, one so detailed and authentic that at least two social historians have quoted it at length to acquaint readers with pre-Civil War ways of living. In 1884 and the years which followed, readers were to have a chance to contrast this account with a description of the same room—or one very like it—written by naive Huck Finn.

We took passage in a Cincinnati boat for New Oricans, or on a Cincinnati boat—either is correct, the former is the Eastern form of putting it, the latter the Western

Mr Dickens declined to agree that the Mississippi seamboats were "magnificent," or that they were "floating palaces"—terms which had always been applied to them, terms which did not over-express the admiration with which the people viewed them.

Mr Dickens's position was unassailable, possibly; the people's position was certainly unassailable If Mr. Dickens was comparing these boats with the crown jewels; or with the Taj, or with the Matterhorn, or with some other priceless or wonderful thing which he had seen, they were not magnificent-he was right. The people compared them with what they had seen, and, thus measured, thus judged, the boats were magnificent—the term 30 was the correct one, it was not at all too strong. The people were as right as was Mr Dickens The steamboats were finer than anything on shore Compared with superior dwelling-houses and first-class hotels in the valley, they were indubitably magnificent, they were "palaces" To a few people living in New Orleans and St Louis they were not magnificent, perhaps, not palaces, but to the great majority of those populations, and to the entire populations spread over both banks between Baton Rouge and St Louis, they were palaces, 40 they tallied with the citizen's dream of what magnificence was, and satisfied it

Every town and village along that vast stretch of double river-frontage had a best dwelling, finest dwelling, mansion—the home of its wealthiest and most conspicuous citizens It is easy to describe it large grassy vard, with paling fence painted white-in fair repair, brick walk from gate to door, big, square, two-story "frame" house, painted white and porticoed like a Grecian temple-with this difference, that the imposing 50 fluted columns and Corinthian capitals were a pathetic sham, being made of white pine, and painted, iron knocker, brass door-knob-discolored, for lack of polishing Within, an uncarpeted hall, of planed boards; opening out of it, a parlor, fifteen feet by fifteen-in some instances five or ten feet larger, ingrain carpet, mahogany center-table, lamp on it, with green-paper shade-standing on a gridiron, so to speak, made of high-colored yarns, by the young ladies of the house, and called a lamp-mat, several books, piled and disposed, 60 with cast-iron exactness, according to an inherited and unchangeable plan, among them, Tupper, much penciled;

Bracketed over what-not-place of special sacredness-an outrage in water-color, done by the young niece that came on a visit long ago, and died Pity, too, for she might have repented of this in time Horsehair chairs, horsehair sofa which keeps sliding from under you Window-shades, of oil stuff, with milkmaids and to ruined castles stenciled on them in fierce colors Lambrequins dependent from gaudy boxings of beaten tin, gilded Bedrooms with rag carpets, bedsteads of the corded" sort, with a sag in the middle, the cords needing tightening, snuffy feather-bed-not aired often enough, cane-seat chairs, splint-bottomed rocker, looking-glass on wall, school-slate size, veneered frame, inherited bureau, wash-bowl and pitcher, possibly-but not certainly, brass candlestick, tallow candle, snuffers Nothing else in the room Not a bathroom in the house, and no visitor likely to come along who has ever seen one

That was the residence of the principal citizen, all the way from the suburbs of New Orleans to the edge of St Louis When he stepped aboard a big fine steamboat, he entered a new and marvelous world chimney-tops cut to counterfeit a spraying crown of plumes-and maybe painted red, pilot-house, hurricane-deck, boiler-deck guards, all garnished with white wooden filigree-work of fanciful patterns, gilt acorns topping the derricks, gilt deerhorns over the big bell, gaudy symbolical pic- 50 ture on the paddle-box, possibly, big roomy boilerdeck, painted blue, and turnished with Windsor armchairs, inside, a far-receding snow-white "cabin", porcelain knob and oil-picture on every stateroom door, curving patterns of filigiee-work touched up with gilding, stretching overhead all down the converging vista, big chandeliers every little way, each an April shower of glittering glass-drops, lovely rainbow-light falling everywhere from the colored glazing of the skylights, the whole a long-drawn, resplendent tunnel, a bewildering 60 and soul-satisfying spectacle! in the ladies' cabin a pink and white Wilton carpet, as soft as mush, and glorified with a ravishing pattern of gigantic flowers. Then the Bridal Chamber—the animal that invented that idea was still alive and unhanged, at that day-Bridal Chamber whose pretentious flummery was necessarily overawing to the now tottering intellect of that hosannahing citizen Every stateroom had its couple of cozy clean bunks, and perhaps a looking-glass and a snug closet, and sometimes there was even a wash-bowl and pitcher, 70 and part of a towel which could be told from mosquito-netting by an expert-though generally these things were absent, and the shirt-sleeved passengers cleansed themselves at a long row of stationary bowls in the barber shop, where were also public towels, public combs, and public soap

Take the steamboat which I have just described, and you have her in her highest and finest, and most pleasing, and comfortable, and satisfactory estate. Now cake her over with a layer of ancient and obdurate dirt, and 80 you have the Cincinnati steamer awhile ago referred to. Not all over—only inside, for she was ably officered in all departments except the steward's

But wash that boat and repaint her, and she would be about the counterpart of the most complimented boat of the old flush times for he steamboat architecture of the West has undergone no change, neither has steamboat furniture and ornamentation undergone any

When Twain himself published this episode as a unit in the Century for December 1884, he explained its context in the book for the magazine readers as follows. "The Negro Jim is escaping from slavery in Missouri, and Huck Finn is running away from a drunken father, who maltreats him. The two fugitives are floating down the Mississippi on a fragment of a lumber-raft, doing their voyaging by night and hiding themselves and the raft in the day-time. When this chapter opens they have already floated four hundred miles—a trip which has occupied ten or twelve adventurous nights."

The following passage (part of Chapter XVI and all of Chapters XVII and XVIII) typifies much that made the book memorable. Here, in rich detail, is a segment of life along the river in the 1840's. Here is Huck's character, revealed by what he does and says. And here is an employment of the American language for varying purposes—for humor ranging from broad, low comedy to something much higher, for description, for the portrayal of action, and for Huck's restrained account of how he felt after the death of his friend, Buck Grangerford.

THE GRANGERFORDS TAKE ME IN

Well, the night got gray and rather thick, which is the next meanest thing to fog. You can't tell the shape of the river, and you can't see no distance. It got to be very late and still, and then along comes a steamboat up the river. We lit the lantern, and judged she would see it. Up-stream boats didn't generly come close to us, they go out and follow the bars and hunt for easy water under the reefs, but nights like this they bull right up the channel against the whole river.

We could hear her pounding along, but we didn't see her good till she was close. She aimed right for us. Often they do that and try to see how close they can come without touching, sometimes the wheel bites off a sweep, and then the pilot sticks his head out and laughs, and thinks he's mighty smart Well, here she comes, and we said she was going to try and shave us, but she didn't seem to be sheering off a bit. She was a big one, and she was coming in a hurry, too, looking like a black cloud with rows of glow-worms around it. but all of a sudden she bulged out, big and scary, with a a long row of wide-open furnace doors shining like redhot teeth, and her monstrous bows and guards hanging right over us. There was a yell at us, and a jingling of bells to stop the engines, a powwow of cussing, and whistling of steam-and as Jim went overboard on one side and I on the other, she come smashing straight through the raft

I dived—and I aimed to find the bottom, too, for a thirty-foot wheel had got to go over me, and I wanted it to have plenty of room. I could always stay under water a minute, this time I reckon I stayed under a minute and a half. Then I bounced for the top in a hurry, for I was nearly busting I popped out to m armpits and blowed the water out of my nose, and puffed a bit. Of course there was a booming current, and of course that boat started her engines again ten seconds after she stopped them, for they never cared much for raftsmen, so now she was churning along up the river, out of sight in the thick weather, though I could hear her

I sung out for Jim about a dozen times, but I didn't get any answer, so I grabbed a plank that touched me while I was "treading water," and struck out for shore shoving it ahead of me But I made out to see that the drift of the current was towards the left-hand shore which meant that I was in a crossing, so I changed off and went that way

It was one of these long, slanting, two-mile crossings so I was a good long time in getting over I made a safe landing, and clumb up the bank. I couldn't see but a little ways, but I went poking along over rough ground for a quarter of a mile or more, and then I run across a big old-fashioned double log house before I noticed it. I was going to rush by and get away, but a lot of dogs jumped out and went to howling and bark-

 $_{\rm ing}$ at me, and I knowed better than to move another peg

In about a minute somebody spoke out of a window nathout putting his head out, and says:

"Be done, boys! Who's there?"

I savs

"It's me."

"Who's me?"

"George Jackson, sir."

"What do you want?"

"I don't want nothing, sir. I only want to go along by, but the dogs won't let me"

"What are you prowling around here this time of night for-hey?"

"I warn't prowling around, sir, I fell overboard off of the steamboat"

"Oh, you did, did you' Strike a light there, somebody. What did you say your name was'

"George Jackson, sir I'm only a boy"

"Look here, if you're telling the truth you needn't be afraid—nobody 'll hurt you But don't try to budge, stand right where you are Rouse out Bob and Tom, some of you, and fetch the guns. George Jackson, is there anybody with you?"

"No, sır, nobody"

I heard the people stirring around in the house now, and see a light. The man sung out

"Snatch that light away, Betsy, you old fool—ain't you got any sense? Put it on the floor behind the front at door Bob, if you and Tom are ready, take your places." "All ready."

'Now, George Jackson, do you know the Shep-berdsons?"

"No, sir, I never heard of them"

"Well, that may be so, and it mayn't Now, all ready. Step forward, George Jackson And mind, don't you hurry—come mighty slow If there's anybody with you, let him keep back—if he shows himself he'll be shot. Come along now Come slow, push the door open yourse self—just enough to squeeze in, d'you hear?"

I didn't hurry; I couldn't if I'd a-wanted to I took one slow step at a time and there warn't a sound, only I thought I could hear my heart. The dogs were as still to the humans, but they followed a little behind me When I got to the three log doorsteps I heard them un-

Colonel Grangerford.

locking and unbarring and unbolting I put my hand on the door and pushed it a little and a little more till somebody said, "There, that's enough—put your head in" I done it, but I judged they would take it off

The candle was on the floor, and there they all was, so looking at me, and me at them, for about a quarter of a minute. Three big men with guns pointed at me, which made me wince, I tell you, the oldest, gray and about sixty, the other two thirty or more—all of them fine and handsome—and the sweetest old gray-headed lady, and back of her two young women which I couldn't see right well. The old gentleman says

"There, I reckon it's all right Come in"

As soon as I was in the old gentleman he locked the door and barred it and bolted it, and told the young of men to come in with their guns, and they all went in a big parlor that had a new rag carpet on the floor, and got together in a corner that was out of the range of the front windows—there warn't none on the side. They held the candle, and took a good look at me, and all said, "Why, he ain't a Shepherdson—no, there ain't any Shepherdson about him." Then the old man said he hoped I wouldn't mind being searched for arms, because he didn't mean no harm by it—it was only to make sure So he didn't pry into my pockets, but only felt outside with his hands, and said it was all right. He told me to make myself easy and at home, and tell all about myself, but the old lady says

"Why, bless you, Saul, the poor thing's as wet as he can be, and don't you reckon it may be he's hungry?"

"True for you, Rachel-I forgot"

So the old lady says

"Betsy" (this was a nigger woman), "you fly around and get him something to eat as quick as you can, poor thing, and one of you girls go and wake up Buck and tell him—oh, here he is himself. Buck, take this little stranger and get the wet clothes off from him and dress him up in some of yours that's dry."

Buck looked about as old as me—thirteen or fourteen or along there, though he was a little bigger than me. He hadn't on anything but a shirt, and he was very frowzy-headed. He came in gaping and digging one fist into his eyes, and he was dragging a gun along with the other one. He says

"Ain't they no Shepherdsons around?"

They said, no, 'twas a false alarm

30 "Well," he says, "if they'd 'a' ben some, I reckon I'd 'a' got one"

They all laughed, and Bob says

"Why, Buck, they might have scalped us all, vou've been so slow in coming."

"Well, nobody come after me, and it ain't right. I'm always kept down, I don't get no show."

"Never mind, Buck, my boy," says the old man, "you'll have show enough, all in good time, don't you fret about that Go 'long with you now, and do as your mother told you."

When we got up-stairs to his room he got me a coarse shirt and a roundabout and pants of his, and I put them on While I was at it he asked me what my name was, but before I could tell him he started to tell me about a bluejay and a young rabbit he had catched in the woods day before yesterday, and he asked me where Moses was when the candle went out I said I didn't know, I hadn't heard about it before, no way

"Well, guess," he says

"How'm I going to guess," says I, "when I never heard tell of it before?"

"But you can guess, can't you? It's just as easy"

"Which candle?" I says

"Why, any candle," he says

"I don't know where he was," says I, "where was he-

"Why, he was in the dark' That's where he was'

"Well, if you knowed where he was, what did you ask me for?"

"Why, blame it, it's a riddle, don't you see? Say how long are you going to stay here? You got to stay always. We can just have booming times—they don't have no school now. Do you own a dog? I've got a dog—and he'll go in the river and bring out chips that you throw in. Do you like to comb up Sundays, and all that kind of foolishness? You bet I don't, but ma she makes me. Confound these ole britches! I reckon I'd better put 'em on, but I'd ruther not, it's so warm. Are you all ready? All right. Come along, old hoss."

Cold corn-pone, cold corn-beef, butter and butter milk-that is what they had for me down there, and there ain't nothing better that ever I've come across vet Buck and his ma and all of them smoked cob pipes, except the nigger woman, which was gone, and the two young women. They all smoked and talked and I eat and talked. The young women had quilts around them, and their hair down their backs. They all asked me questions, and I told them how pap and me and all the family was living on a little farm down at the bottom of Arkansaw, and my sister Mary Ann run off and got married and never was heard of no more and Bill went to hunt them and he warn't heard of no more, and Tom and Mort died, and then there warn't nobody but just me and pap left, and he was just trimmed down to nothing on account of his troubles, so when he died I took what there was left because the farm didn't belong to us, and started up the river, deck passage, and fell overboard, and thit was how I come to be here So they said I could have a home there as long as I wanted it. Then it was most daylight and everybody went to bed, and I went to bed with Buck, and when I waked up in the morning, drat it all, I had forgot what my name was So I laid there about an hour trying to think, and when Buck waked up I says

Can you spell, Buck?"

Yes, 'he says

'I bet you can't spell my name," says I

I bet you what you dare I can," says he

"All right," says I, "go ahead"

'G-e-o-r-g-e J-a-x-o-n—there now," he says

Well," says I, "you done it, but I didn't think you could It ain't no slouch of a name to spell—right off without studying"

I set it down, private, because somebody might want me to spell it next and so I wanted to be handy with it and rattle it off like I was used to it

It was a mighty nice family, and a mighty nice house, too I hadn't seen no house out in the country before that was so nice and had so much style. It didn't have an iron latch on the front door, nor a wooden one with a buckskin string, but a brass knob to turn, the same is houses in town. There warn't no bed in the parlor, nor a sign of a bed, but heaps of parlors in towns has beds in them There was a big fireplace that was bricked on the bottom, and the bricks was kept clean and red by pouring water on them and scrubbing them with another brick, sometimes they wash them over with red water-paint that they call Spanish-brown, same as they do in town They had big brass dog-irons that could hold up a saw-log There was a clock on the middle of the mantelpiece, with a picture of a town painted on the a bottom half of the glass front, and a round place in the middle of it for the sun, and you could see the pendulum swinging behind it. It was beautiful to hear that clock tick, and sometimes when one of these peddlers had been along and scoured her up and got her in good shape, she would start in and strike a hundred and tifty before she got tuckered out. They wouldn't took any money for her

Well, there was a big outlandish parrot on each side of the clock, made out of something like chalk, and painted up gaudy. By one of the parrots was a cat made of crockery, and a crockery dog by the other; and when you pressed down on them they squeaked, but didn't open their mouths nor look different nor interested. They squeaked through underneath. There was a couple of big wild-turkey-wing fans spread out behind those things. On the table in the middle of the room was a kind of a lovely crockery basket that had apples and oranges and peaches and grapes piled up in it, which was much redder and yellower and prettier than real ones is, but they warn't real because you could 50 see where pieces had got chipped off and showed the white chalk, or whatever it was, underneath

This table had a cover made out of beautiful oilcloth, with a red and blue spread-eagle painted on it, and a painted border all around. It come all the way from Philadelphia, they said. There was some books, too piled up perfectly exact, on each corner of the table One was a big family Bible full of pictures One was Pilgiim's Progress, about a man that left his family, it didn't say why. I read considerable in it now 60 and then The statements was interesting, but tough Another was Friendship's Offering, full of beautiful stuff and poetry, but I didn't read the poetry Another was Henry Clay's Speeches, and another was Dr Gunn's Family Medicine, which told you all about what to do if a body was sick or dead. There was a hymn-book, and a lot of other books And there was nice splitbottom chairs, and perfectly sound, too-not bagged down in the middle and busted, like an old basket

They had pictures hung on the walls-mainly Wash- 70 ingtons and Lafayettes, and battles, and Highland Marys, and one called "Signing the Declaration" There was some that they called crayons, which one of the daughters which was dead made her own self when she was only fifteen years old They was different from any pictures I ever see before-blacker, mostly, than is common One was a woman in a slim black dress, belted small under the armpits, with bulges like a cabbage in the middle of the sleeves, and a large black scoop-shovel bonnet with a black veil, and white slim ankles crossed 80 about with black tape, and very wee black slippers, like a chisel, and she was leaning pensive on a tombstone on her right elbow, under a weeping willow, and her other hand hanging down her side holding a white handkerchief and a reticule, and underneath the picture it said "Shall I Never See Thee More Alas" Another one was a young lady with her hair all combed up straight to the top of her head, and knotted there in front of a comb like a chair-back, and she was crying into a handkerchief and had a dead bird laying on its back in her other 90 hand with its heels up, and underneath the picture it said "I Shall Never Hear Thy Sweet Chirrup More Alas"

There was one where a young lady was at a window looking up at the moon, and tears running down her cheeks; and she had an open letter in one hand with black sealing-wax showing on one edge of it, and she was mashing a locket with a chain to it against her mouth, and underneath the picture it said "And Art Thou Gone Yes Thou Art Gone Alas" These was all nice pictures, I reckon, but I didn't somehow seem to take to them, because if ever I was down a little they 10 always give me the fan-tods Everybody was sorry she died, because she had laid out a lot more of these Dictures to do, and a body could see by what she had done what they had lost But I reckoned that with her disposition she was having a better time in the graveyard She was at work on what they said was her greatest picture when she took sick, and every day and every night it was her prayer to be allowed to live till she got it done, but she never got the chance. It was a picture of a young woman in a long white gown, stand-20 ing on the rail of a bridge all ready to jump off, with her hair all down her back, and looking up to the moon, with the tears running down her face, and she had two arms folded across her breast, and two arms stretched out in front, and two more reaching up toward the moon-and the idea was to see which pair would look best, and then scratch out all the other arms, but, as I was saying, she died before she got her mind made up, and now they kept this picture over the head of the bed in her room, and every time her birthday come they 30 hung flowers on it Other times it was hid with a little curtain The young woman in the picture had a kind of a nice sweet face, but there was so many arms it made her look too spidery, seemed to me.

This young girl kept a scrap-book when she was alive, and used to paste obituaries and accidents and cases of patient suffering in it out of the Presbyterian Observer, and write poetry after them out of her own head. It was very good poetry. This is what she wrote about a boy by the name of Stephen Dowling. Bots that fell down a well and was drowned.

ODE TO STEPHEN DOWLING BOTS, DEC'D

And did young Stephen sicken, And did young Stephen die? And did the sad hearts thicken, And did the mourners cry? No, such was not the fate of Young Stephen Dowling Bots; Though sad hearts round him thickened, 'Twas not from sickness' shots

No whooping-cough did rack his frame, Not measles drear with spots. Not these impaired the sacred name Of Stephen Dowling Bots

Despised love struck not with woe That head of curly knots, Nor stomach troubles laid him low, Young Stephen Dowling Bots

O no Then list with tearful eye, Whilst I his fate do tell His soul did from this cold world fly By falling down a well

They got him out and emptied him,
Alas it was too late,
His spirit was gone for to sport aloft
In the realms of the good and great

If Emmeline Grangerford could make poetry like that before she was fourteen, there ain't no telling what she could 'a done by and by Buck said she could rattle off poetry like nothing She didn't ever have to stop to think He said she would slap down a line, and if she couldn't find anything to rhyme with it would just h scratch it out and slap down another one, and go ahead She warn't particular, she could write about anything you choose to give her to write about just so it was sadful Every time a man died, or a woman died, or a child died, she would be on hand with her "tribute" before he was cold. She called them tributes The neighbors said it was the doctor first, then Emmeline, then the undertaker-the undertaker never got in ahead of Emmeline but once, and then she hung fire on a rhyme for the dead person's name, which was Whistler She: warn't ever the same after that, she never complained but she kinder pined away and did not live long Poor thing, many's the time I made myself go up to the little room that used to be hers and get out her poor old scrap-book and read in it when her pictures had been so many arms it made her look 100 spidery. . . . "

aggravating me and I had soured on her a little I liked. If that family, dead ones and all, and warn't going to let anything come between us. Poor Emmeline made poetry about all the dead people when she was alive, and it didn't seem right that there warn't nobody to make some about her now she was gone, so I tried to sweat out a verse or two myself, but I couldn't seem to make it go somehow. They kept Emmeline's room trim and nice, and all the things fixed in it just the way she liked to have them when she was alive and nobody ever slept there. The old lady took care of the room herself, bough there were plenty of niggers, and she sewed there a good deal and read her Bible there mostly.

Well, as I was saying about the parlor, there was recautiful curtains on the windows white, with pictures P inted on them of castles with vines all down the vills and cattle coming down to drink. There was a title old piano, too, that had tin pans in it, I reckon, and nothing was ever so lovely as to hear the young ladies sing "The Last Link is Broken" and play "The 20 Battle of Prague" on it. The walls of all the rooms was plastered, and most had carpets on the floors, and the whole house was whitewashed on the outside.

It was a double house, and the big open place betwixt them was roofed and floored, and sometimes the table was set there in the middle of the day, and it was a cool, comfortable place Nothing couldn't be better. And warn t the cooking good, and just bushels of it too!

Col Grangerford was a gentleman, you see He was a gentleman all over, and so was his family He was well 30 born, as the saying is, and that's worth as much in a man as it is in a horse, so the Widow Douglas said, and nobody ever denied that she was of the first aristocracy in our town, and pap he always said it, too, though he warn't no more quality than a mudcat himself Col. Grangerford was very tall and very slim, and had a darkish-paly complexion, not a sign of red in it anywheres, he was clean-shaved every morning all over his thin face, and he had the thinnest kind of lips, and the thinnest kind of nostrils, and a high nose, and heavy 40 eyebrows, and the blackest kind of eyes, sunk so deep back that they seemed like they was looking out of caverns at you, as you may say His forehead was high, and his hair was gray and straight and hung to his shoulders His hands was long and thin, and every day of his life he put on a clean shirt and a full suit from head to foot made out of linen so white it hurt your eyes to look at it, and on Sundays he wore a blue tailcoat with brass buttons on it. He carried a mahogany cane with a silver head to it There warn't no frivolish- 50 ness about him, not a bit, and he warn't ever loud He was as kind as he could be-you could fee! that, you know, and so you had confidence. Sometimes he smiled, and it was good to see, but when he straightened himself up like a liberty-pole, and the lightning begun to flicker out from under his eyebrows, you wanted to climb a tree first, and find out what the matter was afterwards He didn't ever have to tell anybody to mind their manners-everybody was always good-mannered where he was Everybody loved to have him around, too, he 40 was sunshine most always-I mean he made it seem like good weather When he turned into a cloud-bank it was awful dark for half a minute, and that was enough, there wouldn't nothing go wrong again for a week

When him and the old lady come down in the morning all the family got up out of their chairs and give them good day, and didn't set down again till they had set down. Then Tom and Bob went to the sideboard where the decanter was, and mixed a glass of bitters and handed it to him, and he held it in his hand and waited till Tom's and Bob's was mixed, and then they bowed and said, "Our duty to you, sir, and madam", and they bowed the least bit in the world and said thank you, and so they drank, all thiee, and Bob and Tom poured a spoonful of water on the sugar and the mite of whisky or apple-brandy in the bottom of their tumblers, and give it to me and Buck, and we drank to the old people too.

Bob was the oldest and Tom next—tall, beautiful men with very broad shoulders and brown faces, and long black hair and black eyes. They dressed in white linen from head to foot, like the old gentleman, and wore broad Panama hats.

Then there was Miss Charlotte, she was twenty-five, and tall and proud and grand, but as good as she could be when she warn't stirred up, but when she was she had a look that would make you wilt in your tracks, like her father. She was beautiful

So was her sister, Miss Sophia, but it was a different kind. She was gentle and sweet like a dove, and she was only twenty.

Each person had their own nigger to wait on them— Buck too My nigger had a monstrous easy time, because 30 I warn't used to having anybody do anything for me, but Buck's was on the jump most of the time

This was all there was of the family now, but there used to be more—three sons, they got killed, and Emmeline that died

The old gentleman owned a lot of farms and over a hundred niggers. Sometimes a stack of people would come there, horseback, from ten or fifteen mile around, and stay five or six days, and have such junketings round about and on the river, and dances and picnics in the woods daytimes, and balls at the house nights. These people was mostly kinfolks of the family. The men brought their guns with them. It was a handsome lot of quality, I tell you.

There was another clan of aristocracy around there—five or six families—mostly of the name of Shepherdson.

They was as high-toned and well born and rich and grand as the tribe of Grangerfords. The Shepherdsons and Grangerfords used the same steamboat-landing, which was about two mile above our house, so sometimes when I went up there with a lot of our folks I sused to see a lot of the Shepherdsons there on their fine horses

One day Buck and me was away out in the woods hunting, and heard a horse coming We was crossing the road Buck says

"Quick! Jump for the woods!"

We done it, and then peeped down the woods through the leaves Pretty soon a splendid young man came galloping down the road, setting his horse easy and looking like a soldier. He had his gun across his pommel. I had seen him before It was young Harney Shepherdson I heard Buck's gun go off at my ear, and Harney's hat tumbled off from his head He grabbed his gun and rode straight to the place where we was hid But we didn't wait We started through the woods on a run The woods warn't thick, so I looked over my shoulder to dodge the bullet, and twice I seen Harney cover Buck with his gun, and then he rode away the way he cometo get his hat, I reckon, but I couldn't see We never stopped running till we got home. The old gentlemans eyes blazed a minute-'twas pleasure, mainly, I judgedthen his face sort of smoothed down and he says, kind of gentle

"I don't like that shooting from behind a bush Whi didn't you step into the road, my boy?"

"The Shepherdsons don't, father They always take advantage"

Miss Charlotte she held her head up like a queen while Buck was telling his tale, and her nostrils spread and her eyes snapped. The two young men looked dark but never said nothing. Miss Sophia she turned pale but the color come back when she found the min warn't hurt.

Soon as I could get Buck down by the corn-cribs under the trees by ourselves, I says

"Did you want to kill him, Buck'

"Well, I bet I did'

"What did he do to you?"

"Him? He never done nothing to me"

"Well, then, what did you want to kill him for?"

"Why, nothing-only it's on account of the feud"

"What's a feud?"

"Why, where was you raised? Don't you know what a feud is?

"Never heard of it before-tell me about it"

Well," says Buck, "a feud is this way A man has a quarrel with another man, and kills him, then that other man's brother kills him; then the other brothers, on both sides, goes for one another, then the coustns chip in—and by and by everybody's killed off, and there ain't no more feud But it's kind of slow, and takes a long time."

Has this one been going on long, Buck?'

Well, I should reckon' It started thirty year ago, or som'ers along there. There was trouble 'bout something, and then a lawsuit to settle it, and the suit went agin one of the men, and so he up and shot the man that won the suit—which he would naturally do, of course. Anybody would "

What was the trouble about, Buck'-land'

"I reckon maybe—I don't know"

"Well, who done the shooting? Was it a Grangerford or a Shepherdson?"

"Laws, how do I know? It was so long ago"

"Don't anybody know?"

"Oh, yes, pa knows, I reckon, and some of the other old people, but they don't know now what the row was about in the first place"

Has there been many killed, Buck?"

Yes, right smart chance of funerals But they don't always kill Pa's got a few buckshot in him, but he don't mind it 'cuz he don't weigh much, anyway Bob's been carved up some with a bowie, and Tom's been hurt once or twice"

'Has anybody been killed this year, Buck?"

Yes, we got one and they got one 'Bout three months ago my cousin Bud, fourteen year old, was riding through the woods on t'other side of the river, and didn't have no weapon with him, which was blame' foolishness, and in a lonesome place he hears a horse a-coming behind him, and sees old Baldy Shepherdson a-linkin' after him with his gun in his hand and his white hair a-flying in the wind, and 'stead of jumping off and taking to the brush, Bud 'lowed he could outrun him, so they had it, hip and tuck, for five mile or more, the old man a-gaining all the time, so at last Bud seen it warn't any use. So he stopped and faced around so as to have the bulletholes in front, you know, and the old man he rode up and shot him down But he didn't git much chance to enjoy his luck, for inside of a week our folks laid him out."

"I reckon that old man was a coward, Buck"

"I reckon he u arn't a coward Not by a blame' sight. There ain't a coward amongst them Shepherdsons-not a one And there ain t no cowards amongst the Grangerfords either Why, that old man kep' up his end in a fight one day for half an hour against three Grangerfords, and come out winner They was all a-horseback, he lit off of his horse and got behind a little woodpile, and kep' his horse before him to stop the bullets; but the Grangerfords staved on their horses and capered around the old man, and peppered away at him, and he 60 peppered away at them Him and his horse both went home pretty leaky and crippled, but the Grangerfords had to be fetched home—and one of 'em was dead, and another died the next day No, sir, if a body's out hunting for cowards he don't want to fool away any time amongst them Shepherdsons, becuz they don't breed any of that kind"

Next Sunday we all went to church, about three mile, everybody a-horseback. The men took their guns along, so did Buck, and kept them between their knees or stood 70 them handy against the wall. The Shepherdsons done the same. It was pretty ornery preaching—all about brotherly love, and such-like tiresomeness, but everybody said it was a good sermon, and they all talked it over going home, and had such a powerful lot to say about faith and good works and free grace and preforeordestination, and I don't know what all, that it did seem to me to be one of the roughest Sundays I had run across yet.

About an hour after dinner everybody was dozing 80 around, some in their chairs and some in their rooms, and it got to be pretty dull Buck and a dog was stretched out on the grass in the sun sound asleep I went up to our room, and judged I would take a nap myself I found that sweet Miss Sophia standing in her door, which was next to ours, and she took me in her room and shut the door very soft, and asked me if I liked her, and I said I did, and she asked me if I would do something for her and not tell anybody, and I said I would. Then she said she'd forgot her Testament, and left it in 50 the seat at church between two other books, and would I slip out quiet and go there and fetch it to her, and not say nothing to nobody I said I would So I slid out and slipped off up the road, and there warn't any-body at the church, except mavbe a hog or two, for there warn't any lock on the door, and hogs likes a puncheon floor in summer-time because it's cool. If you notice, most folks don't go to church only when they've got to, but a hog is different.

Says I to myself, something's up, it ain't natural for a girl to be in such a sweat about a Testament So I give io it a shake, and out drops a little piece of paper with "Half past two' wrote on it with a pencil I ransacked it, but couldn't find anything else I couldn't make anything out of that, so I put the paper in the book again, and when I got home and upstairs there was Miss Sophia in her door waiting for me. She pulled me in and shut the door, then she looked in the Testament till she found the paper, and as soon as she read it she looked glad, and before a body could think she grabbed me and give me a squeeze, and said I was the best boy in the 20 world, and not to tell anybody. She was mighty red in the face for a minute, and her eyes lighted up, and it made her powerful pretty I was a good deal astonished, but when I got my breath I asked her what the paper was about, and she asked me if I had read it, and I said no, and she asked me if I could read writing, and I told her "no, only coarse-hand," and then she said the paper warn't anything but a book-mark to keep her place, and I might go and play now

I went off down to the river, studying over this thing, 30 and pretty soon I noticed that my nigger was following along behind. When we was out of sight of the house he looked back and around a second, and then comes a-running, and says

"Mars Jawge, if you'll come down into de swamp I'll show you a whole stack o' water-moccasins'

Thinks I, that's mighty curious, he said that yesterday He oughter know a body don't love water-moccasins enough to go around hunting for them. What is he up to, anyway? So I says

o "All right, trot ahead"

I followed a half a mile, then he struck out over the swamp, and waded ankle-deep as much as another half-mile. We come to a little flat piece of land which was dry and very thick with trees and bushes and vines, and he says.

"You shove right in dah jist a few steps, Mars Jawge, dah's whah dey is I's seed 'm befo', I don't k'yer to see 'em no mo'"

Then he slopped right along and went away, and pretty soon the trees hid him I poked into the place a ways and come to a little open patch as big as a bedroom all hung around with vines, and found a man laying there asleep—and, by jings, it was my old Jim'

I waked him up, and I reckoned it was going to be a grand surprise to him to see me again, but it warn't He nearly cried he was so glad, but he warn't surprised Said he swum along behind me that night, and heard me yell every time, but dasn't answer, because he didn't want nobody to pick him up and take him into slavery again Says he

"I got hurt a little, en couldn't swim fas', so I wuz a considerable ways behine you towards de las', when you landed I reck'ned I could ketch up wid you on de lan' dout havin' to shout at you, but when I see dat house I begin to go slow I 'uz off too fur to hear what dey say to you—I wuz 'fraid o' de dogs, but when it 'uz all quict ag'in I knowed you's in de house, so I struck out for de woods to wait for day Early in de mawnin' some er de niggers come along, gwyne to de fields, en dey tuk me en showed me dis place, whah de dogs can't track me on accounts o' de water, en dey brings me truck to cat every night, en tells me how you's a-gittin' along"

"Why didn't you tell my Jack to fetch me here sooner Jim"

"Well, 'twarn't no use to 'sturb you, Huck, tell we could do sumfn—but we's all right now I ben a-buvin pots en pans en vittles, as I got a chanst, en a-patchin up de raf' nights when—"

"What raft, Jim?"

"Our ole raf'."

"You mean to say our old raft warn't smashed all to flinders?"

"No, she warn't She was tore up a good deal—one en' of her was, but dey warn't no great harm done, on'y our traps was mos' all los' Ef we hadn' dive' so deep en swum so fur under water, en de night hadn't ben so dark en we warn't so sk'yerd, en ben sick punkin-heads, as de sayin' is, we'd a seed de raf' But it's jis' as well we didn't 'kase now she's all fixed up ag'in mos' as good as new en we's got a new lot o' stuff, in de place o' what 'uz los'

"Why, how did you get hold of the raft again, Jim-did you catch her?"

How I gwyne to ketch her en I out in de woods? No; some er de niggers foun' her ketched on a snag along heah in de ben', en dey hid her in a crick 'mongst de willows, en dey wuz so much jawin' 'bout which un 'um she b'long to de mos' dat I come to heah 'bout it pooty soon, so I ups en settles de trouble by tellin' 'um she don't b'long to none uv 'um, but to you en me; en I ast m if dey gwyne to grab a young white genlman's propaty, en git a hid'n for it? Den I gin 'm ten cents apiece, en dey 'uz mighty well satisfied, en wisht some mo' rat's 'ud come along en make 'm rich ag'in Dey's mighty good to me, dese niggers is, en whatever I wants m to do fur me I doan' have to ast 'm twice, honey. Dat Jack's a good nigger, en pooty smart'"

Yes, he is. He ain't ever told me you was here, told me to come, and he'd show me a lot of water-moccasins. If anything happens he ain't mixed up in it. He can say he never seen us together, and it'll be the truth''

I don't want to talk much about the next day. I reckon I'll cut it pretty short I waked up about dawn, and was a-going to turn over and go to sleep again when I noticed how still it was—didn't seem to be anybody stirring That warn't usual Next I noticed that Buck was up and gone Well, I gets up, a-wondering, and goes down-stairs—nobody around; everything as still as a mouse Just the same outside Thinks I, what does it mean? Down by the woodpile I comes across my Jack, and says

"What's it all about?"

30 Says he

"Don't you know, Mars Jawge?"

"No" says I, "I don't"

"Well, den, Miss Sophia's run off! 'deed she has She run off in de night some time—nobody don't know jis' when, run off to get married to dat young Harney Shepherdson, you know—leastways, so dey 'spec De fambly foun' it out 'bout half an hour ago—maybe a little mo'—en' I tell you dey warn't no time los' Sich another hurryin' up guns en hosses you never see! De women folks has gone for to stir up de relations, en ole Mars Saul en de boys tuck dey guns en rode up de river road for to try to ketch dat young man en kill him 'fo' he kin git acrost de river wid Miss Sophia I reck'n dey's gwyne to be mighty rough times"

"Buck went off 'thout waking me up."

"Well, I reck'n he did! Dey warn't gwyne to mix you

" trying to get at a couple of young chaps that was behind the wood tank. . "

up in it Mars Buck he loaded up his gun en 'lowed he's gwyne to fetch home a Shepherdson or bust Well, dey'll be plenty un 'm dah, I reck'n, en you bet you he'll fetch one ef he gits a chanst"

I took up the river road as hard as I could put By and by I begin to hear guns a good ways off When I came in sight of the log store and the woodpile where the steamboats lands I worked along under the trees and brush till I got to a good place, and then I clumb up into the forks of a cottonwood that was out of reach, and watched. There was a wood-rank four foot high a little ways in front of the tree, and first I was going to hide behind that, but maybe it was luckier I didn't.

There was four or five men cavorting around on their so horses in the open place before the log store, cussing and yelling, and trying to get at a couple of young chaps that was behind the wood-rank alongside of the steamboat-landing, but they couldn't come it Every time one of them showed himself on the river side of the woodpile he got shot at. The two boys was squatting back to back behind the pile, so they could watch both ways

By and by the men stopped cavorting around and yelling They started riding towards the store, then up gets one of the boys, draws a steady bead over the woodrank, and drops one of them out of his saddle All the men jumped off of their horses and grabbed the hurt one and started to carry him to the store, and that minute the two boys started on the run They got half-way to the tree I was in before the men noticed. Then the men see them, and jumped on their horses and took out after them. They gained on the boys, but it dudn't do no good, the boys had too good a start, they got to the woodpile that was in front of my tree, and slipped in behind it, and so they had the bulge on the men again. One of the boys was Buck, and the other was a slim young chap about nineteen years old

The men ripped around awhile, and then rode away. As soon as they was out of sight I sung out to Buck and told him He didn't know what to make of my voice 10 coming out of the tree at first He was awful surprised. He told me to watch out sharp and let him know when the men come in sight again, said they was up to some devilment or other-wouldn't be gone long I wished I was out of that tree, but I dasn't come down Buck begun to cry and rip, and 'lowed that him and his cousin loe (that was the other young chap) would make up for this day yet He said his father and his two brothers was killed, and two or three of the enemy Said the Shepherdsons laid for them in ambush Buck said his 20 father and brothers ought to waited for their relationsthe Shepherdsons was too strong for them I asked him what was become of young Harney and Miss Sophia He said they'd got across the river and was safe I was glad of that, but the way Buck did take on because he didn't manage to kill Harney that day he shot at him-I hain't ever heard anything like it

All of a sudden, bang' bang' goes three or four guns—the men had slipped around through the woods and come in from behind without their horses' The boys jumped for the river—both of them hurt—and as they swum down the current the men run along the bank shooting at them and singing out, "Kill them, kill them!" It made me so sick I most fell out of the tree I ain't a-going to tell all that happened—it would make me sick again if I was to do that I wished I hadn't ever come ashore that night to see such things I ain't ever going to get shut of them—lots of times I dream about them

I stayed in the tree till it begun to get dark, afraid to come down Sometimes I heard guns away off in the woods, and twice I seen little gangs of men gallop past the log store with guns, so I reckoned the trouble was still a-going on I was mighty down-hearted, so I made up my mind I wouldn't ever go anear that house again, because I reckoned I was to blame, somehow I judged that that piece of paper meant that Miss Sophia was to meet Harney somewheres at half past two and run off, and I judged I ought to told her father about that paper and the curious way she acted, and then maybe he would 'a' locked her up, and this awful mess wouldn't ever happened

When I got down out of the tree I crept along down the river-bank a piece, and found the two bodies laying in the edge of the water, and tugged at them till I got them ashore, then I covered up their faces, and got away as quick as I could I cried a little when I was covering up Buck's face, for he was mighty good to me

It was just dark now I never went near the house, but struck through the woods and made for the swamp Jim warn't on his island, so I tramped off in a hurry for the crick, and crowded through the willows, red-hot to jump aboard and get out of that awful country. The raft was gone! My souls, but I was scared! I couldn't get my breath for most a minute. Then I raised a yell A voice not twenty-five foot from me says.

"Good lan" is dat you, honey? Doan make no noise It was Jim's voice—nothing ever sounded so good before I run along the bank a piece and got aboard and Jim he grabbed me and hugged me, he was so glad to see me He says

"Laws bless you, chile, I 'uz right down sho' you's dead ag'in Jack's been heah, he say he rek'n you's ben shot, kase you didn' come home no mo', so I's jes' dis minute a-startin' de raf' down towards de mouf er de crick, so's to be all ready for to shove out en leave soon as Jack comes ag'in en tells me for certain you is dead Lawsy, I's mighty glad to git you back ag'in, honey"

I says

"All right—that's mighty good, they won't find me, and they'll think I've been killed, and floated down the river—there's something up there that II help them think so—so don't you lose no time, Jim, but just shove off for the big water as fast as ever you can"

I never felt easy till the raft was two mile below there and out in the middle of the Mississippi. Then we hung up our signal lantern, and judged that we was free and safe once more I hadn't had a bite to eat since yesterday, so Jim he got out some corn-dodgers and buttermilk and pork and cabbage and greens—there ain t nothing in the world so good when it's cooked right—and whilst leat my supper we talked and had a good time. I will powerful glad to get away from the feuds, and so will appropriate the support of the feuds, and so will be supported to the feuds and supported the feuds and supported to the feuds and suppo

Jim to get away from the swamp. We said there warn't no home like a raft, after all. Other places do seem so cramped up and smothery, but a raft don't You feel mighty free and easy and comfortable on a raft

AN ARKANSAW DIFFICULTY

Down the river below the Grangerford plantation, Huck and Jim, against their will, were joined by two rascals who called themselves the king and the duke. These two, who were glad to collect any dishonest pennies available, brought the raft ashore in Bricksville, Arkansas, to give a performance of a Shakespearean play, and Huck saw the incidents here described. The passage, part of Chapter XXI, starts just after the duke has hired the courthouse and has posted bills advertising the play.

When Clemens printed a long selection about Huck, Jim, the king, and the duke in the February 1885 issue of the Ceniury, most of this passage was omitted for fear that it might offend the sensibilities of subscribers (See Bernard DeVoto, Mark Twain's America, pp. 212-216, for a detailed study of the excisions.) Sherburn's speech to the mob, with its commentaries on what Clemens called "The damned human race," is an articulation of some of the pessimistic attitudes which were to become more and more important to Clemens as the years passed. In What Is Man? and The Mysterious Stranger, he was to give them their most detailed expression.

Then we went loafing around town The stores and houses was most all old, shackly, dried-up frame concerns that hadn't ever been painted, they was set up three or four foot above ground on stilts, so as to be out of reach of the water when the river was overflowed The bouses had little gardens around them, but they didn't seem to raise hardly anything in them but jimpsonweeds, and sunflowers, and ashpiles, and old curled-up boots and shoes, and pieces of bottles, and rags, and played-out tinware The fences was made of different kinds of boards, nailed on at different times, and they leaned every which way, and had gates that didn't generly have but one hinge—a leather one Some of the fences had been whirewashed some time or another, but the duke said it was in Columbus's time, like enough. There was generly hogs in the garden, and people driving them out 20

All the stores was along one street. They had white domestic awnings in front, and the country-people hitched their horses to the awning-posts. There was empty dry-goods boxes under the awnings, and loafers roosting on them all day long, whittling them with their Barlow knives, and chawing tobacco, and gaping and yawning and stretching-a mighty ornery lot They generly had on yellow straw hats most as wide as an umbrella, but didn't wear no coats not waistcoats, they called one another Bill, and Buck, and Hank, and Ioe, 30 and Andy, and talked lazy and drawly, and used considerable many cuss-words. There was as many as one loafer leaning up against every awning-post, and he most always had his hands in his britches pockets, except when he fetched them out to lend a chaw of tobacco or scratch. What a body was hearing amongst them all the time was

"Gimme a chaw 'v tobacker, Hank."

'Cain't, I hain't got but one chaw left Ask Bill "

Maybe Bill he gives him a chaw, maybe he lies and 40 says he ain't got none Some of them kinds of loafers never has a cent in the world, nor a chaw of tobacco of their own They get all their chawing by borrowing, they say to a fellow, "I wisht you'd len' me a chaw, Jack, I jist this minute give Ben Thompson the last chaw I had"—which is a lie pretty much every time, it don't fool nobody but a stranger, but Jack ain't no stranger, so he says

"You give him a chaw, did you? So did your sister's cat's grandmother. You pay me back the chaws you've so awready borry'd off'n me, Lafe Buckner, then I'll loan you one or two ton of it, and won't charge you no back intrust, nuther."

"Well, I did pay you back some of it wunst"

"Yes, you did—'bout six chaws You borry'd store tobacker and paid back nigger-head"

Store tobacco is flat black plug, but these fellows mostly chaws the natural leaf twisted When they borrow a chaw they don't generly cur it off with a knife, but set the plug in between their teeth, and gnaw with 60 their teeth and tug at the plug with their hands till they get it in two, then sometimes the one that owns the tobacco looks mournful at it when it's handed back, and says, sarcastic

"I'm on the waw-path, and the price uv coffins is a-gwyne to raise."

"Here, gimme the chaw, and you take the plug."

All the streets and lanes was just mud, they warn't nothing else but mud-mud as black as tar and nigh about a foot deep in some places, and two or three inches deep in all the places. The hogs loafed and grunted around everywheres You'd see a muddy sow and a litter of pigs come lazying along the street and whellop herself right down in the way, where folks had to walk around her, and she'd stretch out and shut her eyes and wave 10 her ears whilst the pigs was milking her, and look as happy as if she was on salary And pretty soon you'd hear a loafer sing out, "Hi! 10 boy! sick him, Tige!" and away the sow would go, squealing most horrible, with a dog or two swinging to each ear, and three or four dozen more a-coming, and then you would see all the loafers get up and watch the thing out of sight, and laugh at the fun and look grateful for the noise Then they'd settle back again till there was a dog-fight. There couldn't anything wake them up all over, and make them 20 happy all over, like a dog-fight—unless it might be putting turpentine on a stray dog and setting fire to him, or tying a tin pan to his tail and see him run himself to death

On the river-front some of the houses was sticking out over the bank, and they was bowed and bent, and about ready to tumble in. The people had moved out of them. The bank was caved away under one corner of some others, and that corner was hanging over. People lived in them yet, but it was dangersome, because sometimes a strip of land as wide as a house caves in at a time. Sometimes a belt of land a quarter of a mile.

deep will start in and cave along and cave along till it all caves into the river in one summer. Such a town as that has to be always moving back, and back, because the river's always gnawing at it.

The nearer it got to noon that day the thicker and thicker was the wagons and horses in the streets, and more coming all the time. Families fetched their dinners with them from the country, and eat them in the wagons. There was considerable whisky-drinking going on, and I seen three fights. By and by somebody sings out

"Here comes old Boggs!—in from the country for his little old monthly drunk, here he comes, boys!"

All the loafers looked glad, I reckoned they was used to having fun out of Boggs One of them says

"Wonder who he's a-gwyne to chaw up this time If he'd a-chawed up all the men he's ben a-gwyne to chaw up in the last twenty year he'd have considerable ruputation now."

Another one says, "I wisht old Boggs 'd threaten me, 'cuz then I'd know I warn't gwyne to die for a thousan year"

Boggs comes a-tearing along on his horse, whooping and yelling like an Injun, and singing out

"Cler the track, thar I'm on the waw-path, and the price uv coffins is a-gwyne to raise"

He was drunk, and weaving about in his saddle, he was over fifty year old, and had a very red face. Everybody yelled at him and laughed at him and sassed him, and he sassed back, and said he'd attend to them and lay them out in their regular turns, but he couldn't wait now because he'd come to town to kill old Colonel Sherburn, and his motto was. "Meat first, and spoon virtles to top off on"

He see me, and rode up and says

"Whar'd you come f'm, boy' You prepared to die' Then he rode on I was scared, but a man says

"He don't mean nothing, he's always a-carryin' on like that when he's drunk He's the best-naturedest old fool in Arkansaw—never hurt nobody, drunk nor sober

Boggs rode up before the biggest store in town, and bent his head down so he could see under the curtain of the awning and yells

"Come out here, Sherburn! Come out and meet the man you've swindled You're the houn' I'm after, and I'm a-gwyne to have you, too!"

And so he went on, calling Sherburn everything he could lay his tongue to, and the whole street packed with people listening and laughing and going on By and by a proud-looking man about fifty-five—and he was a neap the best-dressed man in that town, too—steps out of the store, and the crowd drops back on each side to let him come He says to Boggs, mighty ca'm and slow—he says

I'm tired of this, but I'll endure it till one o'clock. Till one o'clock, mind—no longer If you open your mouth against me only once after that time you can't travel so far but I will find you

Then he turns and goes in The crowd looked mighty sober, nobody stirred, and there warn't no more laughing Boggs rode off blackguarding Sherburn as loud as he could yell, all down the street, and pretty soon back he comes and stops before the store, still keeping it up Some men crowded around him and tried to get him to shut up, but he wouldn't, they told him it would be one o clock in about fifteen minutes, and so he must go home . —he must go right away But it didn't do no good He cussed away with all his might, and throwed his hat down in the mud and rode over it, and pretty soon away he went a-raging down the street again, with his gray hair a-flying Everybody that could get a chance at him tried their best to coax him off of his horse so they could lock him up and get him sober, but it warn't no use-up the street he would tear again, and give Sherburn another cussing. By and by somebody says

Go for his daughter!—quick, go for his daughter, sometimes he'll listen to her If anybody can persuade him, she can

So somebody started on a run I walked down street a ways and stopped In about five or ten minutes here comes Boggs again, but not on his horse. He was a-reeling across the street towards me, bareheaded, with a friend on both sides of him a-holt of his arms and hurrying him along. He was quiet, and looked uneasy, and he warn't hanging back any, but was doing some of the hurrying himself. Somebody sings out

Boggs!"

I looked over there to see who said it, and it was that Colonel Sherburn. He was standing perfectly still in the street, and had a pistol raised in his right hand—not aiming it, but holding it out with the barrel tilted up towards the sky. The same second I see a young girl coming on the run, and two men with her. Boggs and the men turned round to see who called him, and when they see the pistol the men jumped to one side, and the pistol-barrel come down slow and steady to a level—both barrels cocked Boggs throws up both of his hands and says, "O Lord, don't shoot!" Bang! goes the first shot, and he staggers back, clawing at the air—bang! goes the second one, and he tumbles backwards onto the ground, heavy and solid, with his arms spread out. That young girl screamed out and comes rushing, and down she throws herself on her father, crying, and saying, "Oh, he's killed him, he's killed him!" The crowd closed up around them, and shouldered and jammed one another, with their necks stretched, trying to see, and people on the inside tiying to shove them back and 60 shouting, "Back, back! give him air, give him air!"

Colonel Sherburn he tossed his pistol onto the ground, and turned atound on his heels and walked off

They took Boggs to a little drug store, the crowd pressing around just the same, and the whole town following, and I rushed and got a good place at the window, where I was close to him and could see in They laid him on the floor and put one large Bible under his head, and opened another one and spread it on his breast, but they tore open his shirt first, and I seen where one of the bullets went in He made about a dozen long gasps, his breast lifting the Bible up when he drawed in his breath, and letting it down again when he breathed it out—and after that he laid still, he was dead Then they pulled his daughter away from him, screening and crying, and took her off. She was about sixteen, and very sweet and gentle looking, but awful pale and scared.

Well, pretty soon the whole town was there, squirming and scrouging and pushing and shoving to get at the window and have a look, but people that had the 80 places wouldn't give them up, and folks behind them was saying all the time, "Say, now, you've looked enough, you fellows, 'tain't right and 'tain't fair for you to stay that all the time, and never give nobody a chance, other folks has their rights as well as you."

There was considerable Jawing back, so I slid out, thinking maybe there was going to be trouble. The streets was full, and everybody was excited. Everybody that seen the shooting was telling how it happened, and there was a big crowd packed around each one of these fellows, stretching their necks and listening. One long, lanky man, with long hair and a big white fur stovepipe.

"Just then Sherburn steps out onto the roof. . . ."

hat on the back of his head, and a crooked-handled cane, marked out the places on the ground where Boggs stood and where Sherburn stood, and the people following him around from one place to t'other and watching everything he done, and bobbing their heads to show they understood, and stooping a little and resting their hands on their thighs to watch him mark the places on the ground with his cane, and then he stood up straight and stiff where Sherburn had stood, frowning and having his hat-brim down over his eyes, and sung out, "Boggs!" and then fetched his cane down slow to a level, and says "Bang!" staggered backwards, says "Bang!" again, and fell down flat on his back. The people that had seen the thing said he done it perfect, said it was just exactly the way it all happened. Then as much as a dozen people got out their bottles and treated him.

Well, by and by somebody said Sherburn ought to be lynched. In about a minute everybody was saying it; so away they went, mad and yelling, and snatching down 20 every clothes-line they come to do the hanging with

They swarmed up towards Sherburn's house, a-whooping and raging like Injuns, and everything had to clear the way or get run over and tromped to mush, and it was awful to see Children was heeling it ahead of the mob screaming and trying to get out of the way, and every window along the road was full of women's heads, and there was nigger boys in every tree, and bucks and wenches looking over every fence, and as soon as the mob would get nearly to them they would break and skaddle back out of reach. Lots of the women and girls was crying and taking on, scared most to death

They swarmed up in front of Sherburn's palings as thick as they could jam together, and you couldn't hear yourself think for the noise. It was a little twenty-foot yard. Some sung out "Tear down the fence! tear down the fence!" Then there was a racket of ripping and tearing and smashing, and down she goes, and the front wall of the crowd begins to roll in like a wave

Just then Sherburn steps out onto the roof of his little of front porch, with a double-barrel gun in his hand, and takes his stand, perfectly cam and deliberate, not saying a word. The racket stopped, and the wave sucked back

Sherburn never said a word—just stood there, looking down. The stillness was awful creepy and uncomfortable. Sherburn run his eye slow along the crowd, and wherever it struck the people tried a little to outgaze him but they couldn't, they dropped their eyes and looked sneaky. Then pretty soon Sherburn sort of laughed, not the pleasant kind, but the kind that makes you feel like when you are eating bread that's got sand in it.

Then he says, slow and scornful

"The idea of you lynching anybody! It's amusing The idea of you thinking you had pluck enough to lynch a man! Because you're brave enough to tar and feather poor friendless cast-out women that come along here, did that make you think you had grit enough to lay your hands on a man? Why, a man's safe in the hands of ten thousand of your kind—as long as it's daytime and you're not behind him.

Do I know you? I know you clear through. I was born and raised in the South, and I've lived in the North; so I know the average all around. The average man's a coward In the North he lets anybody walk over him that wants to, and goes home and prays for a humble spirit to bear it. In the South one man, all by himself, has stopped a stage full of men in the daytime, and robbed the lot. Your newspapers call you a brave people so much that you think you are braver than any other people—whereas you're just as brave, and no braver. Why don't your juries hang murderers? Because they're afraid the man's friends will shoot them in the back, in the dark—and it's just what they would do.

So they always acquit, and then a man goes in the night, with a hundred masked cowards at his back, and kinches the rascal. Your mistake is, that you didn't bring a man with you, that's one mistake, and the other is that you didn't come in the dark and fetch your masks. You brought part of a man—Buck Harkness, there—ind if you hidn't had him to start you, you'd 'a' taken it out in blowing.

"You didn't want to come The average man don't like trouble and danger. You don't like trouble and danger. But if only half a man-like Buck Harkness, there-shouts 'Lynch him! lynch him!' you're afraid to back down-afraid you'll be found out to be what you are-cowards-and so you raise a yell, and hang your- 30 selves onto that half-a-man's coat-tail, and come raging up here, swearing what big things you're going to do The pitifulest thing out is a mob, that's what an army is -a mob, they don't fight with courage that's born in them, but with courage that's borrowed from their mass, and from their officers. But a mob without any man at the head of it is beneath pitifulness. Now the thing for you to do is to droop your tails and go home and crawl in a hole. If any real lynching's going to be done it will be done in the dark, Southern fashion, and when they 40 come they'll bring their masks, and fetch a man along Now leave-and take your half-a-man with you'-tossing his gun up across his left arm and cocking it when he says this

The crowd washed back sudden, and then broke all apart, and went tearing off every which way, and Buck Harkness he heeled it after them, looking tolerable cheap. I could 'a' stayed if I wanted to, but I didn't want to.

HOWELLS

William Dean Howells

1837 • 1920

Ah' poor Real Life, which I love, can I make others share the delight I find in thy foolish and insipid face?" William Dean Howells exclaimed in Their Wedding Journey (1872), his first novel He loved "Real Life," particularly American life, and he communicated his delight in it to many readers in many books.

Howells was born at Martin's Ferry, Ohio, in 1837. His father was a printer and journalist in several Ohio towns, and the boy learned early to help. He received little formal education, but he had a passion for languages, especially German, and for literature, especially the poems of Heine. From 1856 to 1861 Howells was reporter and editorial writer on the Obio State Journal of Columbus. He wrote in 1860 a campaign biography of Lincoln and was rewarded by an appointment in 1861 as consul at Venice. In the meantime, he had been trying his hand at poetry. "Ah! if I only could write something worthy of the Atlantic!" he said to a friend, the ambition was realized in 1860 when three of his poems appeared in that magazine. In the same year occurred his first visit to New England, which is charmingly remembered in Literary Friends and Acquaintances (1900) To the young Howells the journey was a pilgrimage to the Holy Land of American literature James T Fields, editor of the Atlantic, Lowell, and Holmes received him most cordially Hawthorne, after talking with Howells on the hilltop back of "The Wayside." wrote on his card as an introduction to Emerson, "I find this young man worthy"

Howells was in Venice from 1861 to 1865. In 1862 he married Eleanor Mead, of Brattleboro, Vermont, (She had visited in Columbus in 1860, and upon expressing surprise at seeing a copy of the Atlantic, had been informed, "There are several contributors to the Atlantic in Columbus!") The literary fruits of Howells' Italian experience were to appear later in Venetian Life (1866), Modern Italian Poets (1887), and elsewhere. In 1866 he returned to America, was made assistant editor of the Atlantic (blessed consummation), and settled in Cambridge In 1872 he became editor in chief and continued in that high office until 1881. His acceptance by the literary celebrities is sufficiently attested by the fact that he was among the select group invited to Craigie House for the "Dante evenings," when Longfellow read installments of his translation of the Divine Comedy and the company sat down to a nine o'clock supper During these years, Howells seems to have been especially under the somewhat awe-inspiring mentorship of Lowell, of whom he wrote to Charles Eliot Norton, "His strength is felt throughout the whole puny body of our literature"

Howells moved in 1888 to New York, where he lived —allowing for excursions back to New England and to Europe—the rest of his life. After two months there, he wrote. "I have been trying to catch on to the bigger life of the place. It's immensely interesting... and the place is lordly free, with foreign touches of all kinds all through its abounding Americanism: Boston seems of another planet." And a little later (to Henry James):

"At the bottom of our wicked hearts, we all like New York, and I hope to use some of its vast, gay, shapeless life in my fiction." In 1889 he attended a Socialist meeting. "It was as quiet and orderly as a Sunday School, and people whom the reporters represent as violent conspirators were poorly-dressed, well-behaved listeners to a lecture which dealt patiently with hard facts" It is clear that Howells' residence in New York extended his social horizon. As early as 1886 he had established a connection with Harper and Brothers From 1900 on he wrote the "Easy Chair department of Harper's Monthly, which brought him increasing influence and prestige He received honorary degrees from Harvard, Yale, Columbia, and Oxford, and for many years was president of the American Academy of Arts and Letters

In addition to many volumes of travel, autobiography, literary criticism, and plays, Howells wrote thirty-eight novels. Three of these have generally been regarded as decidedly better than the rest: A Modern Instance (1881), The Rise of Silas Lapham (1885), and A Hazard of New Fortunes (1890) The setting of the first and second is New England, chiefly Boston, of the third. New York A Modern Instance is an intense story -intense, that is, for the mild Howells-of the failure of the marriage of a young journalist of weak moral principle and an inexperienced, temperamental girl from a Maine village The characters and scenes are drawn with knowledge and skill The Rise of Silas Lapham is the story of the failure of a "self-made" Boston businessman who is awkward in society but honorable in business, the author is especially expert in depicting contrasts between the Brahmins and the parvenus of the Boston social world In A Hazard of New Fortunes Howells essayed a larger canvas A half-dozen or more individuals living in New York, each representing a different social background and attitude, are brought together, somewhat artificially, by means of their connection with a magazine, a Boston dilettante, a professional Southerner, a promoter, a millionaire from the Middle West, an immigrant Socialist, a social worker from fashionable society, and a social visionary. The climactic event is a streetcar strike, which is treated sympathetically. "No other American novel of the nineteenth century, except possibly The Gilded Age. says Granville Hicks, "can be compared in its scope with A Hazard of New Fortunes." A fourth book of conmay be added, though it is more nearly a tract than a novel Altruria is Howells' Utopia, and his "traveler," after having been sufficiently pained by what he has seen at a summer hotel in the White Mountains, describes the ideal society in a lecture which shows, still turther, Howells' increasing interest in social problems and the influence of his reading of Edward Bellamy and Tolstoy

Howells has been sharply criticized since his death The naturalists have objected to his reticence and decency, his suppression of sex and crime. The Freudians (see Ludwig Lewisohn, Expression in America) have discovered in his prudishness the "violent sex-consciousness" of the Victorian mind. The Socialist critics (see Granville Hicks, The Great Tradition) have condemned him for his failure to come to grips with the problems of capital and labor, Hicks cannot forgive him, particularly, for presenting in Silas Lapham an honorable opitalist. In defense, it may be urged that Howells dealt with the life he knew, and that he should be judged by what he wrote, rather than by what he didn't write He thought, a little naively perhaps, that "the more smiling aspects of life are the more American". The new realism in fiction, he maintained, should portray the typical, the representative, rather than the exceptional; and he persisted in his belief that the typical, the representative phenomena of American life were comparatively decent. From this point of view, his books give a valuable picture. He had a facile pen, he had skill in dialogue, and dramatic situation he was marvelously adept in depicting the domestic commonplaces and the toibles of "society". During the last two decades of the nineteenth century, he was our chief recorder in prose fiction of the domestic life of middle-class. America

Criticism and Fiction

Criticism and Fiction is not only the best statement of Howells' aims but also a significant document in the history of the "new realism" in American prose fiction

As for those called critics," the author says, "they have generally sought the rule of the arts in the wrong place, they have sought among poems, pictures, engravings, stotues, and buildings, but art can never give the rules that make an art. This is, I believe, the reason why arrists in general, and poets principally, have been confined in so narrow a circle, they have been rather imitators of one another than of nature. Critics follow them, and therefore can do little as guides 1 can judge but poorly of anything while 1 measure it by no other is standard than itself. The true standard of the arts is in every man's power, and an easy observation of the most common, sometimes of the meanest things, in nature will give the truest lights, where the greatest sagacity and industry that slights such observation must leave us in the dark, or, what is woise, amuse and mislead us by false lights."

If this should happen to be true—and it certainly commends itself to acceptance—it might portend an immediate danger to the vested interests of criticism, only as that it was written a hundred years ago, and we shall probably have the "sagacity and industry that slights the observation" of nature long enough yet to allow most critics the time to learn some more useful trade than criticism as they pursue it Nevertheless, I am in hopes that the communistic era in aste foreshadowed by Burke is approaching, and that it will occur within the lives of men now overawed by the foolish old superstition that literature and art are anything but the expression of life, and are to be judged by any other test than that of their fidelity to it. The time is coming. I hope, when each new author, each new artist, will be considered, not in his proportion to any other author or artist, but in his relation to the human nature, known to us all, which it is his privilege, his high duty, to interpret "The true standard of the artist is in every man's power" already, as Burke says, Michelangelo's "light of 10 the piazza," the glance of the common eye, is and always was the best light on a statue, Goethe's "boys and blackbirds" have in all ages been the real connoisseurs of berries, but hitherto the mass of common men have been afraid to apply their own simplicity, naturalness, and honesty to the appreciation of the beautiful They have always cast about for the instruction of some one who professed to know better, and who browbeat wholesome commonsense into the self-distrust that ends in sophistication They have fallen generally to the worst of this bad 20 species, and have been "amused and misled" (how pretty that quaint old use of amuse is!) "by the false lights" of critical vanity and self-righteousness. They have been taught to compare what they see and what they read, not with the things that they have observed and known, but with the things that some other artist or writer has done Especially if they have themselves the artistic impulse in any direction they are taught to form themselves, not upon life, but upon the masters who became masters only by forming themselves upon life. The seeds of death are 30 planted in them, and they can produce only the still-born, the academic. They are not told to take their work into the public square and see if it seems true to the chance passer, but to test it by the work of the very men who refused and decried any other test of their own work. The young writer who attempts to report the phrase and carriage of every-day life, who tries to tell just how he has heard men talk and seen them look, is made to feel guilty of something low and unworthy by the stupid people who would like to have him show how Shake-40 speare's men talked and looked, or Scott's, or Thackeray's, or Balzac's, or Hawthorne's, or Dickens's; he is instructed to idealize his personages, that is, to take the life-likeness out of them, and put the book-likeness into them He is approached in the spirit of the wretched pedantry into which learning, much or little, always decays when it withdraws itself and stands apart from experience in an attitude of imagined superiority, and which would say with the same confidence to the scientists: "I see that you are looking at a grasshopper there which you have found in the grass, and I suppose you intend to describe it Now don't waste your time and sin against culture in that way. I've got a grasshopper here, which has been evolved at considerable pains and expense out of the grasshopper in general, in fact, it's a type. It's made up of wire and card-board, very prettily painted in a conventional tint, and it's perfectly indestructible. It isn't very much like a real grasshopper, but it's a great deal nicer, and it's served to represent the notion of a grasshopper ever since man emerged from barbarism You may say that it's artificial Well, it is artificial, but then a it's ideal too, and what you want to do is to cultivate the ideal You'll find the books full of my kind of grasshopper, and scarcely a trace of yours in any of them The thing that you are proposing to do is commonplace, but if you say that it isn't commonplace, for the very reason that it hasn't been done before, you'll have to admit that it's photographic"

As I said, I hope the time is coming when not only the artist, but the common, average man, who always "has the standard of the arts in his power," will have also the courage to apply it, and will reject the ideal grasshopper wherever he finds it, in science, in literature, in art because it is not "simple, natural, and honest," because it is not like a real grasshopper. But I will own that I think the time is yet far off, and that the people who have been brought up on the ideal grasshopper, the heroic grasshopper, the impassioned grasshopper, the selfdevoted, adventureful, good old romantic card-board grasshopper, must die out before the simple, honest, and natural grasshopper can have a fair field I am in no . haste to compass the end of these good people, whom I find in the mean time very amusing. It is delightful to meet one of them, either in print or out of it-some sweet elderly lady or excellent gentleman whose youth was pastured on the literature of thirty or forty years ago -and to witness the confidence with which they preach their favorite authors as all the law and the prophets They have commonly read little or nothing since, or, if they have, they have judged it by a standard taken from these authors, and never dreamed of judging it by nature 9

they are destitute of the documents in the case of the later writers, they suppose that Balzac was the beginning of realism, and that Zola is its wicked end; they are quite ignorant, but they are ready to talk you down, if you differ from them, with an assumption of knowledge suffitient for any occasion. The horror, the resentment, with which they receive any question of their literary saints 15 genuine; you descend at once very far in the moral and social scale, and anything short of offensive personality 13 15 too good for you, it is expressed to you that you are one to be avoided, and put down even a little lower than you have naturally fallen.

These worthy persons are not to blame, it is part of their intellectual mission to represent the petrifaction of taste, and to preserve an image of a smaller and cruder and emptier world than we now live in, a world which was feeling its way towards the simple, the natural, the honest, but was a good deal "amused and misled" by lights now no longer mistakable for heavenly luminaries. # They belong to a time, just passing away, when certain authors were considered authorities in certain kinds, when they must be accepted entire and not questioned in any particular Now we are beginning to see and to say that no author is an authority except in those moments when he held his ear close to Nature's lips and caught her very accent. These moments are not continuous with any authors in the past, and they are rare with all Therefore I am not afraid to say now that the greatest classics are sometimes not at all great, and that we can profit by them only when we hold them, like our meanest contemporaries, to a strict accounting, and verify their work by the standard of the arts which we all have in our power, the simple, the natural, and the honest.

Those good people, those curious and interesting if somewhat musty back-numbers, must always have a hero, an idol of some sort, and it is droll to find Balzac, who suffered from their sort such bitter scorn and hate for his realism while he was alive, now become a fetich in his turn, to be shaken in the faces of those who will not blindly worship him But it is no new thing in the history of literature, whatever is established is sacred with those who do not think. At the beginning of the century, when romance was making the same fight against effete classicism which realism is making to-day against effete romanticism, the Italian poet Monti declared that "the romantic was the cold grave of the Beautiful," just as the realistic is now supposed to be. The romantic of that day and the real of this are in certain degree the same. Romanticism then sought, as realism seeks now, to widen the bounds of sympathy, to level 50 every barrier against æsthetic freedom, to escape from the paralysis of tradition. It exhausted itself in this impulse, and it remained for realism to assert that fidelity to experience and probability of motive are essential conditions of a great imaginative literature. It is not a new theory, but it has never before universally characterized literary endeavor. When realism becomes false to itself, when it heaps up facts merely, and maps life instead of picturing it, realism will perish too. Every true realist instinctively knows this, and it is perhaps the 60 reason why he is careful of every fact, and feels himself bound to express or to indicate its meaning at the risk of over-moralizing. In life he finds nothing insignificant, all tells for destiny and character, nothing that God has made is contemptible He cannot look upon human life and declare this thing or that thing unworthy of notice, any more than the scientist can declare a fact of the material world beneath the dignity of his inquiry He feels in every nerve the equality of things and the unity of men, his soul is exalted, not by vain shows and shad- 70 ows and ideals, but by realities, in which alone the truth lives. In criticism it is his business to break the images of false gods and misshapen heroes, to take away the poor silly toys that many grown people would still like to play with He cannot keep terms with Jack the Giantkiller or Puss in Boots, under any name or in any place, even when they reappear as the convict Vautrec, or the Marquis de Montrivaut, or the Sworn Thirteen Noblemen He must say to himself that Balzac, when he imagined these monsters, was not Balzac, he was Dumas, 80 he was not realistic, he was romantic

Which brings us again, after this long way about, to the divine Jane and her novels She was great and they were beautiful, because she and they were honest, and dealt with nature nearly a hundred years ago as realism deals with it to-day Realism is nothing more and nothing less than the truthful treat nent of material, and

Jane Austen was the first and the last of the English novelists to treat material with entire truthfulness. Because she did this, she remains the most artistic of the English novelists, and alone worthy to be matched with the great Scandinavian and Slavic and Latin artists It is not a question of intellect, or not wholly that The English have mind enough, but they have not taste enough, or, rather, their taste has been perverted by their false criticism, which is based upon personal preference, 10 and not upon principle, which instructs a man to think that what he likes is good, instead of teaching him first to distinguish what is good before he likes it. The art of fiction, as Jane Austen knew it, declined from her through Scott, and Bulwer, and Dickens, and Charlotte Bronte, and Thackeray, and even George Eliot, because the mania of romanticism had seized upon all Europe, and these great writers could not escape the taint of their time, but it has shown few signs of recovery in England, because English criticism, in the presence of the Conti-20 nental masterpieces, has continued provincial and special and personal, and has expressed a love and a hate which had to do with the quality of the artist rather than the character of his work. It was inevitable that in their time the English romanticists should treat, as Señor Valdés says, "the barbarous customs of the Middle Ages, softening and disfiguring them, as Walter Scott and his kind did", that they should "devote themselves to falsifying nature, refining and subtilizing sentiment, and modifying psychology after their own fancy," like Bul-30 wer and Dickens, as well as like Rousseau and Madame de Stael, not to mention Balzac, the worst of all that sort at his worst. This was the natural course of the disease, but it really seems as if it were their criticism that was to blame for the rest not, indeed, for the performance of this writer or that, for criticism can never affect the actual doing of a thing, but for the esteem in which this writer or that is held through the perpetuation of false ideals. The only observer of English middle-class life since Jane Austen worthy to be named 40 with her was not George Eliot, who was first ethical and then artistic, who transcended her in everything but the form and method most essential to art, and there fell hopelessly below her. It was Anthony Trollope who was most like her in simple honesty and instinctive truth, as unphilosophized as the light of common day; but he was so warped from a wholesome ideal as to wish at times to be like the caricaturist Thackeray, and to stand about in his scene, talking it over with his hands in his pockets, interrupting the action, and spoiling the illusion in which alone the truth of art resides. Mainly, his instinct was too much for his ideal, and with a low view of life in its civic relations and a thoroughly bourgeois soul. he yet produced works whose beauty is surpassed only by the effect of a more poetic writer in the novels of Thomas Hardy Yet if a vote of English criticism even at this late day, when all continental Europe has the light of æsthetic truth, could be taken, the majority against these artists would be overwhelmingly in favor of a writer who had so little artistic sensibility, that he never hesitated on any occasion, great or small, to make a forat among his characters, and catch them up to show them to the reader and tell him how beautiful or ugly they were, and cry out over their amazing properties

Doubtless the ideal of those poor islanders will be finally changed. If the truth could become a fad it would be accepted by all their "smart people," but truth is something rather too large for that, and we must await the gradual advance of civilization among them. Then they will see that their criticism has misled them, and that it is to this false guide they owe, not precisely the decline of fiction among them, but its continued debasement as an art

One of the great newspapers the other day invited the prominent American authors to speak their minds upon a point in the theory and practice of fiction which had already vexed some of them It was the question of how much or how little the American novel ought to deal with certain facts of life which are not usually talked of before young people, and especially young ladies Of course the question was not decided, and I forget just how far the balance inclined in favor of a larger freedom in the matter But it certainly inclined that way, one or two writers of the sex which is somehow supposed to have purity in its keeping (as if purity were a thing that did not practically concern the other sex, preoccupied with serious affairs) gave it a rather vigorous tilt to that side In view of this fact it would not be the part of prudence to make an effort to dress the balance, and indeed I do not know that I was going to make any such effort. But there are some things to say, around and about the subject, which I should like to have some one else say, and which I may myself possibly be safe in suggesting

One of the first of these is the fact, generally lost sight of by those who censure the Anglo-Saxon novel for its prudishness, that it is really not such a prude after all, and that if it is sometimes apparently anxious to avoid those experiences of life not spoken of before young people, this may be an appearance only Sometimes a novel which has this shuffling air, this effect of truckling to propriety, might defend itself if it could speak for itself, by saying that such experiences happened not to come within its scheme, and that, so far from maining or mutilating itself in ignoring them, it was all the more tarthfully representative of the tone of modern life in dealing with love that was chaste, and with passion so honest that it could be openly spoken of before the tenderest society bud at dinner. It might say that the guilty intrigue, the betrayal, the extreme flirtation even, was the exceptional thing in life, and unless the scheme of the story necessarily involved it, that it would be bad art to lug it in, and as bad taste as to introduce such topics in a mixed company. It could say very justly that the novel in our civilization now always addresses a mixed company, and that the vast majority of the company are ladies, and that very many, if not most, of these ladies are young girls. If the novel were written for men and for married women alone, as in continental Furope, it might be altogether different. But the simple fact is that it is not written for them alone among us, and it is a question of writing, under cover of our universal acceptance, things for young girls to read which you would be put out-of-doors for saying to them, or frankly giving notice of your intention, and so cutting vourself off from the pleasure-and it is a very high and weet one-of appealing to these vivid, responsive intelligences, which are none the less brilliant and admirable because they are innocent

One day a novelist who liked, after the manner of other men, to repine at his hard fate, complained to his friend, a critic, that he was tired of the restriction he had put upon himself in this regard, for it is a mistake, as can be readily shown, to suppose that others impose it. See how free those French fellows are" he rebelled. Shall we always be shut up to our tradition of decency?"

"Do you think it's much worse than being shut up to their tradition of indecency?" said his friend.

Then that novelist began to reflect, and he remem- 50 bered how sick the invariable motive of the French novel made him. He perceived finally that, convention for convention, ours was not only more tolerable, but on the whole was truer to life, not only to its complexion, but also to its texture. No one will pretend that there is not vicious love beneath the surface of our society, if he did, the fetid explosions of the divorce trials would refute him, but if he pretended that it was in any just sense characteristic of our society, he could be still more easily refuted. Yet it exists, and it is unquestionably the ma- 60 terial of tragedy, the stuff from which intense effects are wrought. The question, after owning this fact, is whether these intense effects are not rather cheap effects. I incline to think they are, and I will try to say why I think so, if I may do so without offence. The material itself, the mere mention of it has an instant fascination, it arrests, it detains, till the last word is said, and while there is anything to be hinted. This is what makes a love intrigue of some sort all but essential to the popularity of any fiction. Without such an intrigue the in- 70 tellectual equipment of the author must be of the highest, and then he will succeed only with the highest class of readers. But any author who will deal with a guilty love intrigue holds all readers in his hand, the highest with the lowest, as long as he hints the slightest hope of the smallest potential naughtiness. He need not at all be a great author, he may be a very shabby wretch, if he has but the courage or the trick of that sort of thing The critics will call him virile" and "passionate", decent people will be ashamed to have been limed by him, but 80 the low average will only ask another chance of flocking into his net. If he happens to be an able writer, his really fine and costly work will be unheeded, and the lure to the appetite will be chiefly remembered. There may be other qualities which make reputations for other men, but in his case they will count for nothing He pays this penalty for his success in that kind, and every one pays some such penalty who deals with some such material It attaches in like manner to the triumphs of the writers who now almost form a school among us, and 90 who may be said to have established themselves in an easy popularity simply by the study of erotic shivers and fervors. They may find their account in the popularity, or they may not, there is no question of the popularity

But I do not mean to imply that their case covers the whole ground So far as it goes, though, it ought to stop the mouths of those who complain that fiction is enslaved to propriety among us It appears that of a certain kind of impropriety it is free to give us all it will, and more But this is not what serious men and women 10 writing fiction mean when they rebel against the limitations of their art in our civilization. They have no desire to deal with nakedness, as painters and sculptors freely do in the worship of beauty, or with certain facts of life, as the stage does, in the service of sensation But they ask why, when the conventions of the plastic and histrionic arts liberate their followers to the portrayal of almost any phase of the physical or of the emotional nature, an American novelist may not write a story on the lines of Anna Karemna or Madame Bovary Sapho 20 they put aside, and from Zola's work they avert their eyes They do not condemn him or Daudet, necessarily, or accuse their motives, they leave them out of the question, they do not want to do that kind of thing But they do sometimes wish to do another kind, to touch one of the most serious and sorrowful problems of life in the spirit of Tolstoi and Flaubert, and they ask why they may not At one time, they remind us, the Anglo-Saxon novelist did deal with such problems-De Foe in his spirit, Richardson in his, Goldsmith in his. At what 30 moment did our fiction lose this privilege? In what fatal hour did the Young Girl arise and seal the lips of Fiction, with a touch of her finger, to some of the most vital interests of life?

Whether I wished to oppose them in their aspiration for greater freedom, or whether I wished to encourage them, I should begin to answer them by saying that the Young Girl had never done anything of the kind. The manners of the novel have been improving with those of its readers, that is all Gentlemen no longer swear or fall drunk under the table, or abduct young ladies and shut them in lonely country-houses, or so habitually set about the ruin of their neighbors' wives, as they once did Generally, people now call a spade an agricultural implement, they have not grown decent without having also grown a little squeamish, but they have grown comparatively decent, there is no doubt about that. They require of a novelist whom they respect unquestionable proof of his seriousness, if he proposes to deal with certain phases of life, they require a sort of scientific decorum. He can no longer expect to be s received on the ground of entertainment only, he assumes a higher function, something like that of a physician or a priest, and they expect him to be bound by laws as sacred as those of such professions, they hold him solemnly pledged not to betray them or abuse their confidence If he will accept the conditions, they give him their confidence, and he may then treat to his greater honor, and not at all to his disadvantage, of such experiences, such relations of men and women as George Eliot treats in Adam Bede, in Daniel Deronda, in Romola in almost all her books, such as Hawthorne treats in the Scarlet Letter; such as Dickens treats in David Copperfield, such as Thackeray treats in Pendennis. and glances at in every one of his fictions, such as most of the masters of English fiction have at some time treated more or less openly. It is quite false or quite mistaken to suppose that our novels have left untouched these most important realities of life. They have not only made them their stock in trade, they have kept a true perspective in regard to them, they have relegated them in their pictures of life to the space and place they occupy in life itself, as we know it in England and America They have kept a correct proportion, knowing perfectly well that unless the novel is to be a map, with everything scrupulously laid down in it, a faithful record of life in tar the greater extent could be made to the exclusion of guilty love and all its circumstances and consequences

I justify them in this view not only because I hate what is cheap and meretricious, and hold in peculiar loathing the cant of the critics who require 'passion' as something in itself admirable and desirable in a novel, but because I prize fidelity in the historian of feeling and character. Most of these critics who demand "passion" would seem to have no conception of any passion but one. Yet there are several other passions the passion of grief, the passion of avarice, the passion of pity, the passion of ambition, the passion of hate, the passion of envy, the passion of devotion, the passion of friendship; and all these have a greater part in the drama of life than the passion of love, and infinitely greater than the passion of guilty love. Wittingly or unwittingly, English fiction and American fiction have recognized this truth, not fully, not in the measure it merits, but in greater degree than most other fictions.

A Hazard of New Fortunes

A Hazard of New Fortunes begins with the difficult decision of the Marches (especially difficult for Mrs March, who is a native Bostonian) to move from Boston to New York, where Mr March, who in many ways resembles Howells himself, is to edit the magazine Every Orher Week. Howells' delicate realism is exhibited at its best in the scene in which Mr. and Mrs March face this turning point in their lives. The later scenes, in which the Marches look for living quarters in New York, show both the niceties of Howells' realism and his expanding social consciousness

PART FIRST

Chapter 1

Now, you think this thing over, March, and let me know the last of next week," said Fulkerson. He got up from the chair which he had been sitting astride, with his face to its back, and tilting toward March on its hind-legs, and came and rapped upon his table with his thin bamboo stick. "What you want to do is to get out of the insurance business, anyway. You acknowledge that yourself. You never liked it, and now it makes you sick, in other words, it's killing you. You ain't an insurance man by nature. You're a natural-born literary man, and you've been going against the grain. Now, I offer you a chance to go with the grain. I don't say you're going to make your everlasting fortune, but I'll give you a living salary, and if the thing succeeds you'll share in its success. We'll all share in its success. That's the beauty of it. I tell you, March, this is the greatest idea that has been struck since——" Fulkerson stopped and searched his mind for a fit image—"since the creation of man."

He put his leg up over the corner of March's table 20 and gave himself a sharp cut on the thigh, and leaned forward to get the full effect of his words upon his listener.

March had his hands clasped together behind his head, and he took one of them down long enough to put his inkstand and mucilage-bottle out of Fulkerson's way After many years' experiment of a moustache and whiskers, he now wore his grizzled beard full, but cropped close, it gave him a certain grimness, corrected by the gentleness of his eyes.

"Some people don't think much of the creation of man, nowadays Why stop at that? Why not say since the morning stars sang together?"

"No, sir, no, sir! I don't want to claim too much, and I draw the line at the creation of man I'm satisfied with that. But if you want to ring the morning stars into the prospectus, all right, I won't go back on you"

"But I don't understand why you've set your mind on me," March said "I haven't had any magazine experience, you know that; and I haven't seriously attempted 40 to do anything in literature since I was married. I gave up smoking and the Muse together I suppose I could still manage a cigar, but I don't believe I could——"

"Muse worth a cent." Fulkerson took the thought out of his mouth and put it into his own words. "I know. V?ell, I don't want you to. I don't care if you never write a line for the thing, though you needn't reject anything of yours, if it happens to be good, on that account And I don't want much experience in my editor, rather not have it. You told me, didn't you, that you used to do some newspaper work before you settled down?"

³³ morning . . . logether. See Job 38.7 "When the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy" $\,$

"Yes, I thought my lines were permanently cast in those places once. It was more an accident than anything else that I got into the insurance business. I suppose I secretly hoped that if I made my living by something utterly different, I could come more freshly to literature proper in my leisure."

"I see, and you found the insurance business too many for you Well, anyway, you've always had a hankering for the inkpots, and the fact that you first gave me the idea of this thing shows that you've done more or less thinking about magazines."

"Yes-less"

"Well, all right. Now don't you be troubled. I know 20 what I want, generally speaking, and in this particular instance I want you I might get a man of more experience, but I should probably get a man of more prejudice and self-concert along with him, and a man with a following of the literary hangers-on that are sure to get round an editor sooner or later. I want to start fair; and I've found out in the syndicate business all the men that are worth having. But they know me, and they don't know you, and that's where we shall have the pull on them. They won't be able to work the thing. 30 Don't you be anxious about the experience. I've got experience enough of my own to run a dozen editors What I want is an editor who has taste, and you've got it, and conscience, and you've got it, and horse-sense, and you've got that And I like you because you're a Western man, and 1 m another. I do cotton to a Western man when I find him off East here, holding his own with the best of 'em, and showing 'em that he's just as much civilised as they are. We both know what it is to have our bright home in the setting sun, heigh?"

"I think we Western men who've come East are apt to take ourselves a little too objectively, and to feel ourselves rather more representative than we need," March remarked.

Fulkerson was delighted "You've hit it! We do! We are!"

"And as for holding my own, I'm not very proud of what I've done in that way; it's been very little to hold But I know what you mean, Fulkerson, and I've felt the same thing myself, it warmed me toward you when we first met. I can't help suffusing a little to any s man when I hear that he was born on the other side of the Alleghanies It's perfectly stupid I despise the same thing when I see it in Boston people."

Fulkerson pulled first one of his blond whiskers and then the other, and twisted the end of each into a point which he left to untwine itself. He fixed March with his little eyes, which had a curious innocence in their cunning, and tapped the desk immediately in front of him. "What I like about you is that you're broad in your sympathies The first time I saw you, that night on the Quebec boat, I said to myself, 'There's a man I want to know There's a human being' I was a little afraid of Mrs March and the children, but I felt at home with you-thoroughly domesticated-before I passed a word with you; and when you spoke first, and opened up with a joke over that fellow's tableful of light literature and Indian moccasins and birch-bark toy canoes and stereoscopic views, I knew that we were brothers-spiritual twins I recognised the Western style of fun, and I thought, when you said you were from Boston, that it was some of the same But I see now that it's being a cold fact, as far as the last fifteen or twenty years count, is just so much gain. You know both sections, and you can make this thing go, from ocean to ocean"

"We might ring that into the prospectus, too." March suggested, with a smile "You might call the thing From Sea to Sea By the way, what are you going to call it?

"I haven't decided yet, that's one of the things I wanted to talk with you about. I had thought of The Syndicate, but it sounds kind of dry, and it don't seem to cover the ground exactly. I should like something that would express the co-operative character of the thing but I don't know as I can get it."

"Might call it The Mutual."

"They'd think it was an insurance paper No, that won't do But Mutual comes pretty near the idea If we could get something like that, it would pique curiosity and then if we could get paragraphs afloat explaining that the contributors were to be paid according to the sales, it would be a first rate ad."

⁷ lines places Compare Psalms 166 "The lines are faller unto me in pleasant places, yea, I have a goodly heritage" • 35 cotton to, readily make friends with

He bent a wide, anxious, inquiring smile upon March, who suggested lazity. "You might call it The Round-Robin. That would express the central idea of irresponsibility As I understand, everybody is to share the profits ind be exempt from the losses Or, if 1m wrong, and the reverse is true, you might call it The Army of Martyri. Come, that sounds attractive, Fulkerson! Or what do you think of The Fifth Wheel. That would forestall the criticism that there are too many literary periodicals already. Or, if you want to put forward the idea of complete independence, you could call it The Iree Lance: or—"

"Or The Hog on Ice—either stand up or fall down, you know," Fulkerson broke in coarsely "But we'll leave the name of the magazine till we get the editor. I see the poison's beginning to work in you, March; z and if I had time, I d leave the result to time But I haven t I've got to know inside of the next week To come down to business with you, March, I shan't start this thing unless I can get you to take hold of it."

He seemed to expect some acknowledgment, and March said, "Well, that's very nice of you, Fulkerson"

"No, sir, no, sir! I've always liked you, and wanted you, ever since we met that first night. I had this thing inchoately in my mind then, when I was telling you about the newspaper syndicate business—beautiful vision of a lot of literary fellows breaking loose from the bondage of publishers, and playing it alone—"

You might call it The Lone Hand, that would be attractive," March interrupted "The whole West would know what you meant"

Fulkerson was talking seriously, and March was listening seriously, but they both broke off and laughed. Fulkerson got down off the table, and made some turns about the room. It was growing late, the October sun had left the top of the tall windows, it was still clear day, but it would soon be twilight, they had been talking a long time. Fulkerson came and stood with his little feet, wide apart, and bent his little lean, square face on March. "See here! How much do you get out of this thing here, anyway?"

"The insurance business?" March hesitated a moment, and then said, with a certain effort of reserve, 'At present about three thousand." He looked up at Fulkerson with a glance, as if he had a mind to enlarge upon the fact, and then dropped his eyes without saying more

Whether Fulkerson had not thought it so much or 50 not, he said, "Well, I'll give you thirty-five hundred Come" And your chances in the success

"We won't count the chances in the success And I don't believe thirty-five hundred would go any further in New York than three thousand in Boston."

"But you don't live on three thousand here?"

"No, my wife has a little property"

"Well, she won't lose the income if you go to New York I suppose you pay six or seven hundred a year for your house here. You can get plenty of flats in New 50 York for the same money, and I understand you can get all sorts of provisions for less than you pay now—three or four cents on the pound. Come!"

This was by no means the first talk they had had about the matter, every three or four months during the past two years the syndicate man had dropped in upon March to air the scheme and to get his impressions of it. This had happened so often that it had come to be a sort of joke between them. But now Fulkerson clearly meant business, and March had a struggle to 70 maintain himself in a firm poise of refusal.

"I dare say it wouldn't—or it needn't—cost so very much more, but I don't want to go to New York, or my wife doesn't It's the same thing"

'A good deal samer," Fulkerson admitted

March did not quite like his candour, and he went on with dignity "It's very natural she shouldn't. She has always lived in Boston, she's attached to the place Now, if you were going to start The Fifth Wheel in Boston—"

Fulkerson slowly and sadly shook his head, but decidedly 'Wouldn't do You might as well say St Louis or Cincinnati There's only one city that belongs to the whole country, and that's New York '

'Yes, I know," sighed March, "and Boston belongs to the Bostonians, but they like you to make yourself at home while you're visiting"

"If you'll agree to make phrases like that, right along, and get them into The Round-Robin somehow, I'll say four thousand," said Fulkerson "You think it over now, 90 March You talk it over with Mrs March, I know you will, anyway, and I might as well make a virtue of advising you to do it. Tell her I advised you to do it, and you let me know before next Saturday what you've decided."

March shut down the rolling top of his desk in the corner of the room, and walked Fulkerson out before him. It was so late that the last of the chore-women who washed down the marble halls and stairs of the great building had wrung out her floor-cloth and departed, leaving spotless stone and a clean damp smell in the to darkening corridors behind her.

"Couldn't offer you such swell quarters in New York, March," Fulkerson said as he went tack-tacking down the steps with his small boot-heels. "But I've got my eye on a little house round in West Eleventh Street, that I'm going to fit up for my bachelor's hall in the third story, and adapt for The Lone Hand in the first and second, if this thing goes through; and I guess we'll be pretty comfortable. It's right on the Sand Strip—no malaria of any kind"

"I don't know that I'm going to share its salubrity with you yet," March sighed in an obvious travail which gave Fulkerson hopes

"Oh yes, you are," he coaxed. "Now, you talk it over with your wife. You give her a fair, unprejudiced chance at the thing on its merits, and I'm very much mistaken in Mrs. March if she doesn't tell you to go in and win We're bound to win!"

They stood on the outside steps of the vast edifice beetling like a granite crag above them, with the stone groups of an allegory of life-insurance fore-shortened in the bas-relief overhead. March absently lifted his eyes to it. It was suddenly strange after so many years' familiarity, and so was the well-known street in its Saturday-evening solitude. He asked himself, with prophetic homesickness, if it were an omen of what was to be. But he only said musingly, "A fortnightly You know that didn't work in England. The Fortnightly is published once a month now."

"It works in France," Fulkerson retorted. "The Revne

o des Deux Monder is still published twice a month.

I guess we can make it work in America—with illustrations."

"Going to have illustrations?"

"My dear boy! What are you giving me? Do I look like the sort of lunatic who would start a thing in the twilight of the nineteenth century without illustrations? Come off!"

"Ah, that complicates it! I don't know anything about art." March's look of discouragement confessed the hold the scheme had taken upon him.

"I don't want you to!" Fulkerson retorted. "Don't you suppose I shall have an art man?"

"And will they—the artists—work at a reduced rate too. like the writers, with the hopes of a share in the success?"

"Of course they will' And if I want any particular man, for a card, I'll pay him big money besides But I can get plenty of first-rate sketches on my own terms You'll see! They'll pour in!"

"Look here, Fulkerson," said March, "you'd better & call this fortnightly of yours The Madness of the Half-Moon, or Bedlam Broke Loose wouldn't be bad! Why do you throw away all your hard earnings on such a crazy venture? Don't do it'" The kindness which March had always felt, in spite of his wife's first misgivings and reservations, for the merry, hopeful, slangy, energetic little creature trembled in his voice. They had both formed a friendship for Fulkerson during the week they were together in Quebec When he was not working the newspapers there, he went about with them over the familiar ground they were showing their children, and was simply grateful for the chance, as well as very en tertaining about it all The children liked him, too, when they got the clew to his intention, and found that he was not quite serious in many of the things he said, they thought he was great fun. They were always glad when their father brought him home on the occasion of Fulkerson's visits to Boston, and Mrs March, though of a charier hospitality, welcomed Fulkerson with a grateful sense of his admiration for her husband. He had a way of treating March with deference, as an older and abler man, and of qualifying the freedom he used toward every one with an implication that March tolerated it voluntarily, which she thought very sweet, and even

"Ah, now you're talking like a man and a brother said Fulkerson "Why, March, old man, do you suppose I'd come on here and try to talk you into this thing if I wasn't morally, if I wasn't perfectly, sure of success? There isn't any if or and about it. I know my ground every inch; and I don't stand alone on it," he added

⁵⁷ for a card, that is, to play a winning cord with a significance which did not escape March. "When you've made up your mind, I can give you the proof; but I'm not at liberty now to say anything more. I tell you it's going to be a triumphal march from the word go, with coffee and lemonade for the procession along the whole line. All you've got to do is to fall in." He stretched out his hand to March. "You let me know as soon as you can."

March deferred taking his hand till he could ask, 12 Where are you going?"

Parker House. Take the half-past ten for New York to-night."

"I thought I might walk your way." March looked at his watch "But I shouldn't have time Good-bye!"

He now let Fulkerson have his hand, and they exchanged a cordial pressure Fulkerson started off at a quick, light pace. Half a block away he stopped, turned round, and seeing March still standing where he had left him, he called back joyously, "I've got the name!"

"What?"

Every Other Week."

"It ısn't bad."

"Ta-ta!"

Chapter II

All the way up to the South End March prolonged his talk with Fulkerson, and at his door in Nankeen Square he closed the parley with a plump refusal to go to New York on any terms His daughter Bella was lying in wait for him in the hall, and she threw her arms round his neck with the exuberance of her fourteen years, and 30 with something of the histrionic intention of her sex. He pressed on, with her clinging about him, to the library, and, in the glow of his decision against Fulkerson, kissed his wife, where she sat by the study lamp reading the Transcript through her first pair of eyeglasses it was agreed in the family that she looked distinguished in them, or at any rate cultivated. She took them off to give him a glance of question, and their son Tom looked up from his book for a moment; he was in his last year at the high-school, and was prepar-43 ing for Harvard.

"I didn't get away from the office till half-past five," March explained to his wife's glance, "and then I walked. I suppose dinner's waiting. I'm sorry, but I won't do it any more."

At table he tried to be gay with Bella, who babbled at him with a voluble pertness, which her brother had often advised her parents to check in her, unless they wanted her to be universally despised.

"Papa," she shouted, at last, "you're not listening!"

As soon as possible his wife told the children they so might be excused Then she asked, "What 15 It, Basil?"

"What is what?" he retorted, with a specious brightness that did not avail.

"What is on your mind?"

"How do you know there's anything?"

"Your kissing me so when you came in, for one thing "

"Don't I always kiss you when I come in?

"Not now. I suppose it isn't necessary any more. Cela va sans basser"

"Yes, I guess it's so, we get along without the sym- 60 bolism now" He stopped, but she knew that he had not finished.

"Is it about your business? Have they done anything more?"

"No, I'm still in the dark I don't know whether they mean to supplant me, or whether they ever did But I wasn't thinking about that. Fulkerson has been to see me again."

"Fulkerson?" She brightened at the name, and March smiled too. "Why didn't you bring him to dinner?"

"I wanted to talk with you Then you do like him?" "What has that got to do with it, Basil?"

"Nothing! nothing! That is, he was boring away about that scheme of his again. He's got it into definite shape at last."

"What shape?"

March outlined it for her, and his wife seized its main features with the intuitive sense of affairs which makes women such good business-men, when they will let it.

"It sounds perfectly crazy," she said finally. "But it so mayn't be. The only thing I didn't like about Mr Fulkerson was his always wanting to chance things But what have you got to do with it?"

"What have I got to do with it?" March toyed with the delay the question gave him, then he said, with a sort of deprecatory laugh, "It seems that Fulkerson has had his eye on me ever since we met that night on the Quebec boat I opened up pretty freely to him, as you do to a man you never expect to see again, and when I found he was in that newspaper syndicate business, I told him about my early literary ambitions—"

³⁴ Transcript. The Boston Evening Transcript, discontinued in 1941, was for many years the favorite newspaper of the more cultivated in Boston • 59 Cela . . . baiser, it goes without kissing (on the analogy of "cela va sans dire, it goes without saying)

"You can't say that I ever discouraged them, Basil," his wife put in "I should have been willing, any time, to give up everything for them"

"Well, he says that I first suggested this brilliant idea to him Perhaps I did, I don't remember. When he told me about his supplying literature to newspapers for simultaneous publication, he says I asked, "Why not apply the principle of co-operation to a magazine, and run it in the interest of the contributors?" and that set him to thinking, and he thought out his plan of a periodical, which should pay authors and artists a low price outright for their work, and give them a chance of the profits in the way of a percentage. After all, it isn't so very different from the chances an author takes when he publishes a book. And Fulkerson thinks that the novelty of the thing would pique public cuitosity, if it didn't arouse public sympathy. And the long and short of it is, Isabel, that he wants me to help edit it."

"To edit it?" His wife caught her breath, and she took a little time to realise the fact, while she stared hard at her husband to make sure he was not joking

"Yes He says he owes it all to me, that I invented the idea—the germ—the microbe."

His wife had now realised the fact, at least in a degree that excluded trifling with it "That is very honourable of Mr Fulkerson, and if he owes it to you, it was the least he could do" Having recognised her husband's claim to the honour done him, she began to kindle with a sense of the honour itself, and the value of the opportunity. "It's a very high compliment to you, Basil, a very high compliment. And you could give up this wretched insurance business that you've always hated so, and that's making you so unhappy now that 40 you think they're going to take it from you. Give it up, and take Mr Fulkerson's offer! It's a perfect interposition, coming just at this time! Why, do it! Mercy!" she suddenly arrested herself, "he wouldn't expect you to get along on the possible profits?" Her face expressed the awfulness of the notion

March smiled reassuringly, and waited to give himself the pleasure of the sensation he meant to give her.

"If I'll make striking phrases for it and edit it too, he'll give me four thousand dollars."

He leaned back in his chair, and stuck his hands deep into his pockets, and watched his wife's face, luminous with the emotions that flashed through her mind—doubt, joy, anxiety.

"Basil' You don't mean it! Why, take it! Take it tinstantly! Oh, what a thing to happen! Oh, what luck! But you deserve it, if you first suggested it. What an escape, what a triumph over all those hateful insurance people! O Basil, I'm afraid he'll change his mind! You ought to have accepted on the spot You might have known I would approve, and you could so easily have taken it back if I didn't Telegraph him now! Run right out with the despatch! Or we can send Tom!"

In these imperatives of Mrs March's there was always much of the conditional She meant that he should do what she said, if it were entirely right, and she never meant to be considered as having urged him

"And suppose his enterprise went wrong?" her husband suggested

"It won't go wrong Hasn't he made a success of his syndicate?"

"He says so-yes"

"Very well, then, it stands to reason that he'll succeed in this, too He wouldn't undertake it if he didn't know it would succeed, he must have capital"

"It will take a great deal to get such a thing going, and even if he's got an Angel behind him----"

She caught at the word "An Angel?"

"It's what the theatrical people call a financial backer He dropped a hint of something of that kind"

"Of course, he's got an Angel," said his wife, promptly adopting the word "And even if he hadn't, still, Basil I should be willing to have you risk it. The risk isn't so great, is it? We shouldn't be ruined if it failed altogether. With our stocks we have two thousand a year, anyway, and we could pinch through on that till you got into some other business afterward, especially if we'd saved something out of your salary while it lasted. Basil, I want you to try it! I know it will give you a new lease of life to have a congenial occupation." March laughed, but his wife persisted. "I'm all for your trying it, Basil, indeed I am. If it's an experiment, you can give it up."

"It can give me up, too."

'Oh, nonsense! I guess there's not much fear of that. Now, I want you to telegraph Mr Fulkerson, so that he'll find the despatch waiting for him when he gets to New York I'll take the whole responsibility, Basil, and I'll risk all the consequences."

Chapter III

March's face had sobered more and more as she followed one hopeful burst with another, and now it expressed a positive pain. But he forced a smile, and said "There's a little condition attached. Where did to you suppose it was to be published?"

"Why, in Boston, of course Where else should it be published?"

She looked at him for the intention of his question so searchingly that he quite gave up the attempt to be gay about it "No," he said gravely, "it's to be published in New York"

She fell back in her chair "In New York?" She leaned forward over the table toward him, as if to make sure that she heard aright, and said, with all the keen reproach that he could have expected, "In New York Basil' Oh, how could you have let me go on?"

He had a sufficiently rueful face in owning, "I oughtn't to have done it, but I got started wrong I couldn't help putting the best foot forward at first—or as long as the whole thing was in the air I didn't know that you would take so much to the general enterprise, or else I should have mentioned the New York condition at once, but of course that puts an end to it"

"Oh, of course," she assented sadly "We couldn't go to New York"

"No, I know that," he said, and with this a perverse desire to tempt her to the impossibility awoke in him, though he was really quite cold about the affair himself now "Fulkerson thought we could get a nice flat in New York for about what the interest and taxes came to here, and provisions are cheaper. But I should rather not experiment at my time of life. If I could have been caught younger, I might have been inured to New York, but I don't believe I could stand it now."

"How I hate to have you talk that way, Basil! You are young enough to try anything—anywhere, but you know I don't like New York. I don't approve of it It's so big, and so hideous! Of course I shouldn't mind that; but I've always lived in Boston, and the children were born and have all their friendships and associations here." She added, with helplessness that discredited her good-sense and did her injustice, "I have just got them both into the Friday afternoon class at Papanti's, and you know how difficult that is."

March could not fail to take advantage of an occasion like this "Well, that alone ought to settle it. Under the circumstances it would be flying in the face of Providence to leave Boston. The mere fact of a brilliant opening like that offered me on The Microbe, and the halcyon future which Fulkerson promises if we'll come to New York, is as dust in the balance against the advantages of the Friday afternoon class."

"Basil," she appealed solemnly, "have I ever interfered with your career?"

"I never had any for you to interfere with, my dear."
"Basil" Haven't I always had faith in you? And don't you suppose that if I thought it would really be for your advancement, I would go to New York or anywhere with you?"

"No, my dear, I don't," he teased "If it would be for my salvation, yes, perhaps, but not short of that, and I should have to prove by a cloud of witnesses that it would I don't blame you I wasn't born in Boston, but I understand how you feel And really, my dear," he added, without irony, "I never seriously thought of asking you to go to New York I was dazzled by Fulkerson's offer, I'll own that, but his choice of me as editor sapped my confidence in him"

"I don't like to hear you say that, Basil," she entreated "Well, of course there were mitigating circumstances I could see that Fulkerson meant to keep the whip-hand himself, and that was reassuring. And besides, if the Reciprocity Life should happen not to want my services any longer, it wouldn't be quite like giving up a accertainty, though, as a matter of business, I let Fulkerson get that impression; I felt rather sneaking to do it. But, if the worst comes to the worst, I can look about for something to do in Boston, and anyhow, people don't starve on two thousand a year, though it's convenient to have five. The fact is, I'm too old to change so radically. If you don't like my saying that, then you are, Isabel, and so are the children. I've no right to take them from the home we've made, and to change the whole course of their lives, unless I can assure them of something, and I can't assure them of anything. Boston is big enough for us, and it's certainly prettier than New York. I always feel a little proud of hailing from Boston; my pleasure in the place mounts the further I get away from 10 It But I do appreciate it, my dear, I've no more desire to leave it than you have You may be sure that if you don't want to take the children out of the Friday afternoon class, I don't want to leave my library here, and all the ways I've got set in. We'll keep on. Very likely the company won't supplant me, and if it does, and Watkins gets the place, he'll give me a subordinate position of some sort Cheer up, Isabel! I have put Satan and his angel, Fulkerson, behind me, and it's all right Let's go in to the children"

He came round the table to Isabel, where she sat in a growing distraction, and lifted her by the waist from her chair.

She sighed deeply. "Shall we tell the children about it?"

"No What's the use, now?"

"There wouldn't be any," she assented When they entered the family room, where the boy and girl sat on either side of the lamp working out the lessons for Monday which they had left over from the day before, she asked, "Children, how would you like to live in New York?"

Bella made haste to get in her word first "And give up the Friday afternoon class?" she wailed.

Tom growled from his book, without lifting his eyes, "I shouldn't want to go to Columbia They haven't got any dormitories, and you have to board round anywhere Are you going to New York?" He now deigned to look up at his father

"No, Tom You and Bella have decided me against it.
40 Your perspective shows the affair in its true proportions.
I had an offer to go to New York, but I've refused it...."

[After a prolonged consideration, the Marches decide to accept Fulkerson's offer and move to New York Renouncing her initial objection, Mrs March insists that she has always wanted her husband to try his hand at literature. The final decision is hastened by the almost certain prospect of March's being transferred to a less desirable position in the insurance company When the following chapter opens, the Marches have for some time been looking for a house or apartment in New York without much success]

Chapter IX

Their house-hunting no longer had novelty, but it still had interest; and they varied their day by taking a coupé. by renouncing advertisements, and by reverting to agents Some of these induced them to consider the idea of furnished houses; and Mrs. March learned tolerance for Fulkerson by accepting permits to visit flats and houses which had none of the qualifications she desired in either and were as far beyond her means as they were out of the region to which she had geographically restricted herself. They looked at three-thousand and four-thousand dollar apartments, and rejected them for one reason or another which had nothing to do with the rent, the higher the rent was, the more critical they were of the slippery inlaid floors and the arrangement of the richly decorated rooms They never knew whether they had deceived the janitor or not; as they came in a coupé. they hoped they had.

They drove accidentally through one street that seemed gayer in the perspective than an L road The fire-escapes o with their light iron balconies and ladders of iron, decorated the lofty house fronts, the roadway and sidewalks and door-steps swarmed with children, women's heads seemed to show at every window. In the basements. over which flights of high stone steps led to the tenements, were green-grocers' shops abounding in cabbages and provision stores running chiefly to bacon and sausages, and cobblers' and tinners' shops, and the like, in proportion to the small needs of a poor neighbourhood Ash barrels lined the sidewalks, and garbage heaps filled 7 the gutters, teams of all trades stood idly about, a peddler of cheap fruit urged his cart through the street, and mixed his cry with the joyous screams and shouts of the children and the scolding and gossiping voices of the women, the burly blue bulk of a policeman defined itself at the corner; a drunkard zigzagged down the sidewalk toward him. It was not the abode of the extremest poverty, but of a poverty as hopeless as any in the world. ransmitting itself from generation to generation, and establishing conditions of permanency to which human lite adjusts itself as it does to those of some incurable disease, like leprosy

The time had been when the Marches would have taken a purely æsthetic view of the facts as they glimpsed them in this street of tenement-houses, when they would have contented themselves with saying that it was as picturesque as a street in Naples or Florence, and with wondering why nobody came to paint it, they would have thought they were sufficiently serious about it in blaming the artists for their failure to appreciate it, and going abroad for the picturesque when they had it here under their noses. It was to the nose that the street made one of its strongest appeals, and Mrs. March pulled up her window of the coupé. "Why does he take us through such a disgusting street?" she demanded, with an exasperation of which her husband divined the origin.

This driver may be a philanthropist in disguise," he answered, with dreamy irony, "and may want us to think about the people who are not merely carried through this street in a coupé, but have to spend their whole lives in it, winter and summer, with no hopes of driving out of it, except in a hearse I must say they don't seem to rand it I haven't seen a jollier crowd anywhere in New York They seem to have forgotten death a little more completely than any of their fellow-citizens, Isabel And I wonder what they think of us, making this gorgeous progress through their midst. I suppose they think we're rich, and hate us-if they hate rich people, they don't look as if they hated anybody Should we be as patient is they are with their discomfort? I don't believe there's steam-heat or an elevator in the whole block Seven rooms and a bath would be more than the largest and genteelest family would know what to do with They wouldn't know what to do with the bath anyway"

His monologue seemed to interest his wife apart from the satirical point it had for themselves "You ought to get Mr Fulkerson to let you work some of these New York sights up for Every Other Week, Basil, you could do them very nicely."

Yes, I've thought of that. But don't let's leave the Personal ground. Doesn't it make you feel rather small and otherwise unworthy when you see the kind of street these fellow-beings of yours live in, and then think how particular you are about locality and the number of bell 50 pulls? I don't see even ratchets and speaking-tubes at these doors." He craned his neck out of the window for a better look, and the children of discomfort cheered him, out of sheer good feeling and high spirits. "I didn't know I was so popular. Perhaps it's a recognition of my humane sentiments."

"Oh, it's very easy to have humane sentiments, and to satirise ourselves for wanting eight rooms and a bath in a good neighbourhood, when we see how these wretched creatures live," said his wife "But if we shared all we so have with them, and then settled down among them, what good would it do?"

"Not the least in the world. It might help us for the moment, but it wouldn't keep the wolf from their doors for a week, and then they would go on just as before, only they wouldn't be on such good terms with the wolf. The only way for them is to keep up an unbroken intimacy with the wolf, then they can manage him somehow. I don't know how, and I'm afraid I don't want to Wouldn't you like to have this fellow drive us round among the halls of pride somewhere for a little while? Fifth Avenue or Madison, up-town?"

"No, we've no time to waste. I've got a place near Third Avenue, on a nice cross street, and I want him to take us there." It proved that she had several addresses near together, and it seemed best to dismiss their coupé and do the rest of their afternoon's work on foot. It came to nothing, she was not humbled in the least by what she had seen in the tenement-house street, she yielded no point in her ideal of a flat, and the flats persistently refused to lend themselves to it. She lost all patience with them

"Oh, I don't say the flats are in the right of it," said her husband, when she denounced their stupid inadequacy to the purposes of a Christian home "But I'm not so sure that we are either. I've been thinking about that home business ever since my sensibilities were dragged—in a coupé—through that tenement-house street. Of course no child born and brought up in such a place as that could have any conception of home. But that's because those poor people can't give character to their habitations They have to take what they can get. But people like us-that is, of our means-do give character to the average flat It's made to meet their tastes, or their supposed tastes, and so it's made for social show, not for family life at all Think of a baby in a flat! It's a contradiction in terms, the flat is the negation of motherhood The flat means society life, that is, the pretence of social life. It's made to give artificial people a society basis on a little money—too much money, of course, 10 for what they get So the cost of the building is put into marble halls and idiotic decoration of all kinds I don't object to the conveniences, but none of these flats have a living-room. They have drawing-rooms to foster social pretence, and they have dining-rooms and bedrooms, but they have no room where the family can all come together and feel the sweetness of being a family The bedrooms are black-holes mostly, with a sinful waste of space in each. If it were not for the marble halls, and the decorations, and the foolishly 20 expensive finish, the houses could be built round a court, and the flats could be shaped something like a Pompenan house, with small sleeping closets-only lit from the outside-and the rest of the floor thrown into two or three large cheerful halls, where all the family life could go on, and society could be transacted unpretentiously Why, those tenements are better and humaner than those flats! There the whole family lives in the kitchen, and has its consciousness of being, but the flat abolishes the family consciousness. It's confinement 30 without coziness, it's cluttered without being snug. You couldn't keep a self-respecting cat in a flat, you couldn't go down cellar to get cider. No the Anglo-Saxon home, as we know it in the Anglo-Saxon house, is simply impossible in the Franco-American flat, not because it's humble, but because it's false."

"We'll, then," said Mrs. March, "let's look at houses"

He had been denouncing the flat in the abstract, and he had not expected this concrete result. But he said,
"We will look at houses, then."

Chapter X

Nothing mystifies a man more than a woman's aberrations from some point at which he supposes her fixed as a star. In these unfurnished houses, without steam or elevator, March followed his wife about with patient wonder. She rather liked the worst of them best; but she made him go down into the cellars and look at the furnaces, she exacted from him a rigid inquest of the plumbing. She followed him into one of the cellars by the fitful glare of successively lighted matches, and they enjoyed a moment in which the anomaly of their presence there on that errand, so remote from all the facts of their long-established life in Boston, realised itself for them.

"Think how easily we might have been murdered and nobody been any the wiser!" she said when they were comfortably out-doors again

"Yes, or made way with ourselves in an access of emotional insanity, supposed to have been induced by unavailing flat-hunting," he suggested

She fell in with the notion "I'm beginning to feel crazy But I don't want you to lose your head, Basil And I don't want you to sentimentalise any of the things you see in New York I think you were disposed to do it in that street we drove through I don't believe there's any real suffering—not real suffering—among those people, that is, it would be suffering from our point of view, but they've been used to it all their lives, and they don't feel their discomfort so much"

"Of course I understand that, and I don't propose to sentimentalise them. I think when people get used to a bad state of things they had better stick to it, in fact they don't usually like a better state so well, and I shall keep that firmly in mind."

She laughed with him, and they walked along the L-bestridden avenue, exhilarated by their escape from murder and suicide in that cellar, toward the nearest cross-town track, which they meant to take home to their hotel "Now to-night we will go to the theatre," she said, "and get this whole house business out of our minds, and be perfectly fresh for a new start in the morning" Suddenly she clutched his arm "Why, did you see that man?" and she signed with her head toward a decently dressed person who walked beside them, next to the gutter, stooping over as if to examine it, and half halting at times

"No What?"

"Why, I saw him pick up a dirty bit of cracker from the pavement and cram it into his mouth and eat it down as if he were famished And look! he's actually hunting for more in those garbage heaps!"

This was what the decent-looking man with the hardhands and broken nails of a workman was doing—likehungry dog They kept up with him, in the fascination of the sight, to the next corner, where he turned down the side street still searching the gutter

They walked on a few paces. Then March said, "I must go after him," and he left his wife standing

Are you in want—hungry?" he asked the man The man said he could not speak English, monsieur. March asked his question in French.

The man shrugged a pitiful, desperate shrug, "Mais, monsieur——"

March put a coin in his hand, and then suddenly the man's face twisted up, he caught the hand of this almsgiver in both of his and clung to it "Monsieur! monsieur!" he gasped, and the tears rained down his tace

His benefactor pulled himself away, shocked and ashamed, as one is by such a chance, and got back to his wife, and the man lapsed back into the mystery of misery out of which he had emerged

March felt it laid upon him to console his wife for out had happened. Of course we might live here for stars and not see another case like that, and of course there are twenty places where he could have gone for help if he had known where to find them."

Ah, but it's the possibility of his needing the help so badly as that! she answered. "That's what I can't bear, and I shall not come to a place where such things are possible, and we may as well stop our house-hunting here at once"

Yes? And what part of Christendom will you 3 live in? Such things are possible everywhere in our

Then we must change the conditions-"

Oh no, we must go to the theatre and forget them We can stop at Bientano's for our tickets as we pass through Union Square"

I am not going to the theatre, Basil. I am going home to Boston to-night. You can stay and find a flat "

He convinced her of the absurdity of her position and even of its selfishness, but she said that her mind was quite made up irrespective of what had happened, that she had been away from the children long enough, that she ought to be at home to finish up the work of leaving "The word brought a sigh "Ah, I don't know why we should see nothing but said and ugly things now. When we were young—""

Younger," he put in "We're still young"

"That's what we pretend, but we know better. But I was thinking how pretty and pleasant things used to be turning up all the time on our travels in the old days. Why, when we were in New York here on our wedding so journey the place didn't seem half so dirty as it does now, and none of these dismal things happened.

"It was a good deal dirtier," he answered, "and I fancy worse in every way—hungrier, raggeder, more wretchedly housed. But that wasn't the period of life for us to notice it. Don't you remember, when we started to Niagara the last time, how everybody seemed middle-aged and commonplace; and when we got there there were no evident brides, nothing but elderly married people?"

"At least they weren't starving," she rebelled

"No, you don't starve in parlour cars and first-class hotels, but if you step out of them you run your chance of seeing those who do, if you're getting on pretty well in the forties. If it's the unhappy who see unhappiness, think what misery must be revealed to people who pass their lives in the really squalid tenement-house streets. I don't mean picturesque avenues like that we passed through."

"But we are not unhappy," she protested, bringing the talk back to the personal base again, as women must to 70 get any good out of talk "We're really no unhappier than we were when we were young"

"We're more serious"

'Well, I hate it, and I wish you wouldn't be so serious, if that's what it brings us to "

"I will be trivial from this on," said March "Shall we go to the Hole in the Ground to-night?"

'I am going to Boston."

"It's much the same thing How do you like that for triviality? It's a little blasphemous, I'll allow"

"It's very silly," she said

At the hotel they found a letter from the agent who had sent them the permit to see Mrs Grosvenor Green's apartment. He wrote that she had heard they were pleased with her apartment, and that she thought she could make the terms to suit. She had taken her passage to Europe, and was very anxious to let the flat before she sailed. She would call that evening at seven

"Mrs Grosvenor Greent" said Mrs March Which of the ten thousand flats is it, Basil?"

90

Mais, monsteur, Why, sir • 34 Brentano's, a bookstore and ticket agency • 50 our wedding journey Howells began the story of the Marches in Their Wedding Journey

"The gimcrackery," he answered. "In the Xenophon, you know."

"Well, she may save herself the trouble. I shall not see her. Or yes—I must. I couldn't go away without seeing what sort of creature could have planned that fly-away flat. She must be a perfect—"

"Parachute," March suggested.

"No anybody so light as that couldn't come down."
"Well, toy balloon."

"Toy balloon will do for the present," Mrs March admitted. "But I feel that naught but herself can be her parallel for volatility."

When Mrs Grosvenor Green's card came up they both descended to the hotel parlour, which March said looked like the saloon of a Moorish day-boat, not that he knew of any such craft, but the decorations were so Saracenic and the architecture so Hudson Riverish. They found there on the grand central divan a large lady whose vast smoothness, placidity, and plumpness set at defiance all 20 their preconceptions of Mrs Grosvenor Green, so that Mrs March distinctly paused with her card in her hand before venturing even tentatively to address her. Then she was astonished at the low calm voice in which Mrs. Green acknowledged herself, and slowly proceeded to apologise for calling. It was not quite true that she had taken her passage for Europe, but she hoped soon to do so, and she confessed that in the meantime she was anxious to let her flat. She was a little worn out with the care of house-keeping-Mrs. March breathed, "Oh yes!" 30 in the sigh with which ladies recognise one another's martyrdom-and Mr Green had business abroad, and she was going to pursue her art studies in Paris; she drew in Mr Ilcomb's class now, but the instruction was so much better in Paris, and as the Superintendent seemed to think the price was the only objection, she had ventured to call.

"Then we didn't deceive him in the least," thought Mrs March, while she answered sweetly. "No, we were only afraid that it would be too small for our family. We require a good many rooms." She could not forego the opportunity of saying, "My husband is coming to New York to take charge of a literary periodical, and he will have to have a room to write in," which made Mrs. Green bow to March, and made March look sheepish "But we did think the apartment very charming (It was architecturally charming," she protested to her conscience), "and we should have been so glad if we could have got into it." She followed this with some account of their house-hunting, amid soft murmurs of sympathy from Mrs. Green, who said that she had been through all that, s and that if she could have shown her apartment to them she felt sure that she could have explained it so that they would have seen its capabilities better Mrs March assented to this, and Mrs. Green added that if they found nothing exactly suitable she would be glad to have them look at it again, and then Mrs March said that she was going back to Boston herself, but she was leaving Mr March to continue the search, and she had no doubt he would be only too glad to see the apartment by daylight "But if you take it, Basil," she warned him, when they were alone, "I shall simply renounce you I wouldn't live in that junk shop if you gave it to me But who would have thought she was that kind of looking person? Though of course I might have known if I had stopped to think once. It's because the place doesn't express her at all that it's so unlike her. It couldn't be like anybody or anything that flies in the air, or creeps upon the earth, or swims in the waters under the earth. I wonder where in the world she's from, she's no New-Yorker. even we can see that, and she's not quite a country person either, she seems like a person from some large town. where she's been an æsthetic authority. And she can't find good enough art instruction in New York, and has to go to Paris for it! Well, it's pathetic, after all. Basil I can't help feeling sorry for a person who mistakes herself to that extent."

"I can't help feeling sorry for the husband of a person who mistakes herself to that extent. What is Mr Grosvenor Green going to do in Paris while she's working her way into the Salon?"

"Well, you keep away from her apartment, Basil, that's all I've got to say to you. And yet I do like some things about her."

"I like everything about her but her apartment," said March.

"I like her going to be out of the country," said his wife. "We shouldn't be overlooked. And the place nas

Mrs. March's language is reminiscent of Genesis 1 26 "And God said, Let us make man in our image and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over refowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing . .."

prettily shaped, you can't deny it. And there was an elevator and steam-heat. And the location is very convenient And there was a hall-boy to bring up cards. The halls and stairs were kept very clean and nice But it wouldn't do I could put you a folding bed in the room where you wrote, and we could even have one in the parlour-"

Behind a portière? I couldn't stand any more por-

"And we could squeeze the two girls into one room, or perhaps only bring Margaret, and put out the whole of the wash Basil!" she almost shrieked, "it isn't to be thought of!"

He retorted, "I'm not thinking of it, my dear."

Fulkerson came in just before they started for Mrs March's train, to find out what had become of them, he said, and to see whether they had got anything to live

'Not a thing," she said "And I'm just going back . to Boston, and leaving Mr March here to do anything he pleases about it He has carte blanche."

'But freedom brings responsibility, you know, Fulkerson, and it's the same as if I'd no choice I'm staying behind because I'm left, not because I expect to do anything"

Is that so?" asked Fulkerson "Well, we must see what can be done I supposed you would be all settled by this time, or I should have humped myself to find vou something None of those places I gave you amount ... to anything^γ"

"As much as forty thousand others we've looked at," said Mrs March "Yes, one of them, does amount to something It comes so near being what we want that lve given Mr March particular instructions not to go near it"

She told him about Mrs Grosvenor Green and her flat, and at the end he said-

Well, well, we must look out for that I'll keep an eve on him, Mrs March, and see that he doesn't do anything rash, and I won't leave him till he's found just the right thing It exists, of course, it must in a City of eighteen hundred thousand people, and the only question is where to find it You leave him to me, Mrs. March, I'll watch out for him."

Fulkerson showed some signs of going to the station when he found they were not driving, but she bade him a peremptory good-bye at the hotel door.

"He's very nice, Basil, and his way with you is perfectly charming. It's very sweet to see how really fond of you he is But I didn't want him stringing along up 50 to Forty-second Street with us, and spoiling our last moments together"

At Third Avenue they took the Elevated, for which she confessed an infatuation. She declared it the most ideal way of getting about in the world, and was not ashamed when he reminded her of how she used to say that nothing under the sun could induce her to travel on it. She now said that the night transit was even more interesting than the day, and that the fleeting intimacy you formed with people in second and third floor in- 60 teriors while all the usual street life went on underneath, had a domestic intensity mixed with a perfect repose that was the last effect of good society with all its security and exclusiveness. He said it was better than the theatre, of which it reminded him, to see those people through their windows a family party of work-folk at a late tea, some of the men in their shirt sleeves, a woman sewing by a lamp, a mother laying her child in its cradle, a man with his head fallen on his hands upon a table, a girl and her lover leaning over the window- 70 sill together What suggestion! what drama! what infinite interest! At the Forty-second Street station they stopped a minute on the bridge that crosses the track to the branch road for the Central Depôt, and looked up and down the long stretch of the elevated to north and south. The track that found and lost itself a thousand times in the flare and tremor of the innumerable lights, the moony sheen of the electrics mixing with the reddish points and blots of gas far and near, the architectural shapes of houses and churches and towers, rescued 80 by the obscurity from all that was ignoble in them, and the coming and going of the trains marking the stations with vivider or fainter plumes of flame-shot steamformed an incomparable perspective. They often talked afterward of the superb spectacle, which in a city full of painters nightly works its unrecorded miracles, and they were just to the Arachne roof spun in iron over the cross street on which they ran to the depôt, but for the present they were mostly inarticulate before it. They had another moment of rich silence when they paused 90

in the gallery that leads from the elevated station to the waiting-rooms in the Central Depôt and looked down upon the great night trains lying on the tracks dim under the rain of gas-lights that starred without dispersing the vast darkness of the place. What forces, what fates, slept in these bulks which would soon be hurling themselves north and east and west through the night! Now they waited there like fabled monsters of Arab story ready for the magician's touch, tractable, reckless, will-less—10 organised lifelessness full of a strange semblance of life

The Marches admired the impressive sight with a thrill of patriotic pride in the fact that the whole world perhaps could not afford just the like Then they hurried down to the ticket offices, and he got her a lower berth in the Boston sleeper, and went with her to the car They made the most of the fact that her berth was in the very middle of the car, and she promised to write as soon as she reached home. She promised also that having seen the limitations of New York in respect to flats, she 20 would not be hard on him if he took something not quite ideal. Only he must remember that it was not to be above Twentieth Street nor below Washington Square, it must not be higher than the third floor, it must have an elevator, steam-heat, hall-boys, and a pleasant janitor These were essentials, if he could not get them, then they must do without. But he must get them. . . .

[The Marches soon find themselves, strangely enough, established in Mrs Grosvenor Green's apartment, which Mrs March takes a real pleasure in adapting to the needs of her family, and March embarks upon his new career as editor of Every Other Week. The magazine is the device by which Howells brings together in New York an interesting assortment of people Fulkerson, a "go-getter" from the West, is the promoter and business manager of the magazine Dryfoos, recently made rich by the discovery of natural gas on his Indiana farm, is the "angel" or financial backer, he is presented as a crude and unscrupulous capitalist. The Dryfoos household includes the infirm and ineffectual Mrs Dryfoos, who has been unhappy ever since she left the old homestead in the West: a son. Conrad, who is bookkeeper for the magazine but who is more interested (much to his father's disgust) in religious and social work, two daughters, Mela and Christine, and a chaperone, Mrs Mandel, who has been employed to educate the young ladies in the social graces Others connected more or less directly with the magazine are: Lindau, an immigrant Socialist from Germany, who loss an arm in the American Civil War, Colonel Woodburn, a "professional" Southerner, and his daughter, Kendricks, a dilettante writer; Beaton, a dilettante painter who has shown Christine Dryfoos an equivocal attention; and Margaret Vance, of aristocratic family, who shares Conrad Dryfoos' interest in social reform.

The selection which follows is an account of a stag dinner at the Dryfoos house, the affair having been engineered by the genial Fulkerson to bring together in friendly fashion the people connected with the magazine. The intrusion of the question of capital and labor, however, mars the harmony of the occasion?

Chapter VI

So far as the Dryfoos family was concerned, the dinner might as well have been given at Frescobaldi's rooms None of the ladies appeared Mrs Dryfoos was glad to escape to her own chamber, where she sat before an: autumnal fire, shaking her head and talking to herself at times, with the foreboding of evil which old women like her make part of their religion. The girls stood just out of sight at the head of the stairs, and disputed which guest it was at each arrival, Mrs Mandel had gone to her room to write letters, after beseeching them not to stand there When Kendricks came, Christine gave Mela a little pinch, equivalent to a little mocking shriek. for on the ground of his long talk with Mela at Mrs Horn's, in the absence of any other admirer, they based a a superstition of his interest in her, when Beaton came. Mela returned the pinch, but awkwardly, so that it hurt. and then Christine involuntarily struck her

Frescobaldi's men were in possession everywhere they had turned the cook out of her kitchen and the waitress out of her pantry, the reluctant Irishman at the door was supplemented by a vivid Italian, who spoke French with the guests, and said, "Bien. Monsieur." and "Toute suite," and "Merci!" to all, as he took their hats and coats, and effused a hospitality that needed no language but the gleam of his eyes and teeth and the plat of his eloquent hands From his professional dress-coat

²³ Frescobalds, a caterer employed for the occasion

lustrous with the grease spotted on it at former dinners and parties, they passed to the frocks of the elder and vounger Dryfoos in the drawing-room, which assumed informality for the affair, but did not put their wearers wholly at their ease. The father's coat was of black broadcloth, and he wore it unbuttoned, the skirts were long, and the sleeves came down to his knuckles, he shook hands with his guests, and the same dryness seemed to be in his palm and throat, as he huskily asked each to take a chair Conrad's coat was of modern texture and cut, and was buttoned about him as if it concealed a bad conscience within its lapels, he met March with his entreating smile, and he seemed no more capable of coping with the situation than his father They both waited for Fulkerson, who went about and did his best to keep life in the party during the half-hour that passed before they sat down at dinner Beaton stood gloomily aloot, as if waiting to be approached on the right basis before yielding an inch of his ground, Colonel Wood-.: burn, awaiting the moment when he could sally out on his hobby, kept himself intrenched within the dignity of a gentleman, and examined askance the figure of old Lindau as he stared about the room, with his fine head up and his empty sleeve dangling over his wrist March telt obliged to him for wearing a new coat in the midst of that hostile luxury, and he was glad to see Dryfoos make up to him and begin to talk with him, as if he wished to show him particular respect, though it might have been because he was less afraid of him than of the outhers He heard Lindau saying, "Boat, the name is Choarman?" and Dryfoos beginning to explain his Pennsylvania Dutch origin, and he suffered himself, with a sigh of relief, to fall into talk with Kendricks, who was always pleasant, he was willing to talk about something besides himself, and had no opinions that he was not ready to hold in abeyance for the time being out of kindness to others. In that group of impassioned individualities, March felt him a refuge and comfort-with his harmless dilettante intention of some day writing o a novel, and his belief that he was meantime collecting material for it.

Fulkerson, while breaking the ice for the whole company, was mainly engaged in keeping Colonel Woodburn thawed out He took Kendricks away from March and presented him to the Colonel as a person who, like himself, was looking into social conditions, he put one hand on Kendricks' shoulder, and one on the colonel's, and made some flattering joke, apparently at the expense of the young fellow, and then left them March heard Kendricks protest in vain, and the colonel say gravely: 50 "I do not wonder, sir, that these things interest you. They constitute a problem which society must solve or which will dissolve society," and he knew from that formula, which the colonel had once used with him, that he was laying out a road for the exhibition of the hobby's paces later.

Fulkerson came back to March, who had turned toward Conrad Dryfoos, and said, "If we don't get this thing going pretty soon it ll be the death of me," and just then Frescobaldi's butler came in and announced to 60 Dryfoos that dinner was served The old man looked toward Fulkerson with a troubled glance, as if he did not know what to do, he made a gesture to touch Lindau's elbow Fulkerson called out, "Here's Colonel Woodburn, Mr Dryfoos," as if Dryfoos were looking for him, and he set the example of what he was to do by taking Lindau's arm himself "Mr Lindau is going to sit at my end of the table, alongside of March Stand not upon the order of your going, gentlemen, but fall in at once" He contrived to get Dryfoos and the colonel 70 before him, and he let March follow with Kendricks Conrad came last with Beaton, who had been turning over the music at the piano, and chafing inwardly at the whole affair At the table Colonel Woodburn was placed on Dryfoos's right, and March on his left March sat on Fulkerson's right, with Lindau next him, and the young men occupied the other seats

"Put you next to March, Mr. Lindau," said Fulkerson,
"so you can begin to put Apollinaris in his champagneglass at the right moment; you know his little weakness 80 of old, soriy to say it's grown on him"

March laughed with kindly acquiescence in Fulkerson's wish to start the gaiety, and Lindau patted him on the shoulder "I know hiss veakness If he liges a class of vine, it iss begause his loaf ingludes efen hiss enemy, as Shakespeare galled it"

"Ah, but Shakespeare couldn't have been thinking of champagne," said Kendricks

"I suppose, sir," Colonel Woodburn interposed with lofty courtesy, "champagne could hardly have been known in his day."

"I suppose not, colonel," returned the younger man deferentially. "He seemed to think that sack and sugar might be a fault, but he didn't mention champagne"

"Perhaps he felt there was no question about that," suggested Beaton, who then felt that he had not done himself justice in the sally

"I wonder just when champagne did come in," said March

"I know when it ought to come in," said Fulkerson. "Before the soup!"

They all laughed, and gave themselves the air of drinking champagne out of tumblers every day, as men like to do Dryfoos listened uneasily; he did not quite understand the allusions, though he knew what Shake-speare was, well enough, Conrad's face expressed a gentle deprecation of joking on such a subject, but he said 20 nothing

The talk ran on briskly through the dinner The young men tossed the ball back and forth, they made some wild shots, but they kept it going, and they laughed when they were hit. The wine loosed Colonel Woodburn's tongue, he became very companionable with the young fellows, with the feeling that a literary dinner ought to have a didactic scope, he praised Scott and Addison as the only authors fit to form the minds of gentlemen

6 Kendricks agreed with him, but wished to add the name of Flaubert as a master of style "Style, you know," he added, "is the man."

"Very true, sii, you are quite right, sir," the colonel assented, he wondered who Flaubert was

Beaton praised Baudelaire and Maupassant, he said these were the masters. He recited some lurid verses from Baudelaire, Lindau pronounced them a disgrace to human nature, and gave a passage from Victor Hugo on Louis Napoleon, with his heavy German accent, and then he quoted Schiller "Ach, boat that iss peaudifool! Not zo?" he demanded of March

"Yes, beautiful, but, of course, you know I think there's nobody like Heine!"

Lindau threw back his great old head and laughed, showing a want of teeth under his moustache. He put his hand on March's back. "This poy—he wass a poy den—wass so gracy to pekin reading Heine that he gommence with the tictionary bevore he knows any crammar, and ve bick it out vort by vort togeder."

"He was a pretty cay poy in those days, heigh, Lindau" asked Fulkerson, burlesquing the old man's accent, with an impudent wink that made Lindau himself laugh. "Back in the dark ages, I mean, there in Indianapolis Just how long ago did you old codgers meet there, anyway". Fulkerson saw the restiveness in Dryfoos's eye at the purely literary course the talk had taken, he had intended it to lead up that way to business, to Every Other Week; but he saw that it was leaving Dryfoos too far out, and he wished to get it on the personal ground, where everybody is at home.

"Ledt me zee," mused Lindau "Wass it in fifty-nine or zixty, Passil? Idt wass a year or dwo pefore the war proke oudt, anyway."

"Those were exciting times." said Dryfoos, making his first entry into the general talk "I went down to Indianapolis with the first company from our place, and I saw the red-shirts pouring in everywhere. They had a song—

"Oh, never mind the weather, but git over double trouble,

For we're bound for the land of Canaan"

The fellows locked arms and went singin' it up and down four or five abreast in the moonlight; crowded everybody else off the sidewalk"

"I rememper, I rememper," said Lindau, nodding his head slowly up and down "A coodt many off them nefer gome pack from that landt of Ganaan, Mr Dryfoos?"

"You're right, Mr Lindau. But I reckon it was worth it—the country we've got now Here, young man!" He caught the arm of the waiter who was going round with the champagne bottle "Fill up Mr Lindau's glass, there I want to drink the health of those old times with him Here's to your empty sleeve, Mr Lindau. God bless it' No offence to you, Colonel Woodburn," said Dryfoos turning to him before he drank

"Not at all, sir, not at all," said the colonel. "I will drink with you, if you will permit me."

"We'll all drink—standing," cried Fulkerson. "Help March to get up, somebody! Fill high the bowl with Samian Apollinaris for Coonrod! Now, then, hurrah for Lindau!"

They cheered, and hammered on the table with the butts of their knife-handles Lindau remained seated. The tears came into his eyes, he said, "I thank you, thendlemen," and hiccoughed

Id a went into the war myself," said Dryfoos, "but I was raisin a family of young children, and I didn't see how I could leave my farm But I helped to fill up the quota at every call, and when the volunteering stopped I went round with the subscription paper myself, and we offered as good bounties as any in the State My substitute was killed in one of the last skirmishes—in fact, after Lee's surrender—and I've took care of his tamily, more or less, ever since"

By the way, March," said Fulkerson, "what sort of an idea would it be to have a good war-story—might be a serial—in the magazine? The war has never fully panned out in fiction yet. It was used a good deal just after it was over, and then it was dropped I think it's time to take it up again I believe it would be a card."

It was running in March's mind that Dryfoos had an old rankling shame in his heart for not having gone into the war, and that he had often made that explanation of his course without having ever been satisfied with it.

3. He felt sorry for him, the fact seemed pathetic; it suggested a dormant nobleness in the man

Beaton was saying to Fulkerson, "You might get a series of sketches by substitutes, the substitutes haven't been much heard from in the war literature. How would 'The Autobiography of a Substitute' do? You might follow him up to the moment he was killed in the other man's place, and inquire whether he had any right to the feelings of a hero when he was only hired in the place of one. Might call it 'The Career of a Deputy'. Hero'"

I fancy," said March, "that there was a great deal of mixed motive in the men who went into the war as well as in those who kept out of it. We canonised all that died or suffered in it, but some of them must have been self-seeking and low-minded, like men in other vocations." He found himself saying this in Dryfoos's behalf; the old man looked at him gratefully at first, he thought, and then suspiciously.

Lindau turned his head toward him and said. "You are righdt, Passil, you are righdt. I haf zeen on the so fieldt of pattle the voarst eggsipitions of human paseness—chelousy, fanity, ecodistic bridte. I haf zeen men in the face off death itself gofferened by motifes as low as—as pusiness motifes."

"Well," said Fulkerson, "it would be a grand thing for Every Other Week if we could get some of those ideas worked up into a series. It would make a lot of talk"

Colonel Woodburn ignored him in saying, "I think, Major Lindau——"

"High brifate; prefet gorporal," the old man interrupted, in rejection of the title

Kendricks laughed and said, with a glance of appreciation at Lindau, "Brevet corporal is good"

Colonel Woodburn frowned a little, and passed over the joke "I think Mr Lindau is right Such exhibitions were common to both sides, though if you gentlemen will pardon me for saying so, I think they were less frequent on ours We were fighting more immediately for existence, we were fewer than you were, and we 70 knew it, we felt more intensely that if each were not for all, then none was for any"

The colonel's words made their impression Dryfoos said with authority, "That is so '

"Colonel Woodburn," Fulkerson called out, "if you'll work up those ideas into a short paper—say three thousand words—I'll engage to make March take it"

The colonel went on without replying "But Mr Lindau is right in characterising some of the motives that led men to the cannon's mouth as no higher than business motives, and his comparison is the most forcible that he could have used I was very much struck by it"

The hobby was out, the colonel was in the saddle with so firm a seat that no effort sufficed to dislodge him. The dinner went on from course to course with barbaric profusion, and from time to time Fulkerson tried to bring the talk back to Every Other Week, but perhaps because that was only the ostensible and not the real object of the dinner, which was to bring a number of men together under Dryfoos's roof, and make them the witnesses of his splendour, make them feel the power of his wealth, Fulkerson's attempts failed. The colonel showed how commercialism was the poison at the heart of our national life, how we began as a simple, agricultural people, who had fled to these shores with the instinct, divinely implanted, of building a State such as the sun never shone upon before, how we had conquered the 10 wilderness and the savage, how we had flung off, in our struggle with the mother-country, the trammels of tradition and precedent, and had settled down, a free nation, to the practice of the arts of peace, how the spirit of commercialism had stolen insidiously upon us, and the infernal impulse of competition had embroiled us in a perpetual warfare of interests, developing the worst passions of our nature, and teaching us to trick and betray and destroy one another in the strife for money, till now that impulse had exhausted itself, and we found com-20 petition gone and the whole economic problem in the hands of monopolies-the Standard Oil Company, the Sugar Trust, the Rubber Trust, and what not And now what was the next thing? Affairs could not remain as they were, it was impossible, and what was the next thing?

The company listened for the main part silently. Dryfoos tried to grasp the idea of commercialism as the colonel seemed to hold it, he conceived of it as something like the dry-goods business on a vast scale, and he knew he had never been in that. He did not like to hear competition called infernal, he had always supposed it was something sacred, but he approved of what Colonel Woodburn said of the Standard Oil Company; it was all true, the Standard Oil Company had squeezed Dryfoos once, and made him sell it a lot of oil-wells by putting down the price of oil so low in that region that he lost money on every barre! he pumped.

All the rest listened silently, except Lindau; at every point the colonel made against the present condition of things he said more and more fiercely, "You are righdt," you are righdt." His eyes glowed, his hand played with his knife-hilt. When the colonel demanded, "And what is the next thing?" he threw himself forward, and repeated, "Yes, sir! What is the next thing?"

"Natural gas, by thunder!" shouted Fulkerson.

One of the waiters had profited by Lindau's posture to lean over him and put down in the middle of the table a structure in white sugar It expressed Frescobaldi's conception of a derrick, and a touch of nature had been added in the flame of brandy, which burned luridly up s from a small pit in the centre of the base, and represented the gas in combustion as it issued from the ground Fulkerson burst into a roar of laughter with the words that recognised Frescobaldi's personal tribute to Dryfoos. Everybody rose and peered over at the thing, while he explained the work of sinking a gas-well, as he had already explained it to Frescobaldi In the midst of his lecture he caught sight of the caterer himself where he stood in the pantry doorway, smiling with an artist's anxiety for the effect of his masterpiece.

"Come in, come in, Frescobaldi! We want to congratulate you," Fulkerson called to him "Here, gentlemen! Here's Frescobaldi's health"

They all drank, and Frescobaldi, smiling brilliantly and rubbing his hands as he bowed right and left, permirted himself to say to Dryfoos, "You are please, no? You like?"

"First-rate, first-rate!" said the old man; but when the Italian had bowed himself out and his guests had sunk into their seats again, he said dryly to Fulkerson. "I reckon they didn't have to torpedo that well, or the derrick wouldn't look quite so nice and clean."

"Yes." Fulkerson answered, "and that ain't quite the style-that little wiggly-waggly blue flame-that the gas acts when you touch off a good vein of it. This might do for weak-gas," and he went on to explain. "They call it weak-gas when they tap it two or three hundred feet down, and anybody can sink a well in his backyard and get enough gas to light and heat his house. I remember one fellow that had it blazing up from a pipe through a flower-bed, just like a jet of water from a fountain My, my, my' You fel-you gentlemen-ought to go out and see that country, all of you Wish we could torpedo this well, Mr. Dryfoos, and let 'em see how it works' Mind that one you torpedoed for me? You know, when they sink a well," he went on to the company, "they can't always most generally sometimes tell whether they're goin' to get gas or oil or salt-water Why, when they first began to bore for salt-water out on the Kanawha, back about the beginning of the century, they used to get gas now and then and then they considered it a

⁸⁹ Kanawha, a river which flows through West Virginia into the Ohio River

failure; they called a gas-well a blower, and give it up in disgust, the time wasn't ripe for gas yet Now they bore away sometimes till they get half-way to China, and don't seem to strike anything worth speaking of. Then they put a dynamite torpedo down in the well and explode it. They have a little bar of iron that they call a Go-devil, and they just drop it down on the business end of the torpedo, and then stand from under, if you please! You hear a noise, and in about a half a minute you begin to see one, and it begins to rain oil and mud and saltwater and rocks and pitchforks and adoptive citizens; and when it clears up the derrick's painted—got a coat on that'll wear in any climate That's what our honoured host meant Generally get some visiting lady, when there's one round, to drop the Go-devil. But that day we had to put up with Conrad here They offered to let me drop it, but I declined I told 'em I hadn't much practice with Go-devils in the newspaper syndicate business, and I wasn't very well myself, anyway. Astonishing," Fulkerson continued, with the air of relieving his explanation by an anecdote, "how reckless they get using dynamite when they're torpedoing wells We stopped at one place where a fellow was handling the cartridges pretty freely, and Mr Dryfoos happened to caution him a little, and that ass came up with one of 'em in his hand, and began to pound it on the buggywheel to show us how safe it was I turned green, I was so scared, but Mr Dryfoos kept his colour, and kind of coaxed the fellow till he quit You could see he was the so tool kind, that if you tried to stop him he'd keep on hammering that cartridge, just to show that it wouldn't explode, till he blew you into Kingdom Come. When we got him to go away, Mr. Dryfoos drove up to his toreman 'Pay Sheney off, and discharge him on the spot' says he 'He's too safe a man to have round; he knows too much about dynamite.' I never saw anybody

Dryfoos modestly dropped his head under Fulkerson's flattery and, without lifting it, turned his eyes toward. Colonel Woodburn "I had all sorts of men to deal with in developing my property out there, but I had very little trouble with them, generally speaking"

"Ah, ah! you foundt the labouring-man reasonable—dractable—tocile?" Lindau put in.

"Yes, generally speaking," Dryfoos answered. "They mostly knew which side of their bread was buttered. I did have one little difficulty at one time. It happened to be when Mr. Fulkerson was out there. Some of the men tried to form a union——"

"No, no! ' cried Fulkerson, "Let me tell that! I know so you wouldn't do yourself justice, Mr Dryfoos, and I want 'em to know how a strike can be managed, if you take it in time You see, some of those fellows got a notion that there ought to be a union among the working-men to keep up wages, and dictate to the employers, and Mr Dryfoos's foreman was the ringleader in the business. They understood pretty well that as soon as he found it out that foreman would walk the plank, and so they watched out till they thought they had Mr Dryfoos just where they wanted him-everything on the keen 60 jump and every man worth his weight in diamonds -and then they come to him, and told him to sign a promise to keep that foreman to the end of the season, or till he was through with the work on the Dryfoos and Hendry Addition, under penalty of having them all knock off Mr Dryfoos smelt a mice, but he couldn't tell where the mice was, he saw that they did have him, and he signed of course There wasn't anything really against the fellow, anyway, he was a first-rate man, and he did his duty every time, only he'd got some of those 70 ideas into his head, and they turned it Mr. Dryfoos signed, and then he laid low."

March saw Lindau listening with a mounting intensity, and heard him murmur in German, "Shameful!" shameful!"

Fulkerson went on: "Well, it wasn't long before they began to show their hand, but Mr Dryfoos kept dark He agreed to everything, there never was such an obliging capitalist before, there wasn't a thing they asked of him that he didn't do, with the greatest of pleasure, 80 and all went merry as a marriage-bell till one morning a whole gang of fresh men marched into the Dryfoos and Hendry Addition, under the escort of a dozen Pinkertons with repeating rifles at half-cock, and about fifty fellows found themselves out of a job You never saw such a mad set."

"Pretty neat," said Kendricks, who looked at the affair purely from an æsthetic point of view. "Such a coup as that would tell tremendously in a play."

"That was vile treason," said Lindau in German to 90

March. "He's an infamous traitor! I cannot stay here. I must go"

He struggled to rise, while March held him by the coat, and implored him under his voice, "For Heaven's sake, don't, Lindau! You owe it to yourself not to make a scene, if you come here" Something in it all affected him comically, he could not help laughing

The others were discussing the matter, and seemed not to have noticed Lindau, who controlled himself and 10 sighed "You are right I must have patience"

Beaton was saying to Dryfoos, "Pity your Pinkertons couldn't have given them a few shots before they left"

"No, that wasn't necessary," said Dryfoos "I succeeded in breaking up the union. I entered into an agreement with other parties not to employ any man who would not swear that he was non-union. If they had attempted violence, of course they could have been shot. But there was no fear of that. Those fellows can always be depended upon to cut each other's throats in the long-run."

"But sometimes," said Colonel Woodburn, who had been watching throughout for a chance to mount his hobby again, "they make a good deal of trouble first How was it in the great railroad strike of '77?"

"Well, I guess there was a little trouble that time, colonel," said Fulkerson. "But the men that undertake to override the laws and paralyse the industries of a country like this generally get left in the end."

"Yes, sir, generally, and up to a certain point, always 30 But it's the exceptional that is apt to happen, as well as the unexpected And a little reflection will convince any gentleman here that there is always a danger of the exceptional in your system. The fact is, those fellows have the game in their own hands already. A strike of the whole body of the Brotherhood of Engineers alone would starve out the entire Atlantic seaboard in a week, labour insurrection could make head at a dozen given points, and your government couldn't move a man over the roads without the help of the engineers."

"That is so,' said Kendricks, struck by the dramatic character of the conjecture. He imagined a fiction dealing with the situation as something already accomplished

"Why don't some fellow do the Battle of Dorking act with that thing?" said Fulkerson "It would be a card" "Exactly what I was thinking, Mi Fulkerson, said Kendricks Fulkerson laughed "Telepathy—clear case of mindtransference Better see March, here, about it I'd like to have it in Every Other Week. It would make talk'

"Perhaps it might set your people to thinking as well s as talking," said the colonel.

"Well, sir," said Dryfoos, setting his lips so tightly together that his imperial stuck straight outward, "if I had my way, there wouldn't be any Brotherhood of Engineers, nor any other kind of labour union in the whole country."

"What!" shouted Lindau. "You would sobbress the unions of the voarking-men?"

"Yes, I would"

"And what would you do with the unionss of the a gabidalists—the drosts—and gompines, and boolss? Would you dake the righdt from one and gif it to the odder?"

"Yes, sir, I would," said Dryfoos, with a wicked look at him

Lindau was about to roar back at him with some furious protest, but March put his hand on his shoulder imploringly, and Lindau turned to him to say in German, "But it is infamous—infamous! What kind of man is this? Who is he? He has the heart of a tyrant"

Colonel Woodburn cut in. "You couldn't do that, Mr Dryfoos, under your system. And if you attempted it, with your conspiracy laws, and that kind of thing, it might bring the climax sooner than you expected Your commercialised society has built its house on the sands It will have to go But I should be sorry if it went before its time."

"You are righdt, sir," said I indau "It would be a bity I hobe it will last till it feelss its rottenness, like Herodt Boat, when its hour gomes, when it trops to bieces with the veight off its own gorrubtion—what then?"

"It's not to be supposed that a system of things like this can drop to pieces of its own accord, like the old Republic of Venice," said the colonel "But when the last vestige of commercial society is gone, then we can

"Lion and lamb act," said Fulkerson, not well knowing after so much champagne, what words he was using No one noticed him, and Colonel Woodburn said coldly to Lindau, "You are talking paternalism, sir." 'And you are dalking feutalism!" retorted the old man. The Colonel did not reply A silence ensued, which no one broke till Fulkerson said "Well, now, look here. If either one of these millenniums was brought about, by force of arms, or otherwise, what would become of Every Other Week? Who would want March for an editor? How would Beaton sell his pictures? Who would print Mr Kendricks' little society verses and short stories? What would become of Conrad and his good works?" Those named grinned in support of Fulkerson's diversion, but Lindau and the colonel did not speak, Dryfoos looked down at his plate, frowning A waster came round with cigars, and Fulkerson took one "Ah," he said, as he bit off the end, and leaned over to the emblematic masterpiece, where the brandy was still feebly flickering, "I wonder if there's enough natural gas left to light my cigar" His effort put the flame out and knocked the derrick over, it broke in fragments on the table Fulkerson cackled over the ruin. "I wonder if all Mossitt will look that way after labour 50 and capital have fought it out together. I hope this ain't ominous of anything personal, Dryfoos?"

"Ill take the risk of it," said the old man harshly. He rose mechanically, and Fulkerson said to Frescobaldi's man, "You can bring us the coffee in the library"

The talk did not recover itself there. Lindau would not sit down, he refused coffee, and dismissed himself with a haughty bow to the company, Colonel Woodburn shook hands elaborately all round, when he had 60 smoked his cigar, the others followed him. It seemed to March that his own good-night from Dryfoos was dry and cold. . . .

IA streetcar strike furnishes the dramatic climax of Howells story, such a strike had occuired in New York a few months before the publication of the book. In the chapters that follow, the strike is presented in such a way as to show the reactions of various characters to it. the hostility of the elder Dryfoos, the sympathy of Lindau, young Dryfoos, and Margaret Vance, the indifference of Fulkerson, the detachment of March. Whatever Howells own attitude may have been, the emphasis given to the subject shows the author's growing awareness of the problem.]

PART FIFTH

Chapter III

The strike made a good deal of talk in the office of Every Other Week-that is, it made Fulkerson talk a good deal. He congratulated himself that he was not personally incommoded by it, like some of the fellows who lived up-town, and had not everything under one roof, as it were He enjoyed the excitement of it, and he kept the office-boy running out to buy the extras 70 which the newsmen came crying through the street almost every hour with a lamentable, unintelligible noise. He read not only the latest intelligence of the strike, but the editorial comments on it, which praised the firm attitude of both parties, and the admirable measures taken by the police to preserve order. Fulkerson enjoyed the interviews with the police captains and the leaders of the strike, he equally enjoyed the attempts of the reporters to interview the road managers, which were so graphically detailed, and with such a fine feeling for the right use of scareheads as to have almost the value of direct expressions from them, though it seemed that they had resolutely refused to speak. He said, at second-hand 10 from the papers, that if the mcn behaved themselves and respected the rights of property, they would have public sympathy with them every time, but just as soon as they began to interfere with the roads' right to manage their own affairs in their own way, they must be put down with an iron hand, the phrase "iron hand" did Fulkerson almost as much good as if it had never been used before. News began to come of fighting between the police and the strikers when the roads tried to move their cars with men imported from Philadelphia, and 20 then Fulkerson rejoiced at the splendid courage of the police. At the same time he believed what the strikers said and that the trouble was not made by them, but by gangs of roughs acting without their approval. In this juncture he was relieved by the arrival of the State Board of Arbitration, which took up its quarters, with a great many scarcheads, at one of the principal hotels, and invited the roads and the strikers to lay the matter in dispute before them, he said that now we should see the working of the greatest piece of social ma-30 chinery in modern times. But it appeared to work only in the alacrity of the strikers to submit their grievance The roads were as one road in declaring that there was nothing to arbitrate, and that they were merely asserting their right to manage their own affairs in their own way. One of the presidents was reported to have told a member of the Board, who personally summoned him, to get out and to go about his business Then, to Fulkerson's extreme disappointment, the august tribunal, acting on behalf of the sovereign people in 40 the interest of peace, declared itself powerless and got out, and would, no doubt, have gone about its business if it had had any Fulkerson did not know what to say, perhaps because the extras did not, but March Luighed at this result

"It's a good deal like the military manœuvre of the King of France and his forty thousand men I suppose somebody told him at the top of the hill that there was nothing to arbitrate, and to get out and go about his business, and that was the reason he marched down after he had marched up with all that ceremony. What 5 amuses me is to find that in an affair of this kind the roads have rights and the strikers have rights, but the public has no rights at all. The roads and the strikers are allowed to fight out a private war in our midst—as thoroughly and precisely a private war as any we despise the Middle Ages for having tolerated—as am street war in Florence or Verona—and to fight it out at our pains and expense, and we stand by like sheep and wait till we get tired. It's a funny attitude for a city of fifteen hundred thousand inhabitants."

"What would you do?" asked Fulkerson, a good deal daunted by this view of the case

"Do? Nothing Hasn't the State Board of Arbitration declared itself powerless? We have no hold upon the strikers, and we're so used to being snubbed and disobliged by common carriers that we have forgotten our hold on the roads, and always allow them to manage their own affairs in their own way, quite as if we had nothing to do with them, and they owed us no services in return for their privileges."

"That's a good deal so," said Fulkerson, disordering his hair "Well, it's nuts for the colonel nowadays. He says if he was boss of this town he would seize the roads on behalf of the people, and man 'em with policemen and iun em till the managers had come to terms with the strikers, and he'd do that every time there was a strike."

"Doesn't that rather savour of the paternalism he condemned in Lindau?" asked March

"I don't know It savours of horse-sense."

"You are pretty far gone, Fulkerson I thought you were the most engaged man I ever saw, but I guess you're more father-in-lawed. And before you're married too."

"Well, the colonel's a glorious old fellow, March I wish he had the power to do that thing, just for the fun of looking on while he waltzed in. He son the keen jump from morning till night, and he's up late and early to see the row I'm afraid hell get shot at some of the fights, he sees them all, I can't get any s'a'w at them haven't seen a brickbat shied or a club swung yet Have you?"

No. I find I can philosophise the situation about as well from the papers, and that's what I really want to do I suppose Besides Im solemnly pledged by Mrs March not to go near any sort of crowd, under penalty of having her bring the children and go with me Her theory is that we must all die together, the children buyent been at school since the strike began. There's no precaution that Mrs March hasn't used She watches me whenever I go out, and sees that I start straight for this office"

Fulkerson laughed and said: "Well, it's probably the only thing that's saved your life. Have you seen anything of Beaton lately?"

No You don't mean to say he's killed!"

Not if he knows it. But I don't know---. What to you say, March? What's the reason you couldn't " us up a paper on the strike?"

I knew it would fetch round to Every Other Week,

No, but seriously. There'll be plenty of newspaper "counts But you could treat it in the historical spirit -like something that happened several centuries ago; De Foe's Plague of London style Heigh? What made ne think of it was Beaton If I could get hold of him, you two could go round together and take down its esthetic aspects. It's a big thing, March, this strike is. I tell you it's imposing to have a private war, as you sw. fought out this way, in the heart of New York, ind New York not minding it a bit See? Might take that view of it With your descriptions and Beaton's sketches-well, it would just be the greatest card! Come! What do you say?"

Will you undertake to make it right with Mrs. March if I'm killed and she and the children are not killed with me?"

Well, it would be difficult I wonder how it would do to get Kendricks to do the literary part?"

Ive no doubt he'd jump at the chance Ive yet to see the form of literature that Kendricks wouldn't lay " wn his life for "

Siy" March perceived that Fulkerson was about to vent another inspiration, and smiled patiently. "Look here' What's the reason we couldn't get one of the strikers to write it up for us?'

"Might have a symposium of strikers and presidents," 50 March suggested.

"No, I'm in earnest. They say some of those fellows -especially the foreigners-are educated men. I know one fellow-a Bohemian-that used to edit a Bohemian newspaper here. He could write it out in his kind of Dutch, and we could get Lindau to translate it."

"I guess not," said March dryly

"Why not? He'd do it for the cause, wouldn't he? Suppose you put it up on him, the next time you see him "

"I don't see Lindau any more," said March. He added "I guess he's renounced me along with Mr Dryfoos s money "

"Pshaw! You don't mean he hasn't been round since?" "He came for a while, but he's left off coming now I don't feel particularly gay about it," March said, with some resentment of Fulkerson's grin "He's left me in debt to him for lessons to the children"

Fulkerson laughed out "Well, he is the greatest old fool! Who'd 'a' thought he'd 'a' been in earnest with 70 those 'brincibles' of his? But I suppose there have to be just such cranks, it takes all kinds to make a world"

"There has to be one such crank, it seems," March partially assented "One's enough for me"

"I reckon this thing is nuts for Lindau, too," said Fulkerson "Why, it must act like a schooner of beer on him all the while, to see 'gabidal' embairassed like it is by this strike. It must make old Lindau feel like he was back behind those barricades at Berlin Well, he's a splendid old fellow, pity he drinks, as I remarked 80 once before"

When March left the office he did not go home so directly as he came, perhaps because Mrs March's eye was not on him He was very curious about some aspects of the strike, whose importance, as a great social convulsion, he felt people did not recognise; and with his temperance in everything, he found its negative expressions as significant as its more violent phases He had promised his wife solemnly that he would keep away from these, and he had a natural inclination to keep his promise, he had no wish to be that peaceful spectator who always gets shot when there is any firing on a mob. He interested himself in the apparent indifference of the mighty city, which kept on about its business as tranquilly as if the private war being fought out in its midst were a vague rumour of Indian troubles 10 on the frontier, and he realised how there might once have been a street feud of forty years in Florence without interfering materially with the industry and prosperity of the city. On Bioadway there was a silence where a tangle and clatter of horse-car bells and hoofs had been, but it was not very noticeable, and on the avenues, roofed by the elevated roads, this silence of the surface tracks was not noticeable at all in the roar of the trains overhead. Some of the cross-town cars were beginning to run again, with a policeman on 20 the rear of each, on the Third Avenue line, operated by non-union men, who had not struck, there were two policemen beside the driver of every car, and two beside the conductor, to protect them from the strikers But there were no strikers in sight, and on Second Avenue they stood quietly about in groups on the corners While March watched them at a safe distance, a car laden with policemen came down the track, but none of the strikers offered to molest it. In their simple Sunday best, March thought them very quiet, decent-30 looking people, and he could well believe that they had nothing to do with the riotous outbreaks in other parts of the city. He could haidly believe that there were any such outbreaks, he began more and more to think them mere newspaper exaggerations in the absence of any disturbance, or the disposition to it, that he could see He walked on to the East River Avenues A, B, and C presented the same quiet aspect as Second Avenue, groups of men stood on the corners, and now and then a police-laden car was brought unmolested down 40 the tracks before them, they looked at it and talked together, and some laughed, but there was no trouble

March got a cross-town car, and came back to the West side. A policeman, looking very sleepy and tired, lounged on the platform

"I suppose you'll be glad when this cruel war is over," March suggested, as he got in.

The officer gave him a surly glance and made him no answer.

His behaviour, from a man born to the joking give and take of our life, impressed March. It gave him, fine sense of the ferocity which he had read of the French troops putting on toward the populace just before the coup d'état; he began to feel like populare but he struggled with himself and regained his char acter of philosophical observer. In this character he remained in the car and let it carry him by the corner where he ought to have got out and gone home, and let it keep on with him to one of the furthermost tracks westward, where so much of the fighting was reported to have taken place. But everything on the way was as quiet as on the East side.

Suddenly the car stopped with so quick a turn of the brake that he was half thrown from his seat and the policeman jumped down from the platform and ran forward.

Chapter IV

Dryfoos sat at breakfast that morning with Mrs. Mando as usual to pour out his confee. Contad had already grout down-town, the two girls lay abed much later that their father breakfasted and their mother had gradually grown too feeble to come down till lunch. Suddenly Christine appeared at the door. Her face was white the edges of her hips and her eyes were blazing.

"Look here, father! Have you been saying anything to Mr Beaton?"

The old man looked up at her across his coffee-cup through his frowning brows "No"

Mrs Mandel dropped her eyes, and the spoon shook in her hand

"Then what's the reason he don't come here int more?" demanded the girl, and her glance darted from her father to Mrs Mandel 'Oh, it's you is it? I'd like to know who told you to meddle in other people's business?'

"I did," said Dryfoos savagely "I told her to ask him what he wanted here, and he said he didn't wan" anything, and he stopped coming. That's all. I did it myself."

"Oh, you did, did you?" said the girl, scarcely less insolently than she had spoken to Mrs Mandel "I should like to know what you did it for? I'd like to know what made you think I wasn't able to take care of myself. I just knew somebody had been meddling, but I didn't suppose it was you. I can manage my own affairs in my own way, if you please and I'll thank you after this to leave me to myself in what don't concern you."

"Don't concern me? You impudent jade!" her father began.

Christine advanced from the doorway toward the tible, she had her hands closed upon what seemed trinkets, some of which glittered and dangled from them. She said, "Will you go to him and tell him that this meddlesome minx here had no business to say inything about me to him, and you take it all back?"

'No!" shouted the old man "And if---"

"That's all I want of you!" the girl shouted in her turn "Here are your presents" With both hands she flung the jewels—pins and rings and earrings and bracelets—among the breakfast dishes, from which some of them sprang to the floor. She stood a moment to pull the intaglio ring from the finger where Beaton put it a year ago, and dished that at her father's plate. Then she whitled out of the room, and they heard her ranging upstairs.

The old man made a start toward her, but he fell back in his chair before she was gone, and with a fierce, grinding movement of his jaws, controlled himself. Take—take those things up," he gasped to Mrs Mandel He scemed unable to rise again from his chair, but when she asked him if he were unwell, he said no, with an air of offence, and got quickly to his feet. He mechanically picked up the intaglio ring from the table while he stood there, and put it on his little finger, his hand was not much bigger than Christine's. How do you suppose she found it out?" he asked, after a moment

'She seems to have merely suspected it," said Mrs. Mandel, in a tremor, and with the fright in her eyes which Christine's violence had brought there.

Well, it don't make any difference. She had to know, somehow, and now she knows." He started toward the door of the library, as if to go into the hall, where his hat and coat always hung

"Mr Dryfoos," palpitated Mrs Mandel, "I can't remain here, after the language your daughter has used to me— so I can't let you leave me—I—I'm afraid of her——"

"Lock yourself up, then," said the old man rudely. He added, from the hall before he went out, "I reckon she'll quiet down now."

He took the elevated road. The strike seemed a very far-off thing, though the paper he bought to look up the stock market was full of noisy typography about yesterday's troubles on the surface lines Among the millions in Wall Street there was some joking and some swearing, but not much thinking about the six thousand 60 men who had taken such chances in their attempt to better their condition Dryfoos heard nothing of the strike in the lobby of the Stock Exchange, where he spent two or three hours watching a favourite stock of his go up and go down under the betting. By the time the Exchange closed it had risen eight points, and on this and some other investments he was five thousand dollars richer than he had been in the morning. But he had expected to be richer still, and he was by no means satisfied with his luck. All through the excitement 70 of his winning and losing had played the dull, murderous rage he felt toward the child who had defied him, and when the game was over and he started home, his rage mounted into a sort of frenzy, he would teach her, he would break her He walked a long way without thinking, and then waited for a car. None came, and he hailed a passing coupé

"What has got all the cars?" he demanded of the driver, who jumped down from his box to open the door for him and get his direction

"Been away" asked the driver. "Hasn't been any car along for a week Strike."

"Oh yes," said Dryfoos He felt suddenly giddy, and he remained staring at the driver after he had taken his seat.

The man asked, "Where to?"

Dryfoos could not think of his street or number, and he said with uncontrollable fury, "I told you once! Go up to West Eleventh, and drive along slow on the south side; I'll show you the place."

He could not remember the number of Every Other Week office, where he suddenly decided to stop before he went home. He wished to see Fulkerson, and ask him something about Beaton whether he had been about lately, and whether he had dropped any hint of what had happened concerning Christine, Dryfoos believed that Fulkerson was in the fellow's confidence

There was nobody but Conrad in the counting-room, whither Dryfoos returned after glancing into Fulkerson's empty office "Where's Fulkerson?" he asked, sitting down with his hat on.

"He went out a few moments ago," said Conrad, glancing at the clock "I'm afraid he isn't coming back again to-day, if you wanted to see him."

Dryfoos twisted his head sidewise and upward to indicate March's room. "That other fellow out, too?"

"He went just before Mr Fulkerson," answered Conrad

"Do you generally knock off here in the middle of the afternoon?" asked the old man

"No," said Conrad, as patiently as if his father had 20 not been there a score of times, and found the whole staff of Every Other Week at work between four and five 'Mr March, you know, always takes a good deal of his work home with him, and I suppose Mr Fulkerson went out so early because there isn't much doing to-day. Perhaps it's the strike that makes it dull'

"The strike—yes! It's a pretty piece of business to have everything thrown out because a parcel of lazy hounds want a chance to lay off and get drunk. Dryfoos seemed to think Conrad would make some answer to this, but the young mans mild face merely saddened, and he said nothing. "The got a coupé out there now that I had to take because I couldn't get a car. If I had my way I'd have a lot of those vagabonds hung. They re waiting to get the city into a snarl, and then rob the houses—pack of duty, worthless whelps. They ought to call out the militia, and fire into 'em. Clubbing is too good for them. Contad was still silent, and his father sneered, "But I reckon you don't think so."

"I think the strike is uscless," said Contad

40 "Oh, you do, do you? Comin' to your senses a little. Gettin' tired walkin so much 1 should like to know what your gentlemen over there on the East side think about the strike, anyway."

The young fellow dropped his eyes, "I am not authorised to speak for them,"

"Oh, indeed! And perhaps you're not authorised to speak for yourself?"

"Father, you know we don't agree about these things. I'd rather not talk——"

"But I'm goin' to make you talk this time!" cried & Dryfoos, striking the arm of the chair he sat in with the side of his fist. A maddening thought of Christine came over him "As long as you eat my blead, you have got to do as I say. I won't have my children telling me what I shall do and sha'n't do, or take on airs of being holier than me. Now, you just speak up! Do you think those loafers are right, or don't you? Come!"

Conrad apparently judged it best to speak "I think they were very foolish to strike—at this time, when the elevated roads can do the work."

"Oh, at this time, heigh! And I suppose they think over there on the East side that it d been wise to strike before we got the elevated." Conrad again refused to answer, and his father roated, "What do you think?"

"I think a strike is always bad business. It's war, but sometimes there don't seem any other way for the working men to get justice. They say that sometimes strikes do raise the wages, after a while."

"Those lazy devils were paid enough already' shrieked the old man "They got two dollars a day. How much do you think they ought to a gor/ Twenty/

Conrad hesitated with a beseeching look at his father. But he decided to answer "The men say that with partial work, and fines and other things they get sometimes a dollar, and sometimes ninety cents a day."

"They lie, and you know they lie," said his father rising and coming toward him. 'And what do you think the upshot of it all will be, after they ve ruined business for another week, and made people hire hacks, and stolen the money of honest men? How is it going to a end?"

"They will have to give in"

"Oh, give in, heigh! And what will you say then I should like to know? How will you feel about it then? Speak!"

"I shall feel as I do now I know you don't think that way, and I don't blame you—or anybody But if I have got to say how I shall feel, why, I shall feel sorry they didn't succeed, for I believe they have a righteous cause though they go the wrong way to help themselves"

His father came close to him, his eyes blazing, his teeth set "Do you date to say that to me?"

"Yes I can't help it I pity them, my whole heart is with those poor men"

"You impudent puppy!" shouted the old man He lifted his hand and struck his son in the face Contad aught his hand with his own left, and while the blood began to trickle from a wound that Christine's intaglio ring had made in his temple, he looked at him with a 6 kind of grieving wonder, and said, "Father!"

The old man wrenched his fist away, and ran out of the house He remembered his address now, and he gave it as he plunged into the coupé He trembled with his evil passion, and glared out of the windows at the passers as he drove home, he only saw Conrad's mild grieving, wondering eyes, and the blood slowly trickling from the wound in his temple

Conrad went to the neat set-bowl in Fulkerson's comtortable room, and washed the blood away, and kept , bithing the wound with the cold water till it stopped bleeding The cut was not deep, and he thought he would not put anything on it After a while he locked up the office, and started out, he hardly knew where But he walked on, in the direction he had taken till he found himself in Union Square on the pavement in front of Brentano's It seemed to him that he heard some one calling gently to him, "Mr Diyfoos!"

Chapter V

Conrad looked confusedly around, and the same voice said again, "Mr Dryfoos!" and he saw that it was a lady y speaking to him from a coupé beside the curbing, and then he saw that it was Miss Vance.

She smiled when he gave signs of having discovered her, and came up to the door of her carriage "I am so glad to meet you I have been longing to talk to somebody, nobody seems to teel about it as I do Oh, isn't it horrible? Must they fail? I saw cars running on all the lines as I came across, it made me sick at heart Must those brave fellows give in? And everybody seems to pate them so-I can't bear it" Her face was estranged with excitement, and there were traces of tears on it. You must think me almost crazy to stop you in the street this way, but when I caught sight of you I had to speak I knew you would sympathise—I knew you would feel as I do Oh, how can anybody help honouring those poor men for standing by one another as they do? They are risking all they have in the world for the sake of justice! Oh, they are true heroes! They are staking the bread of their wives and children on the dreadful chance they've taken! But no one seems to understand it No one seems to see that they are willing to suffer more 50 now that other poor men may suffer less hereafter And those wretched creatures that are coming in to take their places—those traitors—"

"We can't blame them for wanting to earn a living, Miss Vance," said Conrad

"No, no! I don't blame them Who am I, to do such a thing? It's we-people like me, of my class-who make the poor betray one another But this dreadful fighting-this hideous paper is full of it" She held up an extra, crumpled with her nervous reading "Can't 60 something be done to stop it? Don't you think that if some one went among them, and tried to make them see how perfectly hopeless it was to resist the companies, and drive off the new men, he might do some good? I have wanted to go and try, but I am a woman, and I mustn't! I shouldn't be afraid of the strikers, but I'm afraid of what people would say!" Conrad kept pressing his handkerchief to the cut in his temple, which he thought might be bleeding, and now she noticed this "Are you huit, Mr Dryfoos? You look so pale"

"No, it's nothing-a little scratch I've got"

"Indeed you look pale Have you a carriage? How will you get home? Will you get in here with me, and let me drive you?"

"No, no," said Conrad, smiling at her excitement "I'm perfectly well---"

"And you don't think I'm foolish and wicked for stopping you here, and talking in this way! But I know you feel as I do!"

"Yes, I feel as you do You are right—right in every 80 way-I mustn't keep you-Good-bye" He stepped back to bow, but she put her beautiful hand out of the window, and when he took it she wring his hand hard

"Thank you, thank you' You are good and you are just! But no one can do anything It's useless!"

The type of irreproachable coachman on the box whose respectability had suffered through the strange behaviour of his mistress in this interview, drove quickly off at her signal, and Conrad stood a moment looking after the carriage. His heart was full of joy, it leaped; he thought it would burst. As he turned to walk away it seemed to him as if he mounted upon the air The trust she had shown him, the praise she had given him, that crush of the hand he hoped nothing, he formed no idea from it, but it all filled him with love that cast out the pain and shame he had been suffering. He believed 10 that he could never be unhappy any more, the hardness that was in his mind toward his father went out of it; he saw how sorely he had tried him, he grieved that he had done it, but the means, the difference of his feelings about the cause of their quarrel, he was solemnly glad of that since she shared it He was only sorry for his father "Poor father!" he said under his breath as he went along He explained to her about his father in his reverse, and she pitied his father too.

He was walking over toward the West side, aimlessly 20 at first, and then at times with the longing to do something to save those mistaken men from themselves forming itself into a purpose Was not that what she meant, when she bewailed her woman's helplessness? She must have wished him to try, if he, being a man, could not do something, or if she did not, still he would try, and if she heard of it, she would recall what she had said, and would be glad he had understood her so Thinking of her pleasure in what he was going to do, he forgot almost what it was, but when he came to a street-car track 30 he remembered it, and looked up and down to see if there were any turbulent gathering of men, whom he might mingle with and help to keep from violence He saw none anywhere, and then suddenly, as if at the same moment, for in his exalted mood all events had a dreamlike simultaneity, he stood at the corner of an avenue, and in the middle of it, a little way off, was a street-car, and around the car a tumult of shouting, cursing, struggling men The driver was lashing his horses forward, and a policeman was at their heads, with the conductor, 10 pulling them, stones, clubs, brick-bats hailed upon the car, the horses, the men trying to move them The mob closed upon them in a body, and then a patrol-wagon whirled up from the other side, and a squad of policemen leaped out, and began to club the rioters Conrad could see how they struck them under the rims of their hats; the blows on their skulls sounded as if they had fallen on stone; the rioters ran in all directions.

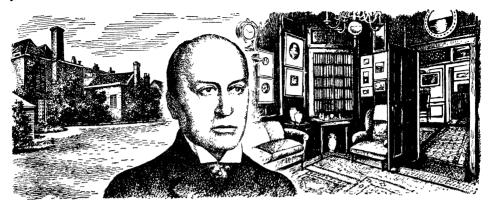

One of the officers rushed up toward the corner where Conrad stood, and then he saw at his side a tall old man with a long white beard. He was calling out at the police- at man "Ah yes! Glup the strikerss—gif it to them! Why don't you co and glup the bresidents that insoalt your lawss, and gick your Boart of Arpidration out-of-toors? Glup the strikerss—they cot no friendts! They cot no money to pribe you, to dreat you!"

The officer lifted his club, and the old man threw his left arm up to shield his head Conrad recognised Lindau, and now he saw the empty sleeve dangle in the air, over the stump of his wrist. He heard a shot in that turmoil beside the car, and something seemed to strike thim in the breast. He was going to say to the policeman, "Don't strike him! He's an old soldier! You see he has no hand!" but he could not speak, he could not move his tongue. The policeman stood there, he saw his face it was not bad, not cruel, it was like the face of a statue, fixed, perdurable, a mere image of irresponsible and involuntary authority. Then Conrad fell forward, pierced through the heart by that shot fired from the car.

March heard the shot as he scrambled out of his car, and at the same moment he saw Lindau drop under the club of the policeman, who left him where he fell, and joined the rest of the squad in pursuing the rioters. The fighring round the car in the avenue ceased, the driver whipped his horses into a gallop, and the place was left empty.

March would have liked to run, he thought how his wife had imploied him to keep away from the rioting, but he could not have left Lindau lying there if he would Something stronger than his will drew him to the spot and there he saw Conrad dead beside the old man....

[The concluding chapters tell briefly of the death of Lindau, the remorse of Dryfoos for his treatment of his son, the transfer of the ownership of Every Other Week from Dryfoos to Fulkerson and March, the Dryfooses' departure for Europe, the marriage of Fulkerson and Miss Woodburn, and the entrance of Margaret Vance into an order of nuns. Thus Howells concludes his rich and varied study of the New York of the 1880's]

Henry James

1843 • 1916

Although he was born in New York and lived for a number of years in Boston, Cambridge, and Newport, Henry James was an expatriate. In his early life, the frequent removals of his family from place to place prevented him from taking root anywhere. There were long and repeated visits to Europe—to England, Germany, France, Switzerland, Italy—and intermittent sojourns in America. By the time he had reached maturity, periodic migrations had become a habit—especially migrations to Europe

lames wanted to be a writer of fiction, but he had difficulty in finding his proper milieu. He was aware of the importance of roots to the creative artist, for in an early essay on the Russian novelist Turgeney, he said, "His works savor strongly of his native soil, like those of all great novelists." But Europe attracted James more compellingly than his native land he had been more exposed to European influences and he felt acutely the inferiority of America in the arts. An American in one of his early stories exclaims. "We're the disinherited of Art! We're condemned to be superficial! We're excluded from the magic circle! The soil of American perception is a poor little barren artificial deposit! Yes, we're wedded to imperfection! An American, to excel, has just ten times as much to learn as a European!"

Europe, then, it would have to be, perhaps he could take root there. After an important year in Paris (1875-1876), where he came under the influence, in varying degrees, of Turgenev, Maupassant, Flaubert, Daudet, and Zola, he began in England a residence which proved to be permanent. For some twenty years (1877-1897), he lived principally in London, and for almost another twenty years (1897-1916), he lived principally at Rye. During these years, however, he continued his frequent excursions to the Continent, and three or four times he revisited the United States. As early as 1880 he could report that he felt himself to be "a thoroughly naturalized Londoner." But it was not until 1915, when he was seventy-two, that James, apparently in protest against American isolationism during the early years of the first World War, became a British subject.

James' output was prodigiously large, consisting chiefly of literary criticism, short stories, and novels The literary criticism is acute consider, as examples, his Hawthorne (1879), the essays on Emerson and George Eliot in Partial Portraits (1888), the essay on Zola in Notes on Novelists (1914), and the Prefaces to the novels (added in 1907) His short stories often show him at his best. But despite the excellence of the criticism and the short fiction, James is important chiefly for his novels, of which the following titles are a partial list Roderick Hudson (1876), The American (1877), The Portrait of a Lady (1881), The Bostonians (1886), The Tragic Muse (1890), The Spoils of Poynton (1897), What Matsie Knew (1897), The Wings of the Dove (1902), The Ambassadors (1903), The Golden Bowl (1901) James himself regarded The Ambassadors as "frankly, quite the best 'all round' of his productions, and next to The Ambaisadors, he preferred The Portrait of a Lady.

James began as a writer of the "international novel" Roderick Hudson is a young American painter who goes to Italy to study his air Christopher Newman, in The American, is a retired American manufacturer who goes to Paris to acquire culture- and a wife. Isabel Archer, in The Portrait of a Lady, is an intelligent, spirited American girl who, after various experiences in England and on the Continent, marries, and lives in Rome. In this early work "the 'international' light," James said, "lay, to my sense, thick and rich upon the scene." These writings, and many others, are comparative studies of the European and American cultures Europe, of course, is the home of the arts and of "high civilization" America is culturally raw. But this is only half of the picture which James presents. The other half has to do with character and morals, and in this department, James' Americans carry off the honors. Against the background of a tarnished European society, Christopher Newman Isabel Archer, Lambert Strether (in The Ambassadori are seen as shining examples of moral rectitude and fineness of feeling. It is impossible to escape the conclusion that, as highly as James valued the sophistication of Europe, he valued even more highly the moral idealism of America. It was not for nothing that he had lived however intermittently, in New England and had read the New England writers.

James continued to employ international characters and comparisons But in his later work, the international theme is less emphasized (except in The Ambassadors, where it is again prominent), and he becomes increasingly interested in psychological processes and in "method" The books which show the full maturity of his art are The Wings of the Dove, The Ambassadors, and The Golden Bowl, and it is probably upon these works that his fame will ultimately rest. The "method in this mature fiction consists in placing a character in a difficult and complex social situation, and then showing his growing awareness, step by step, of the situation in all of its subtleties and refinements. The author muiages the "point of view" in such a way as to exploit the limited insights of certain characters. In The Golden Bo.cl. for example, the first half of the story is told (in the third person) from the point of view of the Prince, the second half is told from the point of view of the Princess In The Ambaisadors, the most perfect embodiment of his method, the entire story is told (in the third person) from the point of view of Lambert Strether In the Pieface to that novel, James speaks of "the major propriety of employing but one centre and keeping it all within my hero's compass persons were to people the scene, and each with his or But Strether's sense of these things her axe to grind and Strether's only, should avail me for showing them I should know them but through his more or less groping knowledge of them, since his very gropings would figure among his most interesting motions . . ." The result would be, he goes on to say, "unity," "intensity," and in short, "composition," which alone is "positive beauty"

Many American readers have found James not at all to their liking Their objections are sufficiently embodied in the following severe judgments by Parrington "James romanticization of European culture worked to his undoing, for it constrained the artist to a lifelong pursuit of intangible realities that existed only in his imagination

I ven in his subtle psychological inquiries he remained stat up within his own skull-pan. His characters are only projections of his brooding fancy, externalizations of by pothetical subtleties." It is true that James was alienared from America and that he became increasingly obsessed with psychological subtleties which he described in an increasingly difficult style Quite possibly, however, Parrington, and those who agree with the judgments just quoted do James less than justice. It may be urged that there is more of America in James' books than appears at first glance His books contain scores of Americans, his most admirable characters are, repeatedly, Americans and, paradoxically enough in view of his high regard for the "culture" of Europe, his Europeans and his luropeanized Americans are likely to betray a moral decadence—a moral decadence which the author unmiswhably condemns America does not come off nearly so pidiy in James' books as some suppose, nor Europe nearly so well. It is arguable, moreover, that the psychological subtleties of the later works have a valid basis in fact. Civilized human relations are almost infinitely complex and subtle. Most novelists greatly simplify, or pass superficially over, these relations, James was, one may say, a specialist in them. He was perhaps the first novelist to recognize to the fullest the complexities which may grow out of the relationship of one sensitive personality to another, and to record them with fine discrimination and microscopic detail. The reading of his best work requires attention and patience, but it may be, funder the right persuasion, an immensely rewarding experience.

Hawthorne

THE HOUSE OF THE SEVEN GABLES

Eawthorne belonged to the older, romantic period of the novel, while James represented the new era of realism in writing about Hawthorne, therefore, James quite naturally was thinking of, among other things, the differences between the two styles or modes "It cannot be too often repeated," he said, "that Hawthorne was not a realist

He never attempted to render exactly or closely the actual facts of the society that surrounded him." Hawmorne's story is of interest, James pointed out, not so much for its own sake as for its "symbolic" value. The characters of The House of the Seven Gables "are all figures rather than characters—they are all pictures rather than persons", they are "light and vague", "they are all types of something general". James felt, however, that Hawthorne's method was well adapted to his characters, with a single exception the portrait of Holgrave, who represents the modern American, would have profited, he thought, by the realistic method

James recognized Hawthorne's greatness despite "the absence of the realistic mode of treatment". He admired Hawthorne's art. He was willing to admit that Hawthorne's method was nearly always suited to his subject matter and purpose. And he found in The House of the Seven Gables the characteristic which all great fiction, whether romantic or realistic, must possess—the "hum of the whole multitudinous life of man."

The House of the Seven Gables was written at Lenox, among the mountains of Massachusetts, a village nestling, rather loosely, in one of the loveliest corners of New England, to which Hawthorne had betaken himself after the success of The Searlet Letter became conspicuous, in the summer of 1850, and where he occupied for two years an uncomfortable little red house, which is now pointed out to the inquiring stranger. The inquiring stranger is now a frequent figure at Lenox, for the place has suffered the process of lionisation. It has become a prosperous watering-place, or at least (as there are no waters), as they say in America, a summer-resort. It is a brilliant and generous landscape, and thirty years ago a man of fancy, desiring to apply himself, might have found both inspiration and tranquillity there Hawthorne of found so much of both that he wrote more during his two years of residence at Lenox than at any period of his career He began with The House of the Seven Gables, which was finished in the early part of 1851 This is the longest of his three American novels, it is the most elaborate, and in the judgment of some persons it is the finest. It is a rich, delightful, imaginative work, larger and more various than its companions, and full of all sorts of deep intentions, of interwoven threads of suggestion But it is not so rounded and complete as The 20 Scarlet Letter, it has always seemed to me more like a prologue to a great novel than a great novel itself I think this is partly owing to the fact that the subject, the donnée, as the French say, of the story, does not quite fill it out, and that we get at the same time an impression of certain complicated purposes on the author's part, which seem to reach beyond it. I call it larger and more various than its companions, and it has, indeed, a greater richness of tone and density of detail. The colour, so to speak, of The House of the Seven Gables is admirable. 30 But the story has a sort of expansive quality which never wholly fructifies, and as I lately laid it down, after reading it for the third time, I had a sense of having interested myself in a magnificent fragment. Yet the book has a great fascination, and of all of those of its author's productions which I have read over while writing this sketch, it is perhaps the one that has gained most by reperusal If it be true of the others that the pure, natural quality of the imaginative strain is their great merit, this is at least as true of The House of the Seven Gables, the 40 charm of which is in a peculiar degree of the kind that we fail to reduce to its grounds-like that of the sweetness of a piece of music, or the softness of fine September weather. It is vague, indefinable, ineffable, but it is the sort of thing we must always point to in justification of the high claim that we make for Hawthorne. In this case, of course, its vagueness is a drawback, for it is difficult to point to ethereal beauties, and if the reader whom we have wished to inoculate with our admiration inform us, after looking awhile, that he perceives nothing in particular, we can only reply that, in effect, the object is a delicate one.

The House of the Seven Gables comes nearer being a picture of contemporary American life than either of its companions, but on this ground it would be a mistake to make a large claim for it. It cannot be too often repeated that Hawthorne was not a realist. He had a high sense of reality-his Note-Books superabundantly testify to it, and fond as he was of jotting down the items that make it up, he never attempted to render exactly or closely the actual facts of the society that surrounded α him I have said—I began by saying—that his pages were full of its spirit, and of a certain reflected light that springs from it, but I was careful to add that the reader must look for his local and national qualities between the lines of his writing and in the indirect testimony of his tone, his accent, his temper, of his very omissions and suppressions The House of the Seven Gables has however, more literal actuality than the others, and if it were not too fanciful an account of it, I should say that it renders, to an initiated reader, the impression of a summer afternoon in an elm-shadowed New England town It leaves upon the mind a vague correspondence to some such reminiscence, and in stirring up the association it renders it delightful The comparison is to the honour of the New England town, which gains in it more than it bestows. The shadows of the elms, in The House of the Seven Gables, are exceptionally dense and cool, the summer afternoon is peculiarly still and beautiful, the atmosphere has a delicious warmth, and the long daylight seems to pause and rest. But the mild provincial quality : is there, the mixture of shabbiness and freshness the paucity of ingredients. The end of an old race-this is the situation that Hawthorne has depicted, and he has been admirably inspired in the choice of the figures in whom he seeks to interest us. They are all figures rather than characters—they are all pictures rather than persons But if their reality is light and vague, it is sufficient, and it is in harmony with the low relief and dimness of outline of the objects that surrounded them. They are all types, to the author's mind, of something general, of something that is bound up with the history, at large, of families and individuals, and each of them is the centre of a cluster of those ingenious and meditative musings, rather melancholy, as a general thing, than joyous, which melt into the current and texture of the story and give it kind of moral richness A grotesque old spinster, simple childish, penniless, very humble at heart, but rigidly conscious of her pedigree, an amiable bachelor, of an epicurean temperament and an enfeebled intellect, who has passed twenty years of his life in penal confinement for a crime of which he was unjustly pronounced guilty, a sweet-natured and bright-faced young girl from the country, a poor relation of these two ancient decreptudes, with whose moral mustiness her modern freshness and soundness are contrasted, a young man still more modern, holding the latest opinions, who has sought his fortune up and down the world, and, though he has not found it, takes a genial and enthusiastic view of the future these, with two or three remarkable accessory figurcs are the persons concerned in the little drama. The drama is a small one, but as Hawthorne does not put it before us for its own superficial sake, for the dry facts of the case, but for something in it which he holds to be symbolic and of large application, something that points a moral and that it behooves us to remember, the scenes in the rusty wooden house whose gables give its name to the story, have something of the dignity both of history and of tragedy Miss Hepzibah Pyncheon, dragging out a disappointed life in her paternal dwelling, finds herself obliged in her old age to open a little shop for the sale of penny toys and gingerbread This is the central incident of the tale, and, as Hawthorne relates it, it is an incident of the most impressive magnitude and most touching interest Her dishonoured and vague-minded brother is released from prison at the same moment, and teturns to the ancestral 100f to deepen her perplexities. But on the other hand, to alleviate them, and to introduce a breath of the air of the outer world into this long "mentilated interior, the little country cousin also arrives, and proves the good angel of the feebly distracted household All this episode is exquisite—admirably conceived and executed, with a kind of humorous tenderness, an equal sense of everything in it that is picturesque, touching, ridiculous, worthy of the highest praise Hepzibah 50 Pyncheon, with her near-sighted scowl, her rusty joints, her antique turban, her map of a great territory to the eastward which ought to have belonged to her family, her vain terrors, and scruples, and resentments, the inaptitude and repugnance of an ancient gentlewoman to the vulgar little commerce which a cruel fate has compelled her to engage in-Hepzibah Pyncheon is a masterly picture I repeat that she is a picture, as her companions are pictures, she is a charming piece of descriptive writing, rather than a dramatic exhibition. But she is de- 60 scribed like her companions, too, so subtly and lovingly that we enter into her virginal old heart and stand with her behind her abominable little counter Clifford Pyncheon is a still more remarkable conception, though he is, perhaps, not so vividly depicted. It was a figure needing a much more subtle touch, however, and it was of the essence of his character to be vague and unemphasised. Nothing can be more charming than the manner in which the soft, bright, active presence of Phoebe Pyncheon is indicated, or than the account of her relations 70 with the poor, dimly sentient kinsman for whom her light-handed sisterly offices, in the evening of a melancholy life, are a revelation of lost possibilities of happiness "In her aspect," Hawthorne says of the young girl, "there was a familiar gladness, and a holiness that you could play with, and yet reverence it as much as ever She was like a prayer offered up in the homeliest beauty of one's mother-tongue Fresh was Phoebe, moreover, and airy, and sweet in her apparel, as if nothing that she wore-neither her gown, not her small straw bonnet, 80, nor her little kerchief, any more than her snowy stockings-had ever been put on before, or, if worn, were all the fresher for it, and with a fragrance as if they had lain among the rose-buds" Of the influence of her maidenly salubrity upon poor Clifford, Hawthorne gives the prettiest description, and then, breaking off suddenly, renounces the attempt in language which, while pleading its inadequacy, conveys an exquisite satisfaction to the reader. I quote the passage for the sake of its extreme felicity, and of the charming image with which it 90 concludes.

"But we strive in vain to put the idea into words. No adequate expression of the beauty and profound bathos with which it impresses us is attainable This being, made only for happiness, and heretofore so miserably failing to be happy—his tendencies so hideously thwarted that, some unknown time ago, the delicate springs of his character, never morally or intellectually strong, had given way, and he was now imbecile-this poor forloin voyager from the Islands of the Blest, in a frail bark, on a tempestuous sea, had been flung by the last mountain-wave of his shipwreck into a quiet harbour. There, as he lay more than half lifeless on the strand, the fragrance of an earthly rose-bud had come to his nostrils, and. as odours will, had summoned up reminiscences or visions of all the living and breathing beauty amid which he should have had his home. With his native susceptibility of happy influences, he inhales the slight ethereal rapture into his soul, and expires!"

I have not mentioned the personage in The House of the Seven Gables upon whom Hawthorne evidently be-20 stowed most pains, and whose portrait is the most elaborate in the book, partly because he is, in spite of the space he occupies, an accessory figure, and partly because, even more than the others, he is what I have called a picture rather than a character Judge Pyncheon is an ironical portrait, very richly and broadly executed, very sagaciously composed and rendered-the portrait of a superb, full-blown hypocrite, a large-based, full-nurtured Pharisee, bland, urbane, impressive, diffusing about him a "sultry" warmth of benevolence, as the author calls it 30 again and again, and basking in the noontide of prosperity and the consideration of society, but in reality hard, gross, and ignoble Judge Pyncheon is an elaborate piece of description, made up of a hundred admirable touches, in which satire is always winged with fancy and fancy is linked with a deep sense of reality. It is difficult to say whether Hawthorne followed a model in describing Judge Pyncheon but it is tolerably obvious that the picture is an impression—a copious impression—of an individual. It has evidently a definite starting-point in 40 fact, and the author is able to draw, freely and confidently, after the image established in his mind Holgrave, the modern young man, who has been a Jack-ofall-trades, and is at the period of the story a daguerreotypist, is an attempt to render a kind of national typethat of the young citizen of the United States whose fortune is simply in his lively intelligence, and who stands naked, as it were, unbiased and unencumbered alike, in the centre of the far-stretching level of American life Holgrave is intended as a contrast, his lack of traditions, his democratic stamp, his condensed experience, are opposed to the desiccated prejudices and exhausted vitality of the race of which poor feebly-scowling, rusty-jointed Hepzibah is the most heroic representative. It is, perhaps, a pity that Hawthorne should not have proposed to himself to give the old Pyncheon qualities some embodiment which would help them to balance more fairly with the elastic properties of the young daguerreotypist-should not have painted a lusty conservative to match his strenuous radical. As it is, the mustiness and mouldiness of the tenants of the House of s the Seven Gables crumble away rather too easily Evi dently, however, what Hawthorne designed to represent was not the struggle between an old society and a new. for in this case he would have given the old one a better chance, but simply, as I have said, the shrinkage and extinction of a family This appealed to his imagination. and the idea of long perpetuation and survival always appears to have filled him with a kind of horror and disapproval Conservative, in a certain degree, as he was himself, and fond of retrospect and quietude and the 7 mellowing influences of time, it is singular how often one encounters in his writings some expression of mistrust of old houses old institutions, long lines of descent He was disposed, apparently, to allow a very moderate measure in these respects, and he condemns the dwelling of the Pyncheons to disappear from the face of the earth because it has been standing a couple of hundred years In this he was an American of Americans, or, rather, he was more American than many of his countrymen, who though they are accustomed to work for the short run rather than the long have often a lurking esteem for things that show the marks of having lasted I will add that Holgrave is one of the few figures, among those which Hawthorne created, with regard to which the absence of the realistic mode of treatment is felt as a loss Holgrave is not sharply enough characterised, he lacks features, he is not an individual, but a type But my last word about this admirable novel must not be a restrictive one. It is a large and generous production pervaded with that vague hum, that indefinable echo, of the whole multitudinous life of man, which is the real sign of a great work of fiction. . . .

The Art of Fiction

James was at odds with two schools of fiction popular in this period the school of romantic adventure, best represented by Robert Louis Stevenson, and the school of detailed social documentation—the naturalistic school—best represented by Émile Zola James own work was neither adventurous nor "sociological". With a minimum of plot, in the usual sense of the term, and of external details, James' stories tended more and more to concentrate upon the fascinating problem of the expanding consciousness of a character. The result was much less popular than the work of the other schools, and James felt the challenge.

To those of the naturalistic school, who insisted that the novelist should write from a large and varied experience of life, James replied that experience is properly "an immense sensibility" and that insight is more important than experience as ordinarily construed. The English woman novelist (in James' illustration) who succeeded so admirably in giving a convincing picture of French Protestant youth had had, as a matter of "experience," only a momentary glimpse of such a group, but she had had the all-important faculty of "insight" To those who insisted upon exciting incident, James answered that excitement does not necessarily consist of physical action, does not absolutely require moving accidents by flood and field It is an incident," he remarked characteristically, "for a woman to stand up with her hand resting on a table and look out at you in a certain way"—an exciting incident, too, he meant to imply, particularly if the young woman happened to be Miss Isabel Archer in The Portrait of a Lady. The "psychological" subjects, he argued, have an interest and validity of their own For example, the "moral consciousness of a child," which Edmond de Goncourt and George Eliot had employed with varying success, and which James himself was to employ, rather abstrusely, in What Maisie Knew, may be more exciting to a subtle intelligence than Stevenson's adventures on the Spanish Main From James standpoint, the first is the more valid subject because it comes within the range of every readers experience, while the second subject is known to most readers "only in supposition."

Both in motivation, therefore, and in its essential argument, James' essay was a criticism of popular current schools of fiction and a spirited defense of his own fictional practice.

"The Art of Fiction" was first published in Longman's Magazine in 1884, it was collected with other essays in Partial Portraits in 1888

I should not have affixed so comprehensive a title to these few remarks, necessarily wanting in any completeness upon a subject the full consideration of which would carry us far, did I not seem to discover a pretext for my temerity in the interesting pamphlet lately published under this name by Mr Walter Besant Mr Besant's lecture at the Royal Institution-the original form of his pamphlet-appears to indicate that many persons are interested in the art of fiction, and are not indifferent to such remarks, as those who practise it may 10 attempt to make about it. I am therefore anxious not to lose the benefit of this favourable association, and to edge in a few words under cover of the attention which M1 Besant is sure to have excited There is something very encouraging in his having put into form certain of his ideas on the mystery of story-telling.

It is a proof of life and curiosity—curiosity on the part of the brotherhood of novelists as well as on the part of their readers. Only a short time ago it might have been supposed that the English novel was not what 20 the French call discribble. It had no air of having a theory a conviction, a consciousness of itself behind it—of being the expression of an artistic faith, the result of choice and comparison. I do not say it was necessarily the worse for that, it would take much more courage than I possess to intimate that the form of the novel as Dickens and Thackeray (for instance) saw it had any taint of incompleteness. It was, however, naif (if I may help myself out with another French word), and evidently if it be destined to suffer in any way for having lost its naiveté it has now an idea of making sure of the corresponding advantages. During the period I have alluded to there was a comfortable good-humoured feeling abroad that a novel is a novel, as a pudding is a pudding, and that our only business with it could be to swallow it But within a year or two, for some reason or other, there have been signs of returning animationthe era of discussion would appear to have been to a certain extent opened. Art lives upon discussion, upon experiment, upon curiosity, upon variety of attempt, upon the exchange of views and the comparison of standpoints, and there is a presumption that those times when no one has anything particular to say about it, and has no reason to give for practice or preference, though they may be times of honour, are not times of development are times, possibly, even a little of dulness. The successful application of any art is a delightful spectacle, but the theory too is interesting, and though there is a great deal 20 of the latter without the former I suspect there has never been a genuine success that has not had a latent core of conviction Discussion, suggestion, formulation, these things are fertilizing when they are frank and sincere Mr Besant has set an excellent example in saying what he thinks, for his part, about the way in which fiction should be written, as well as about the way in which it should be published, for his view of the "art," carried on into an appendix, covers that too Other labourers in the same field will doubtless take up the argument, they 30 will give it the light of their experience, and the effect will surely be to make our interest in the novel a little more what it had for some time threatened to fail to be -a serious, active, inquiring interest, under protection of which this delightful study may, in moments of confidence, venture to say a little more what it thinks of itself

It must take itself seriously for the public to take it so. The old superstition about fiction being "wicked" has doubtless died out in England, but the spirit of it lingers in a certain oblique regard directed toward any story which does not more or less admit that it is only a joke. Even the most jocular novel feels in some degree the weight of the proscription that was formerly directed against literary levity the jocularity does not always succeed in passing for orthodoxy. It is still expected, though perhaps people are ashamed to say it, that a production which is after all only a "make-believe" (for what else is a "story"?) shall be in some degree apologetic-shall renounce the pretension of attempting really to represent life. This, of course, any sensible, wide awake story declines to do, for it quickly perceives that the tolerance granted to it on such a condition is only an attempt to stifle it disguised in the form of generosity The old evangelical hostility to the novel, which was as explicit as it was narrow, and which regarded it as little less favourable to our immortal part than a stage-play, was in reality far less insulting. The only reason for the existence of a novel is that it does attempt to represent life When it relinquishes this attempt, the same attempt that we see on the canvas of the painter, it will have arrived at a very strange pass. It is not expected of the picture that it will make itself humble in order to be forgiven, and the analogy between the art of the painter and the art of the novelist is, so far as I am able to see, complete Their inspiration is the same, their process (allowing for the different quality of the vehicle) is the same, their success is the same. They may learn from each other, they may explain and sustain each other Their cause is the same, and the honour of one is the honour of another The Mahometans think a picture an unholy thing, but it is a long time since any Christian did and it is therefore the more odd that in the Christian mind the traces (dissimulated though they may be) of a suspicion of the sister art should linger to this day. The only effectual way to lay it to rest is to emphasize the analogy to which I just alluded-to insist on the fact that as the picture is reality, so the novel is history That is the only general description (which does it justice) that we may give of the novel But history also is allowed to represent life, it is not, any more than painting, expected : to apologize The subject-matter of fiction is stored up likewise in documents and records, and if it will not give itself away, as they say in California, it must speak with assurance, with the tone of the historian Certain accomplished novelists have a habit of giving themselves away which must often bring tears to the eyes of people who take their fiction seriously. I was lately struck, in reading over many pages of Anthony Trollope, with his want of discretion in this particular. In a digression, a parenthesis or an aside, he concedes to the reader that (he and this trusting friend are only "making believe" He admits that the events he narrates have not really happened, and that he can give his narrative any turn the reader may like best. Such a betrayal of a sacred office seems to me, I confess, a terrible crime, it is what I mean by the attitude of apology, and it shocks me every whit as much in Trollope as it would have shocked me in Gibbon or Macaulay It implies that the novelist is less occupied in looking for the truth (the truth, of course I mean, that he assumes, the premises that we must grant him, whatever they may be) than the historian, and in a doing so it deprives him at a stroke of all his standingroom. To represent and illustrate the past, the actions of men, is the task of either writer, and the only difference that I can see is, in proportion as he succeeds, to the honour of the novelist, consisting as it does in his having more difficulty in collecting his evidence, which is so tar from being purely literary. It seems to me to give him a great character, the fact that he has at once so much in common with the philosopher and the painter, this double analogy is a magnificent heritage

It is of all this evidently that Mr Besant is full when he insists upon the fact that fiction is one of the fine arts deserving in its turn of all the honours and emoluments that have hitherto been reserved for the successful profession of music, poetry, painting, architecture. It is impossible to insist too much on so important a truth, and the place that Mr Besant demands for the work of the novelist may be represented, a trifle less abstractly, by saying that he demands not only that it shall be reputed artistic, but that it shall be reputed very artistic ndeed It is excellent that he should have struck this note, for his doing so indicates that there was need of it, that his proposition may be to many people a novelty One rubs one's eyes at the thought, but the rest of Mr Besant's essay confirms the revelation I suspect in truth that it would be possible to confirm it still further, and that one would not be far wrong in saying that in addition to the people to whom it has never occurred that a novel ought to be artistic, there are a great many others who, if this principle were urged upon them would be filled with an indefinable mistrust. They would and it difficult to explain their repugnance, but it would operate strongly to put them on their guard "Art' in our Protestant communities, where so many things have got so strangely twisted about is supposed in certain tircles to have some vague injurious effect upon those who make it an important consideration, who let it weigh in the balance. It is assumed to be opposed in some mysterious manner to morality, to amusement, to instruction. When it is embodied in the work of the painter (the sculptor's another affair') you know what so it is it stands there before you, in the honesty of pink and green and a gilt frame, you can see the worst of it at a glance, and you can be on your guard. But when it is introduced into literature it becomes more insidiousthere is danger of its hurting you before you know it. Literature should be either instructive or amusing, and there is in many minds an impression that these artistic preoccupations, the search for form, contribute to neither end, interfere indeed with both. They are too frivolous to be edifying, and too serious to be diverting, and they 60 are moreover priggish and paradoxical and superfluous That, I think, represents the manner in which the latent thought of many people who read novels as an exercise in skipping would explain itself if it were to become articulate. They would argue, of course, that a novel ought to be "good," but they would interpret this term in a fashion of their own, which indeed would vary considerably from one critic to another. One would say that being good means representing virtuous and aspiring characters placed in prominent positions, another would 70 say that it depends on a "happy ending," on a distribution at the last of prizes, pensions, husbands, wives, babies, millions, appended paragraphs, and cheerful remarks. Another still would say that it means being full of incident and movement, so that we shall wish to jump ahead, to see who was the mysterious stranger, and if the stolen will was ever found, and shall not be distracted from this pleasure by any tiresome analysis or "descrip-But they would all agree that the "artistic" idea would spoil some of their fun. One would hold it ac- 80 countable for all the description, another would see it revealed in the absence of sympathy. Its hostility to a happy ending would be evident and it might even in some cases render any ending at all impossible. The "ending" of a novel is, for many persons, like that of a good dinner, a course of dessert and ices, and the artist in fiction is regarded as a sort of meddlesome doctor who forbids agreeable aftertastes. It is therefore true that this conception of Mr Besant's of the novel as a superior form encounters not only a negative but a positive in- 90 difference. It matters little that as a work of art it should really be as little or as much of its essence to supply happy endings, sympathetic characters, and an objective tone, as if it were a work of mechanics the association of ideas, however incongruous, might easily be too much for it if an eloquent voice were not sometimes raised to call attention to the fact that it is at once as free and as serious a branch of literature as any other

Certainly this might sometimes be doubted in presence of the enormous number of works of fiction that appeal to the credulity of our generation, for it might 10 easily seem that there could be no great character in a commodity so quickly and easily produced. It must be admitted that good novels are much compromised by bad ones, and that the field at large suffers discredit from overcrowding. I think, however, that this injury is only superficial, and that the superabundance of written fiction proves nothing against the principle itself. It has been vulgarised, like all other kinds of literature. like everything else to-day, and it has proved more than some kinds accessible to vulgarisation. But there is as much dif-20 ference as there ever was between a good novel and a bad one the bad is swept with all the daubed canvases and spoiled marble into some unvisited limbo, or infinite rubbish-yard beneath the back-windows of the world, and the good subsists and emits its light and stimulates our desire for perfection. As I shall take the liberty of making but a single criticism of Mr Besant, whose tone is so full of love of his art, I may as well have done with it at once He seems to me to mistake, in attempting to say so definitely beforehand, what sort of an affair the good novel 30 will be To indicate the danger of such an error as that has been the purpose of these few pages, to suggest that certain traditions on the subject, applied a priori, have already had much to answer for, and that the good health of an art which undertakes so immediately to reproduce life must demand that it be perfectly free. It lives upon exercise, and the very meaning of exercise is freedom. The only obligation to which in advance we may hold a novel, without incurring the accusation of being arbitrary, is that it be interesting. That general responsibility 40 rests upon it, but it is the only one I can think of The ways in which it is at liberty to accomplish this result (of interesting us) strike me as innumerable, and such as can only suffer from being marked out or fenced in by prescription They are as various as the temperament of man, and they are successful in proportion as they reveal a particular mind, different from others. A novel is in its broadest definition a personal, a direct impression of life that, to begin with, constitutes its value, which is greater or less according to the intensity of the impression But there will be no intensity at all, and therefore 5 no value, unless there is freedom to feel and say tracing of a line to be followed, of a tone to be taken, of a form to be filled out, is a limitation of that freedom and a suppression of the very thing that we are most curious about The form, it seems to me, is to be appreciated after the fact, then the author's choice has been made his standard has been indicated, then we can follow lines and directions and compare tones and resemblances Then in a word we can enjoy one of the most charming of pleasures, we can estimate quality, we can apply the & test of execution. The execution belongs to the author alone, it is what is most personal to him, and we measure him by that The advantage, the luxury, as well as the torment and responsibility of the novelist, is that there is no limit to what he may attempt as an executant-no limit to his possible experiments, efforts, discoveries, successes Here it is especially that he works, step by step. like his brother of the brush, of whom we may always say that he has painted his picture in a manner best known to himself. His manner is his secret, not necessarily a 7 jealous one He cannot disclose it as a general thing it he would he would be at a loss to teach it to others say this with a due recollection of having insisted on the community of method of the artist who paints a picture and the artist who writes a novel The painter 15 able to teach the rudiments of his practice, and it is possible from the study of good work (granted the aptitude) both to learn how to paint and to learn how to write Yet it remains true, without injury to the rapprochement, that the literary artist would be obliged to say to 3 his pupil much more than the other, "Ah, well, you must do it as you can! ' It is a question of degree, a matter of delicacy. If there are exact sciences, there are also exact arts, and the grammar of painting is so much more definite that it makes the difference

I ought to add, however, that if Mr Besant says at the beginning of his essay that the 'laws of fiction may be laid down and taught with as much precision and exact-ness as the laws of harmony, perspective, and propornon." he mitigates what might appear to be an extravagance by applying his remark to 'general' laws, and by Appressing most of these rules in a manner with which it would certainly be unaccommodating to disagree That the novelist must write from his experience, that his characters must be real and such as might be met with in actual life," that "a young lady brought up in a quiet country village should avoid descriptions of garrison life, and "a writer whose friends and personal experiences belong to the lower middle-class should carefully word introducing his characters into society," that one should enter one's notes in a common-place book that one's figures should be clear in outline, that making them clear by some trick of speech or of carriage is a bad method and "describing them at length is a worse one, that English Fiction should have a 'conscious moral purpose,' that "it is almost impossible to estimate too highly the value of careful workmanship—that is, of style, that 'the most important point of all is the story,' that the story is everything ' these are principles with most of which it is surely impossible not to sympathise That remark about the lower middle-class writer and his knowing his place is perhaps rather chilling, but for the rest I should find it difficult to dissent from any one of these recommendations At the same time, I should find it difficult positively to assent to them, with the exception, perhaps, of the injunction as to entering one's notes in a common-place book They scarcely seem to me to have the quality that Mr Besant attributes to the rules of the novelist-the "precision and exactness of "the laws of harmony, perspective, and proportion" They are suggestive, they are even inspiring but they are not exact, though they are doubtless as much so as the case admits of which is a proof of that liberty of interpretation for which I just contended For the value of these different injunctions—so beautiful and so vague—is wholly in the meaning one attaches to them The characters, the situation, which strike one as real will be those that touch and 40 interest one most, but the measure of reality is very difficult to fix The reality of Don Quixote or of Mr Micawber is a very delicate shade, it is a reality so coloured by the author's vision that, vivid as it may be, one vould hesitate to propose it as a model one would expose one's self to some very embarrassing questions on the part of a pupil. It goes without saying that you will not write a good novel unless you possess the sense of reality, but it will be difficult to give you a recipe for calling that sense into being Humanity is immense, and reality has a myriad forms, the most one can affirm is so that some of the flowers of fiction have the odour of it, and others have not, as for telling you in advance how your nosegay should be composed, that is another affair It is equally excellent and inconclusive to say that one must write from experience, to our supposititious aspirant such a declaration might savour of mockery What kind of experience is intended, and where does it begin and end? Experience is never limited, and it is never complete, it is an immense sensibility, a kind of huge spiderweb of the finest silken threads suspended in the 60 chamber of consciousness and catching every air-borne particle in its tissue. It is the very atmosphere of the mind and when the mind is imaginative-much more when it happens to be that of a man of genius-it takes to itself the faintest hints of life, it converts the very pulses of the air into revelations. The young lady living in a village has only to be a damsel upon whom nothing is lost to make it quite unfair (as it seems to me) to declare to her that she shall have nothing to say about the military Greater miracles have been seen than that, 70 imagination assisting, she should speak the truth about some of these gentlemen. I remember an English novelist, a woman of genius, telling me that she was much commended for the impression she had managed to give in one of her tales of the nature and way of life of the French Protestant youth She had been asked where she learned so much about this recondite being, she had been congratulated on her peculiar opportunities These opportunities consisted in her having once, in Paris, as she ascended a staircase, passed an open door where, in the 80 household of a pasteur, some of the young Protestants were seated at table round a finished meal. The glimpse made a picture, it lasted only a moment, but that moment was experience She had got her direct personal impression, and she turned out her type. She knew what youth was, and what Protestantism, she also had the advantage of having seen what it was to be French, so that she converted these ideas into a concrete image and produced a reality Above all, however, she was blessed with the faculty which when you give it an inch takes an ell, and which for the artist is a much greater source of strength than any accident of residence or of place in the social scale. The power to guess the unseen from the seen, to trace the implication of things, to judge the whole piece by the pattern, the condition of feeling life in general so completely that you are well on your way to knowing any particular corner of it-this cluster of gifts may almost be said to constitute experience, and 10 they occur in country and in town, and in the most differing stages of education If experience consists of impressions, it may be said that impressions are experience, just as (have we not seen it') they are the very air we breathe Therefore, if I should certainly say to a novice, "Write from experience and experience only," I should feel that this was rather a tantalising monition if I were not careful immediately to add, 'Try to be one of the people on whom nothing is lost!"

I am far from intending by this to minimise the im-20 portance of exactness—of truth of detail. One can speak best from one's own taste, and I may therefore venture to say that the air of reality (solidity of specification) seems to me to be the supreme virtue of a novel-the merit on which all its other merits (including that conscious moral purpose of which Mr Besant speaks) helplessly and submissively depend. If it be not there they are all as nothing, and if these be there, they owe their effect to the success with which the author has produced the illusion of life The cultivation of this success, the 30 study of this exquisite process, form, to my taste, the beginning and the end of the art of the novelist They are his inspiration, his despair, his reward, his torment, his delight. It is here in very truth that he competes with life, it is here that he competes with his brother the painter in his attempt to render the look of things, the look that conveys their meaning, to catch the colour, the relief, the expression, the surface, the substance of the human spectacle. It is in regard to this that Mr. Besant is well inspired when he bids him take notes He 40 cannot possibly take too many, he cannot possibly take enough All life solicits him, and to "render" the simplest surface, to produce the most momentary illusion, is a very complicated business. His case would be easier, and the rule would be more exact, if Mr Besant had been able to tell him what notes to take But this, I fear he can never learn in any manual, it is the business of h s life. He has to take a great many in order to select a few, he has to work them up as he can, and even the guides and philosophers who might have most to say to him must leave him alone when it comes to the application of precepts, as we leave the painter in communion with his palette. That his characters "must be clear in outline," as Mr Besant says-he feels that down to his boots, but how he shall make them so is a secret between his good angel and himself It would be absurdly simple if he could be taught that a great deal of "description" would make them so, or that on the contrary the absence of description and the cultivation of dialogue, or the absence of dialogue and the multiplication of "incident," would rescue him from his difficulties Nothing, for in- 60 stance, is more possible than that he be of a turn of mind for which this odd, literal opposition of description and dialogue, incident and description, has little meaning and light People often talk of these things as if they had a kind of internecine distinctness, instead of melting into each other at every breath, and being intimately associated parts of one general effort of expression I cannot imagine composition existing in a series of blocks, nor conceive, in any novel worth discussing at all, of a passage of description that is not in its intention narrative, a passage of dialogue that is not in its intention descriptive, a touch of truth of any sort that does not partake of the nature of incident, or an incident that derives its interest from any other source than the general and only source of the success of a work of art-that of being illustrative A novel is a living thing, all one and continuous, like any other organism, and in proportion as it lives will it be found, I think, that in each of the parts there is something of each of the other parts. The critic who over the close texture of a finished work shall pretend to trace a geography of items will mark some frontiess as artificial, I fear, as any that have been known to history There is an old-fashioned distinction between the novel of character and the novel of incident which must have cost many a smile to the intending fabulist who was keen about his work. It appears to me as little to the point as the equally celebrated distinction between the novel and the romance—to answer as little to any reality. There are bad novels and good novels, as there are bad pictures and good pictures, but that is the only distinction in which I see any meaning, and I can as little imagine speaking of a novel of character as I can imagine speaking of a picture of character When one says picture one says of character, when one says novel one says of incident, and the terms may be transposed at will What is character but the determination of incident? What is incident but the illustration of character? What is either and picture or a novel that is not of character? What else do we seek in it and find in it? It is an incident for a woman to stand up with her hand resting on a table and look at you in a certain way, or if it be not an incident I think it will be hard to say what it is At the same time it is an expression of character If you say you don't see it (character in that—allons done'), this is exactly what the artist who has reasons of his own for thinking he does see it undertakes to show you When a young man makes up his mind that he has not faith enough after all to ener the church as he intended, that is an incident, though you may not hurry to the end of the chapter to see whether perhaps he doesn't change once more. I do not say that these are extraordinary or startling incidents. I do not pretend to estimate the degree of interest proceeding from them, for this will depend upon the skill of the painter. It sounds almost puerile to say that some incideats are intrinsically much more important than others, and I need not take this precaution after having professed my sympathy for the major ones in remarking that the a only classification of the novel that I can understand is into that which has life and that which has it not

The novel and the romance, the novel of incident and that of character—these clumsy separations appear to me to have been made by critics and readers for their own convenience, and to help them out of some of their occasional predicaments, but to have little reality or interest for the producer, from whose point of view it is ut course that we are attempting to consider the art of fection. The case is the same with another shadowy category which Mr. Besant apparently is disposed to set up—that of the "modern English novel," unless indeed it be that in this matter he has fallen into an accidental confusion of standpoints. It is not quite clear whether he intends the remarks in which he alludes to it to be didactic or historical. It is as difficult to suppose a person intending to write a modein English as to suppose him writing an ancient English novel that is a label which begs the question One writes the novel, one paints the picture, of one's language and of one's time, and calling it modern English will not, alas! make 50 the difficult task any easier No more, unfortunately, will calling this or that work of one's fellow-artist a romance -unless it be, of course, simply for the pleasantness of the thing, as for instance when Hawthorne gave this heading to his story of Butbedale. The French, who have brought the theory of fiction to remarkable completeness, have but one name for the novel, and have not attempted smaller things in it, that I can see, for that I can think of no obligation to which the "romancer" would not be held equally with the novelist, the standard of execution 60 is equally high for each. Of course it is of execution that we are talking-that being the only point of a novel that is open to contention. This is perhaps too often lost sight of, only to produce interminable confusions and cross-purposes We must grant the artist his subject, his idea, his donnee our criticism is applied only to what he makes of it Naturally I do not mean that we are bound to like it or find it interesting in case we do not our course is perfectly simple—to let it alone We may believe that of a certain idea even the most sin- 70 cere novelist can make nothing at all, and the event may perfectly justify our belief, but the failure will have been a failure to execute, and it is in the execution that the fatal weakness is recorded. If we pretend to respect the artist at all, we must allow him his freedom of choice, in the face, in particular cases, of innumerable presumptions that the choice will not fructify Art derives a considerable part of its beneficial exercise from flying in the face of presumptions, and some of the most interesting experiments of which it is capable are hidden in 80 the bosom of common things Gustave Flaubert has written a story about the devotion of a servant-gul to a parrot, and the production, highly finished as it is, cannot on the whole be called a success We are perfectly free to find it flat, but I think it might have been interesting, and I, for my part, am extremely glad he should have written it it is a contribution to our knowledge of what can be done—or what cannot. Ivan Turgénieff has written a tale about a deaf and dumb serf and a lap-dog, and the thing is touching, loving, a little masterpiece. He struck the note of life where Gustave Flaubert missed it—he flew in the face of a presumption and achieved a victory.

Nothing, of course, will ever take the place of the good old fashion of "liking" a work of art or not liking it the most improved criticism will not abolish that 10 primitive, that ultimate test I mention this to guard myself from the accusation of intimating that the idea, the subject, of a novel or a picture, does not matter It matters, to my sense, in the highest degree, and if I might put up a prayer it would be that artists should select none but the richest Some, as I have already hastened to admit, are much more remunerative than others, and it would be a world happily arranged in which persons intending to treat them should be exempt from confusions and misrakes This fortunate condition will ar-20 rive only, I fear, on the same day that critics become purged from error Meanwhile, I repeat, we do not judge the artist with fairness unless we say to him, "Oh, I grant you your starting-point, because if I did not I should seem to prescribe to you, and heaven forbid I what you must not take, you will call upon me to tell you then what you must take, in which case I shall be prettily caught Moreover, it isn't till I have accepted your data that I can begin to measure you. I have the 30 standard, the pitch, I have no right to tamper with your flute and then criticise your music Of course I may not care for your idea at all, I may think it silly, or stale, or unclean, in which case I wash my hands of you altogether I may content myself with believing that you will not have succeeded in being interesting, but I shill, of course, not attempt to demonstrate it, and you will be as indifferent to me as I am to you I needn't remind you that there are all sorts of tastes who can know it better? Some people, for excellent reasons, don't like to 40 read about carpenters, others, for reasons even better, don't like to read about courtesans. Many object to Americans Others (I believe they are mainly editors and publishers) won't look at Italians Some readers don't like quiet subjects, others don't like bustling ones. Some enjoy a complete illusion, others the consciousness of large concessions. They choose their novels accordingly, and if they don't care about your idea they won't a fortiors, care about your treatment"

So that it comes back very quickly, as I have said, to the liking. in spite of M. Zola, who reasons less powerfully than he represents, and who will not reconcile himself to this absoluteness of taste, thinking that there are certain things that people ought to like, and that they can be made to like I am quite at a loss to imagine anything (at any rate in this matter of fiction) that people ought to like or to dislike Selection will be sure to take care of itself, for it has a constant motive behind it. That motive is simply experience As people feel life, so they will feel the art that is most closely related to it. This closeness of relation is what we should never forget in talking of the effort of the novel Many people speak of it as a factitious, artificial form, a product of ingenuity the business of which it is to alter and arrange the things that surround us, to translate them into conventional traditional moulds This, however, is a view of the matter which carries us but a very short way, condemns the art to an eternal repetition of a few familiar clichés, cuts short its development, and leads us straight up to a dead Catching the very note and trick, the strange irregular rhythm of life, that is the attempt whose strenuous force keeps Fiction upon her feet. In proportion as in what she offers us we see life without rearrangement do we feel that we are touching the truth, in proportion as we see it with rearrangement do we feel that we are being put off with a substitute, a compromise and convention It is not uncommon to hear an extraordinary assurance of remark in regard to this matter of rearranging, which is often spoken of as if it were the last word of art Mr Besant seems to me in danger of falling into the great error with his rather unguarded talk about "selection" Art is essentially selection, but it is a selection whose main care is to be typical, to be inclusive For many people art means rose-coloured window-panes, and selection means picking a bouquet for Mrs Grundy They will tell you glibly that artistic considerations have nothing to do with the disagreeable with the ugly, they will rattle off shallow commonplaces about the province of art and the limits of art till you are moved to some wonder in return as to the province and the limits of ignorance. It appears to me that no one can ever have made a seriously artistic attempt without becoming conscious of an immense increase—a kind of revelation—of freedom. One perceives in that case—by the light of a heavenly ray-that the province of art is all life, all feeling, all observation, all vision As Mr Besant so justly intimates, it is all experience That is sufficient answer to those who maintain that it must seat touch the sad things of life, who stick into its divine unconscious bosom little prohibitory inscriptions on the end of sticks, such as we see in public gardens—'It is forbidden to walk on the grass, it is forbidden to touch the flowers, it is not allowed to introduce dogs or to remain after dark, it is requested to keep to the right" The young aspirant in the line of fiction whom we continue to imagine will do nothing without taste, for in that case his freedom would be of little use to him, but the first advantage of his taste will be to reveal to him x he absurdity of the little sticks and tickets. If he have riste, I must add, of course, he will have ingenuity, and my disrespectful reference to that quality just now was not meant to imply that it is useless in fiction But it is only a secondary aid, the first is a capacity for receiving straight impressions.

Mr Besant has some remarks on the question of "the story' which I shall not attempt to criticise, though they seem to me to contain a singular ambiguity, because I do not think I understand them I cannot see what is e meant by talking as if there were a part of a novel which is the story and part of it which for mystical reasons is not-unless indeed the distinction be made in a sense in which it is difficult to suppose that any one should attempt to convey anything "The story," if it represents anything, represents the subject, the idea, the donnce of the novel, and there is surely no "school"-Mr Besant speaks of a school-which urges that a novel should be ill treatment and no subject. There must assuredly be something to treat, every school is intimately conscious out that This sense of the story being the idea, the starting-point, of the novel, is the only one that I see in which it can be spoken of as something different from 15 organic whole; and since in proportion as the work 's successful the idea permeates and penetrates it, intorms and animates it so that every word and every Punctuation-point contribute directly to the expression, in that proportion do we lose our sense of the story being a blade which may be drawn more or less out of its sheath. The story and the novel, the idea and the form, are the needle and thread, and I never heard of a 50 guild of tailors who recommended the use of the thread without the needle, or the needle without the thread Mr Besant is not the only critic who may be observed to have spoken as if there were certain things in life which constitute stories, and certain others which do not I find the same odd implication in an entertaining article in the Pall Mill Gazette, devoted as it happens, to Mr Besant's lecture "The story is the thing! says this graceful writer, as if with a tone of opposition to some other idea. I should think it was, as every painter who, as the 60 time for "sending in" his picture looms in the distance finds himself still in quest of a subject-as every belated artist not fixed about his theme will heartily agree. There are some subjects which speak to us and others which do not, but he would be a clever man who should undertake to give a rule—an index expurgatorius—by which the story and the no-story should be known apart. It is impossible (to me at least) to imagine any such rule which shall not be altogether arbitrary. The writer in the Pall Mall opposes the delightful (as I suppose) novel 70 of Margot la Balafice to certain tales in which "Bostonian nymphs" appear to have "rejected English dukes for psychological reasons" I am not acquainted with the romance just designated, and can scarcely forgive the Pall Mall critic for not mentioning the name of the author, but the title appears to refer to a lady who may have received a scar in some heroic adventure. I am inconsolable at not being acquainted with this episode, but am utterly at a loss to see why it is a story when the rejection (or acceptance) of a duke is not, and why a 80 reason, psychological or other, is not a subject when a cicatrix is They are all particles of the multitudinous life with which the novel deals and surely no dogma which pretends to make it lawful to touch the one and unlawful to touch the other will stand for a moment on its feet. It is the special picture that must stand or fall, according as it seems to possess truth or to lack it. Mr.

⁷¹ Bostonian . . . reasons, presumably a reference to James' Portrait of a Lody, in which Isobel Archer, an American girl, rejects a proposal of marriage from an English lord • 82 cicatrix, scar, la Balafree means the scarred woman

Besant does not, to my sense, light up the subject by intimating that a story must, under penalty of not being a story, consist of "adventures." Why of adventures more than of green spectacles? He mentions a category of impossible things, and among them he places "fiction without adventure." Why without adventure, more than without matrimony, or celibacy, or parturition, or chole1a, or hydropathy, or Jansenism? This seems to me to bring the novel back to the hapless little rôle of being an 10 artificial, ingenious thing-bring it down from its large, free character of an immense and exquisite correspondence with life And what is adventure when it comes to that, and by what sign is the listening pupil to recognize it? It is an adventure—an immense one—for me to write this little article, and for a Bostonian nymph to reject an English duke is an adventure only less stirring, I should say, than for an English duke to be rejected by a Bostonian nymph. I see dramas within dramas in that, and innumerable points of view A psychological reason 20 is, to my imagination, an object adorably pictorial, to catch the tint of its complexion-I feel as if that idea might inspire one to Titinnesque efforts. There are few things more exciting to me, in short, than a psychological reason, and yet, I protest, the novel seems to me the most magnificent form of art. I have just been reading, at the same time, the delightful story of Treasure Island, by Mr Robert Louis Stevenson and, in a manner less consecutive, the last tale from M Edmond de Goncourt, which is entitled Chárie. One of these works treats of 30 murders, mysteries, islands of dreadful renown, hairbreadth escapes, miraculous coincidences, and buried doubloons The other treats of a little French girl who lived in a fine house in Paris, and died of wounded sensibility because no one would marry her I call Treasure Island delightful, because it appears to me to have succeeded wonderfully in what it attempts, and I venture to bestow no epithet upon Chérie, which strikes me as having failed deplorably in what it attempts-that is, in tracing the development of the moral consciousness of a 40 thild But one of these productions strikes me as exactly as much of a novel as the other, and as having a "story" quite as much The moral consciousness of a child is as much a part of life as the islands of the Spanish Main, and the one sort of geography seems to me to have those "surprises" of which Mr. Besant speaks quite as much as the other. For myself (since it comes back in the last resort, as I say, to the preference of the individual), the picture of the child's experience has the advantage that I can at successive steps (an immense luxury, near to the "sensual pleasure" of which Mr Besant's critic in the sensual pleasure" of which Mr Besant's critic in the sensual pleasure of which Mr Besant's critic in the sensual pleasure of which Mr Besant's critic in the sensual pleasure of which Mr Besant's critic in the sensual pleasure of what the artist puts before me I have been a child in fact but I have been on a quest for a buried treasure only in supposition, and it is a simple accident that with M de Goncourt I should have for the most part to say No With George Eliot, when she painted that country with a far other intelligence, I always said Yes.

The most interesting part of Mr. Besant's lecture is unfortunately the briefest passage—his very cursory al lusion to the "conscious moral purpose" of the novel Here again it is not very clear whether he be recording a fact or laying down a principle, it is a great pity that in the latter case he should not have developed his idea This branch of the subject is of immense importance and Mr Besant's few words point to considerations of the widest reach, not to be lightly disposed of He will have treated the art of fiction but superficially who is not prepared to go every inch of the way that these consider ations will carry him. It is for this reason that at the beginning of these remarks I was careful to notify the 7 reader that my reflections on so large a theme have no pretension to be exhaustive. Like Mr Besant, I have left the question of the morality of the novel till the last and at the last I find I have used up my space. It is a question surrounded with difficulties, as witness the very first that meets us, in the form of a definite question on the threshold Vagueness, in such a discussion, is fatal and what is the meaning of your morality and your conscious moral purpose? Will you not define your terms and explain how (a novel being a picture) a picture can be either moral or immoral? You wish to paint a moral picture or carve a moral statue will you not tell us how you would set about 1t? We are discussing the Art of Fiction, questions of art are questions (in the widest sense) of execution, questions of morality are quite an other affair, and will you not let us see how it is that you find it so easy to mix them up? These things are so clear to Mr Besant that he has deduced from them a law which he sees embodied in English Fiction, and which is "a truly admirable thing and a great cause for congratulation" It is a great cause for congratulation indeed when such thorny problems become as smooth as silk I may add that in so far as Mr Besant perceives that in point of fact English Fiction has addressed itself preponderantly to these delicate questions he will appear nany people to have made a vain discovery They will have been positively struck, on the contrary, with the moral timidity of the usual English novelist, with his (or with her) aversion to face the difficulties with which on every side the treatment of reality bristles. He is apt to be extremely shy (whereas the picture that Mr. Besant draws is a picture of boldness), and the sign of his work, for the most part, is a cautious silence on certain subjects. In the English novel (by which of course I mean the American as well), more than in any other, green is a traditional difference between that which people know and that which they agree to admit that they know, that which they see and that which they speak of, that which they feel to be a part of life and that which they allow to enter into literature. There is the great difference, in short, between what they talk of in conversition and what they talk of in print. The essence of moral energy is to survey the whole field, and I should directly reverse Mr Besant's remark and say not that the Logish novel has a purpose but that it has a diffidence : To what degree a purpose in a work of art is a source of corruption I shall not attempt to inquire, the one that seems to me least dangerous is the purpose of making a perfect work. As for our novel, I may say lastly on this score that as we find it in England to-day it strikes me as addressed in a large degree to "young people," and that this in itself constitutes a presumption that it will be rather shy There are certain things which it is generally agreed not to discuss, not even to mention, before young people That is very well, but the absence of discussion s not a symptom of the moral passion. The purpose of the English novel-"a truly admirable thing, and a great cause for congratulation"-strikes me therefore as rather negative

There is one point at which the moral sense and the artistic sense lie very near together, that is in the light of the very obvious truth that the deepest quality of a work of art will always be the quality of the mind of the producer In the proportion as that intelligence is fine will the novel, the picture, the statue partake of the substance of beauty and truth. To be constituted of such 50 elements is, to my vision, to have purpose enough No good novel will ever proceed from a superficial mind, that seems to me an axiom which, for the artist in fiction, will cover all needful moral ground of the youthful aspirant take it to heart it will illuminate for him many of the mysteries of "purpose" There are many other useful things that might be said to him, but I have come to the end of my article, and can only touch them as I pass The critic in the Pall Mall Gazette, whom I have already quoted, draws attention to the danger, in speaking of the 60 art of fiction of generalising. The danger that he has in mind is rather, I imagine, that of particularising, for there are some comprehensive remarks which, in addition to those embodied in Mr Besant's suggestive lecture, might without fear of misleading him be addressed to the ingenuous student 1 should remind him first of the magnificence of the form that is open to him, which offers to sight so few restrictions and such innumerable opportunities The other arts, in comparison, appear confined and hampered, the various conditions under 70 which they are exercised are so rigid and definite. But the only condition that I can think of attaching to the composition of the novel is, as I have already said, that it be sincere. This freedom is a splendid privilege, and the first lesson of the young novelist is to learn to be worthy of it "Enjoy it as it deserves," I should say to him, 'take possession of it, explore it to its utmost extent, publish it, rejoice in it. All life belongs to you, and do not listen either to those who would shut you up into coiners of it and tell you that it is only here and 80 there that art inhabits, or to those who would persuade you that this heavenly messenger wings her way outside of life altogether, breathing a superfine air, and turning away her head from the truth of things There is no impression of life, no manner of seeing it and feeling it, to which the plan of the novelist nay not offer a place, you have only to remember that talents so dissimilar as those of Alexandre Dumas and Jane Austen, Charles Dickens and Gustave Flaubert have worked in this field with equal glory Do not think too much about opti- 90 mism and pessimism, try and catch the colour of life itself. In France to-day we see a prodigious effort (that of Emile Zola, to whose solid and serious work no explorer of the capacity of the novel can allude without respect), we see an extraordinary effort, vitiated by a spirit of pessimism on a narrow basis M Zola is magnificent, but he strikes an English reader as ignorant; he has an air of working in the dark, if he had as much light as energy, his results would be of the highest value. As for the aberrations of a shallow optimism, the ground (of English fiction especially) is strewn with their brittle particles as with broken glass. If you must indulge in the conclusions, let them have the taste of a wide knowledge Remember that your first duty is to be as complete as possible—to make as perfect a work. Be generous and delicate and pursue the prize."

Daisy Miller

The story of Daisy Miller owed its genesis to a hint from a friend in Rome during the autumn of 1877. The friend told the author of a young American girl—"a child of nature and of freedom"—who had innocently violated the strict decorums of Roman society. James' imagination did the rest. The result was a nouvelle, or short novel, in which the author saw a certain "flatness" and at the same time "a shy incongruous charm." (See James' Preface in the New York edition of The Novels and Tales of Henry James, Vol. XVIII, pp. v-viii, or The Art of the Novel, ed. R. P. Blackmur, pp. 267-270.)

Unlike any other work by James, Daisy Miller created a small furor and thus became, as he later said, "the most prosperous child of my invention." Its popularity was partly a success of scandal, for many readers in this country resented what they supposed to be a satirical portrait of the American girl Writing in James' defense (Century Magazine, November 1882), W. D. Howells declared truly that "so far as the average American girl was studied at all in Daisy Miller, her indestructible innocence, her invulnerable new-worldliness, had never been so delicately appreciated"

Technically, the story is remarkable for the consistent use of the restricted point of view. Told in the third person, the narrative presents the characters and situations as seen through the eyes of one actor if in the course of the story there is uncertainty about Miss Miller, it is because the evidence is often confusing to Winterbourne Though an American, he has lived too long in Europe to understand American ways. His expanding consciousness affords the pattern of the story. James was to develop and refine this method in his later works, but rarely, if ever, with a more delightful result.
